The Constitution forbids such treatment or punishment, and the law renders inadmissible in court any evidence obtained by such means. There are occasional reports in the media and charges in the courts that police have mistreated persons under arrest. The law permits victims to sue for damages in case of mistreatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Any person who is arrested may apply for a writ of habeas corpus. The police usually charge a suspect within 48 hours of arrest, but can obtain a court order to hold a person longer in order to get further evidence. Recent articles in the press have called into question the long-standing police practice of detaining suspects for questioning. This practice has traditionally been accepted by the public and the judiciary, but a 1985 court decision led to questions .

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

regarding the correct interpretation of the law, specifically, the length of time that a detainee may be held without being charged. This court decision awarded compensatory damages to a group of persons who were detained for questioning but never charged. Trinidad and Tobago has no specific laws regarding forced labor. However, as a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO) Trinidad and Tobago has adopted the ILO conventions on forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In law and in practice, accused persons are accorded a fair and public trial by an independent judiciary, from which appeals may be made to the Court of Appeals and to the Privy Council in London. The judiciary and legal system are understaffed and overworked, and a large backlog of cases has led to delays in bringing some accused persons to trial. Although accused persons generally may be freed on bail pending trial, persons accused of murder are not eligible for bail under current procedures.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution and law prohibit such arbitrary interference, and these prohibitions are generally respected in practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The constitutional right of freedom of expression is protected and enhanced by the independent judiciary, by the country's democratic and pluralistic system, and by the privately owned print media. Government-owned Trinidad and Tobago Television (TTT) enjoys a monopoly on local television transmission, and its coverage tends to support the Government.

In 1984, a prominent member of the opposition filed a motion against TTT protesting the station's refusal to air one of his speeches. A High Court judge ruled in favor of the plaintiff in 1985, declaring that TTT had "unreasonably withheld the right of equality of treatment from a public authority." TTT was ordered to submit a statement of policy regarding political broadcasting time allotments to the court. The Government appealed the case, however, and won the appeal on the grounds that the judge had overstepped his authority by dictating TTT policy.

The Government has failed to act on a long-standing application of a large number of businessmen to launch a private television station. Of the two radio stations currently in operation, one is government-owned and the other is private but government-licensed. The private station recently had its license renewed, but government officials have reminded the media that the government intends to retain control of broadcasting through the need for licensing approval.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are protected by law and are respected in practice. Permits for street meetings, marches, or other demonstrations are required in advance but are normally granted, including to critics of the Government. The right of workers to organize and bargain collectively is protected by law, and about 30 percent of the work force is organized into trade unions. The unions are grouped primarily into two labor congresses, one of which tends to take a moderate stance in government/labor disputes, while the other follows a more radical course. The Ministry of Labor acts as an impartial conciliator in collective bargaining impasses. Unions may strike and employers may lock workers out if the Ministry is unsuccessful in resolving the labor dispute, certifies the dispute as unresolved, and refers it to the Industrial Court. The Industrial Court is empowered to impose a binding settlement on the parties. In 1985, union leaders occasionally complained that the police intimidated striking workers on picket lines and that the Government tacitly supported the employers in their programs of large-scale retrenchments. However, the unions' rights generally are respected by the Government. Unions and professional associations maintain relations with international organizations.

c. Freedom of Religion

The right to practice one's religion is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. There is no state religion. Missionaries and clergy are generally permitted to enter Trinidad and Tobago to proselytize or to serve the members of their group. There are large groups of Christians, Hindus, and Moslems in Trinidad and Tobago. There is no religious test for public office.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These freedoms are fully respected. Many thousands of citizens have emigrated in search of better economic opportunities, particularly to the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom. Many thousands from Caribbean Commonwealth countries, such as Grenada, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, and Guyana, have immigrated to Trinidad and Tobago for the same reason.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The people of Trinidad and Tobago choose their government by electing a House of Representatives in free, multiparty elections held at least every 5 years. The leader of the opposition has the right to be consulted by the President on appointments, including those to the Elections and Boundaries Commission which draws constituency boundaries and conducts the elections. There are credible opposition allegations that the nominally independent Commission has actually supported the People's National Movement (PNM) in the past by gerrymandering constituencies in its favor. The PNM has won all elections since 1956, but its victories can be attributed principally to its political skills and to divisions among the opposition. The Constitution permits Commonwealth citizens who are legal residents and 18 years of age and older to vote.

Several opposition parties joined to form a single National Alliance for Reconstruction (NAR) in 1985. These parties individually won control of 6 of the 7 county councils in the 1983 local elections.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Trinidad and Tobago has not been the subject of international human rights investigations. In addition to the judiciary, where claims of human rights violations are actionable, there is an Ombudsman who can investigate alleged violations of citizens' rights in the application of a law or policy and report the findings to Parliament. Trinidad and Tobago has a local independent Bureau of Human Rights Issues, as well as a local branch of Amnesty International. Amnesty International's 1985 report did not comment on Trinidad and Tobago. Freedom House rates the country as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Because of its oil revenues, in the past decade Trinidad and Tobago attained a per capita gross national product of $7,183 (1984), highest in the Western Hemisphere after the United States and Canada. The population of 1.2 million inhabitants has a growth rate of 1.5 percent a year. Life expectancy at birth is 69.2 years, and infant mortality was 20.9 per thousand live births. Education and literacy are nearly universal. In 1970, average literacy was 92.2 percent (male 94.7 female 89.7). Further indications of the standard of living are the percent of the population with access to safe water in 1980 (urban 100 percent; rural 93 percent) and the 100 percent of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements in 1977. However, 39 percent of the rural population was below the absolute poverty level in 1977.

The laws of Trinidad and Tobago prohibit the employment of children under the age of 12. Children between the ages of 12 and 18 may be employed only in family businesses with the exception that children between the ages of 16 and 18 may be employed in certain industries specifically exempted from the law by order of the President.

There is no minimum wage rate in Trinidad and Tobago. However, minimum wages have been set in three occupational categories (gas station attendants, shop clerks, and domestic servants) by order of the Minister of Labor. The Minister's rationale was that these industries were difficult to organize and that, therefore, the workers wouldn't be protected by collective bargaining.

Occupational health and safety is covered by the 1948 Factories Ordinance Bill. Because of shortcomings of the 1948 bill, a new Occupational Safety and Health Bill reflecting changes in Trinidad and Tobago's industry has been circulated for public comment, but has not yet come before Parliament. The new bill is expected to prompt extensive debate when brought before Parliament some time during 1986.

Women enjoy equality under the law. Many have positions in the Government, civil service, political party leadership, business, and other professions, although their presence in these positions is not in proportion to their numbers in the population. Women currently serve in Parliament and women's groups are quick to speak out on women's rights.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Within the Indian community, signs of the Hindu caste system remain. Blacks believe they are not treated as well as whites and those of mixed blood. Individual Tobagonians enjoy equality of treatment but believe that Tobago itself receives far less development money than Trinidad. These individuals perceive these conditions as limiting social and economic opportunities available to them.

In Trinidad, opposition supporters say that areas which historically have supported the ruling party have more roads, telephones, and schools than those backing opposition parties.

URUGUAY

On March 1, 1985, the Uruguayan military ended its twelve-year rule and handed over power to the elected civilian Government of President Julio Maria Sanguinetti. Thus Uruguay returned to its traditional form of government--an elected constitutional democracy with an executive branch, an independent bicameral legislature, and an autonomous judicial system. The return to democracy was marked by a high level of political participation by all sectors of the population, unrestricted political debate, and broad access to the media by the major political parties.

The year 1985 saw the culmination of the gradual loosening of political restrictions, a process initiated in 1983 and continued in 1984. Soon after taking office, the Sanguinetti Government released all remaining political prisoners, lifted remaining censorship, and lifted proscriptions from those few political groups still outlawed, including the Uruguayan Communist Party and the National Liberation Movement-Tupamaros. The legislature and judiciary began to function normally without outside interference. University autonomy was reinstated, and proscribed student organizations re-emerged, holding in September their first free elections since 1973. An independent labor movement also reappeared and, by the end of 1985, most labor unions had held elections for new officers.

Though continuing to suffer the effects of an economic recession, Uruguay remains one of the more advanced developing countries. Its economy is largely one of free enterprise with the Government regulating monopolies in key sectors and controlling prices on many basic items.

Uruguay's political transition brought with it dramatic improvements in the area of human rights. Accusations of political killings, torture and disappearances ceased. Restrictive laws and acts passed under military rule were repealed, and the 1967 Constitution, which guarantees habeas corpus and freedom from arbitrary arrest, was reinstated. Congress set up commissions to handle the issues of restitution for those who had lost their jobs for political activities and to investigate violations of human rights which occurred during the military regime. President Sanguinetti indicated before his inauguration that the policy of his Government would be "justice, not revenge," and that obstacles would not be placed in the way of legal proceedings against those accused of human rights violations. In general, Uruguayans enjoyed a freedom and openness in political life which they had not experienced since the late 1960's, and they responded to it with a high level of civic consciousness and political involvement.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no cases of political killings in Uruguay in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There have been no cases of political disappearances reported in Uruguay since 1978.

URUGUAY

According to a 1985 bicameral Congressional Commission report on disappearances, 164 confirmed disappearances occurred during the period 1973 to 1978. Of these 32 occurred in Uruguay, 127 in Argentina, 3 in Chile and 2 in Paraguay. The report noted that witnesses had named 46 military personnel as possibly being implicated, some of whom may still be on active duty.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Local human rights groups reported no cases of torture or deliberately inhumane treatment in 1985.

In February the de facto military Government granted early release to 111 persons convicted of "subversive activities", including many whom the local human rights group "Servicio Paz y Justicia" (SERPAJ) recommended be released early for medical reasons. In March the La Libertad and Punta de Rieles national security prisons, were closed. Local human rights activists have suggested improvements in what they consider to be adverse living conditions in remaining Uruguayan penal institutions, contingent upon the availability of adequate funding.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile

There were no reported cases of arbitrary arrest, detention or exile in Uruguay in 1985.

In March, the new Government released all remaining political detainees, together with a substantial number of detainees held on ordinary criminal charges.

The Constitution of 1967, which replaced the previous Military Code of Justice, requires a written warrant for arrest if the person is not caught in the act and guarantees the right of habeas corpus. It also requires that an arrested person be allowed to give a statement before a judge within 24 hours, that he have a right to counsel in such proceedings, and that he be informed of the charges against him. The judge must begin the juridical process within 48 more hours. In criminal trials which may result in a penitentiary sentence, bond is allowed, with the amount determined by law according to the seriousness of the charge. The death penalty and brutal treatment in prisons are both outlawed by the Constitution, which declares that prisons shall be used only for rehabilitation and re-education. Military justice can be applied to civilians only during a state of war or insurrection. All of these constitutional safeguards are now in force and respected.

Forced or compulsory labor does not exist.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Full autonomy of the judiciary returned with the new Government, and military officers who had been appointed to the Supreme Court or the higher Appeals Courts retired from their posts. According to the 1967 Constitution, all trials shall be public, and trials by commission or in absentia are prohibited. Each trial must be opened by a public statement of the charge by a public prosecutor or complaining witness. Uruguayan legal tradition calls for judges, without the use of juries, to hand down decisions on the basis of written summaries, which are not available to the public. Several lawyers and human rights groups have advocated re-examination of the current judicial process in an effort to make it more efficient. Ideas include the institution of jury trials, tighter juridical supervision over pre-trial investigations by police, and the institution of a judicial police force. At present judges have to call on local police forces to carry out judicial decrees, which often slows the process considerably due to the volume of other work for which the police are responsible.

There are currently no political prisoners in Uruguay. Those who, like Blanco Party President Wilson Ferreira Aldunate, were free on bail pending trial had the charges against them dropped. Others, who had already been tried, were pardoned by President Sanguinetti.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

The Constitution affirms the inviolability of the home, which is absolute at night and subject to possession of a proper warrant during the day. Private papers and correspondence are also considered inviolable unless a proper legal warrant or exception has been obtained.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech became universal after March 1, 1985. The press censorship maintained by the de facto military Government was lifted, and oppositon viewpoints are once again freely expressed. New newspapers, including those financed by such previously proscribed organizations as the Communist Party and the March 26 Movement (political action arm of the Tupamaros) quickly appeared. Criticism of the Government is freely tolerated; academic freedom and university autonomy have been reinstated. Formerly-banned student organizations are active once again, and many professors who were fired by the military regime for ideological reasons have returned to their university positions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The last restrictions on peaceful assembly and association were lifted in early 1985, with the lifting of proscriptions against remaining outlawed groups such as the Communist Party and the Tupamaros. No license is required for public marches and demonstrations, which occur frequently and without harassment. Citizenship rights denied to individuals by the military on the basis of political affiliation and activity have been reinstated.

Workers have the right to organize freely under the Constitution, which encourages the creation of both unions and arbitration boards. The formerly-outlawed Interunion Workers Assembly and National Workers Association (PIT-CNT) has vigorously resumed activity. Most labor leaders proclaim their adherence to the theory of class struggle and seek a political role for unions. Among the political parties, only the Communist Party has traditionally exercised any significant influence in the labor movement.

URUGUAY

Both in law and in practice, workers have the right to associate, strike, and bargain collectively. The current Government recognizes the importance of these rights and is promoting them through proposals now before the Parliament which would prohibit the firing of workers for union activities and create salary councils to promote collective bargaining in which labor, management and government are represented. Those trade and professional associations which wish to participate in the general labor movement may do so. All are free to join international bodies. At present Uruguayan labor is not affiliated with any of the international labor federations, although it has observer status in all three.

c. Freedom of religion

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and respected. Although a majority of Uruguayans consider themselves Catholics, the church plays a less important role than in most Latin American countries. Missionaries from external religious groups are not hampered in the exercise of their calling.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on internal travel, nor is the right to foreign travel and emigration restricted. There is considerable concern for the 300,000 or so Uruguayans who departed the country, voluntarily or otherwise, during the military regime. Notwithstanding the fact that many of these individuals left Uruguay for economic rather than political reasons, a parliamentary committee on repatriation has been formed to consider ways in which those who wish to return might be aided and encouraged.

Uruguay is a multiparty, parliamentary democracy, with mandatory universal suffrage at age 18. There are no voting restrictions based on race, sex or economic status. The country's major political parties--Colorado Party, Blanco (National) Party and Broad Front (leftist coalition)--have kept their cohesion by allowing each ideological current within the party to run its own slate of candidates. National elections are held every five years; the next one is scheduled for November 1989.

Since the Sanguinetti Government took office in March 1985, Uruguay has not been a focus of concern of internationally-based human rights organizations. The Government is completely open to such organizations, and human rights investigators are placed under no restrictions as to where they can go and who they are allowed to interview.

Of local human rights groups, the most prominent continues to be Servieio, Paz y Justicia (SERPAJ), a non-denominational group supported by several religious bodies, which has ties with similar groups throughout Latin America. It operated underground for the last two years of the military Government but was legalized in early 1985. It now devotes itself to investigating both non-political human rights issues, such as prison conditions, and more politically sensitive questions involving cases of death, torture and disappearance which occurred during the 1973-1985 period. Another local group, the Foro Juvenil (Youth Forum) operated openly throughout the last years of military rule and carries out research on conditions encountered by youth, women and minorities. Several professional associations, including the Uruguayan Bar and Medical Associations, have human rights committees which investigate members accused of complicity with human rights violations during the military Government. The Uruguayan Human Rights Commission, a group of lawyers and legislators formed during the last years of military rule, dissolved itself in late 1985, announcing that with the return of civilian, democratic rule, the reasons for its existence had passed.

The years of military rule made most Uruguayans highly conscious of human rights issues, both at home and in other countries. Human rights developments elsewhere are well reported in the local press, with particular attention paid to other Latin American countries. The Sanguinetti administration has announced that Uruguay intends to belivgorously active in the UN and regional groups on human rights issues.

Amnesty International Report 1985 (which covers events only through the previous year and thus does not reflect changes after the return to democracy on March 1, 1985) expressed concern about the large number of political prisoners in 1984, the use in 1984 of military courts to try civilians on political charges, and the use of torture, and inhumane prison conditions. Freedom House rates Uruguay "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Uruguay had a population of 2,936 million in 1985 with a zero growth rate. The per capita gross domestic product of U.S. $1,655 continued to decline from the levels of previous years. The incidence of extreme poverty is low, although it has probably increased over the last year. Inflation was expected to top 60 percent in 1985. Unemployment has risen from less than 6 percent in 1981 to an officially estimated 14 percent in 1985. The index of real wages is currently about 48.5 percent below what it was in 1968. The vast majority of the population enjoys an adequate diet and at least a minimally acceptable standard of living.

In 1985, life expectancy at birth was 73 years and infant mortality was 26 per 1,000 live births, down slightly from last year. In 1985, 80 percent of the total population, and 96 percent of the urban population, had access to safe water. The caloric supply available for consumption in Uruguay in 1977 was 103 percent of nutritional requirements.

Uruguay had a 94 percent literacy rate in 1975, and virtually all children receive a mandatory primary school education. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio was 115 in 1982. Secondary school enrollment is relatively high, and university education is free. Male students outnumber females in higher education by only a slight margin.

URUGUAY

Uruguay has long been one of the most advanced countries in Latin America in terms of worker rights. Child labor is not permitted until after a child has obtained primary education. Children are generally not employed below the age of 15, but children of 12 or above can work with special permits from the Government. Dangerous, fatiguing or night work, apart from domestic service, cannot be performed by children under 18, and hours and pay are more strictly regulated than for adults. Children 16 or over can sue in court for payment of wages, and the right of child laborers to dispose of their own wages is mandated by law. Children working in the informal sector (street vendors, itinerant laborers and others without a permanent seat of operations) or in agrarian work are less strictly regulated and generally lower paid.

For adults, the usual basic work schedule calls for no more than an eight-hour day and 48-hour week. After one year of service, workers are entitled to 10 paid days of vacation, which increases with additional years of service. Wages must include a Christmas bonus in addition to paid vacation. Workers are at least theoretically protected by minimum wage legislation and laws regulating the health and safety of working conditions. Wages are generally determined by tripartite salary councils, which promote voluntary negotiations between employers and unions. The 47 councils, which cover all private sector activity, meet every four months.

Women in Uruguay are accorded equality before the law. They attend the National University and pursue professional careers in large numbers. Women serve on the Cabinet, in the Supreme Court, and in the diplomatic corps, including at the ambassadorial level. Although there are currently no women in Congress, several serve as alternates. Some barriers to equality still exist as a result of traditional social patterns and restricted employment opportunities. Pay is not always equal for men and women, especially for the less skilled workers in the private sector. Uruguay is a signatory of the 1948 Interamerican Convention on Political Rights for Women, but has not yet acceded to the 1953 U.N. Convention on Political Rights of Women.

VENEZUELA

Venezuela is a republic, with an active democratic multiparty system, energetic information media, strong unions, and an ardent commitment to democracy.

Venezuela has enjoyed 27 years of democracy with power passing peacefully back and forth between the two major political parties. President Jaime Lusinchi and his Accion Democratica Party took the reins of government in February 1984 from the Social Christian COPEI party, defeated in the December 1983 presidential elections.

Venezuela has a mixed economy, with a large public sector. The state-owned petroleum industry accounts for some 20 percent of the gross national product, more than any other industry. During the last few years, Venezuela has experienced economic problems resulting from a worldwide decrease in the demand for petroleum, a large foreign debt, and high government spending. Social benefits and supportive extended families have somewhat cushioned the impact of unemployment.

Human rights violations, when they occur, tend to be well publicized and investigated. Venezuela is an active participant in international human rights forums and is noted within the hemisphere as a proponent of civil liberties and democratic rule. The principal focus of human rights discussion within Venezuela is on deficiencies in the country's judicial system. Delays in the trials of detainees are frequent, and there have been allegations of improper influence in the courts. Revisions of civil and criminal law procedures and codes are slowly proceeding.

Inadequate prison conditions have been the subject of official reports, which focus on overcrowding. The prison population is reportedly double the capacity of the penal system's physical plant.

Guerrilla activity has not been a major problem since the late 1960s. There are occasional reports of small guerrilla groups in remote frontier areas, but they do not constitute a threat to Venezuela's security.

There was little change in the overall human rights situation in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Authorities do not permit or engage in unlawful or arbitrary killing for political motives. There have been instances of police and security forces shooting and killing criminal suspects on sight. Although not condoning these occurrences, the authorities have not acted effectively to stop them.

b. Disappearance

Police authorities do not abduct, secretly arrest, or hold people in clandestine confinement. The authorities have resorted to the use of checkpoints to induct young men who have evaded obligatory military service. The inductees are at times held incommunicado for a month with no word to family or friends as to their whereabouts or physical condition.

There are occasional kidnappings for ransom, especially on Venezuela's border with Colombia. Some of these may be attributable to small guerrilla groups crossing the border.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Venezuelan law prohibits the torture of prisoners; this prohibition is respected in practice. Guarantees for the integrity of the individual embodied in the Constitution are enforced.

Laws prohibiting cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are generally respected. Some infractions occur, however, because of excesses on the part of local law enforcement officials or inadequate supervision of prison guards. Prison conditions are spartan, at times very poor; many prisons are seriously overcrowded, discipline is sometimes inadequate, and violence does occur, especially in the more crowded prisons. Those responsible for such violence are not known to be punished. A contributing factor is the low educational level and limited training of many prison guards.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Habeas corpus is a right guaranteed by law and is respected. Arrested persons legally cannot be held more than eight days without formal charges. The limits are frequently exceeded, however, usually because of inefficiencies in the legal system.

According to the Attorney General's 1984 report, approximately 75 percent of the 24,000 persons in prison have not yet been brought to trial.

The case of four individuals charged with the bombing of a Cuban airliner and detained since 1976 still has not been resolved. Following a ruling finding the earlier charges defective, the case is now being retried.

The detention of undocumented foreign workers, mainly from Colombia, may have diminished as illegal immigration has declined. Once in police custody, undocumented foreign nationals are frequently held incommunicado for three to six months without trial before being deported.

There is no forced or compulsory labor; unremunerated labor is prohibited by law.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Fair trial is guaranteed by law and usually observed in practice. The accused is presumed innocent until guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Civilians charged with armed subversion are tried by military courts.

The civilian judiciary is independent but in practice is not immune from influence by the political parties. In response to the current administration's campaign against corruption, there has been increased public sensitivity to the qualifications of judges, the quality of their work and their susceptibility to outside influence. The Judicial Council, an independent body responsible for the training, nomination and disciplining of judges, actively investigates allegations of inappropriate conduct, and has taken severe disciplinary action in a number of cases. The administration is aware that further efforts are required.

There are periodic press reports regarding alleged political prisoners in Venezuela. These persons--numbering several dozens--are considered insurgents by the Government and prosecuted by the military courts where the state is under no enforceable time limit in adjudicating the cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution and laws provide safeguards against arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence. These safeguards are honored in practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Venezuela boasts a free and vigorous daily press, three nationwide television networks, a regional television station, about 156 radio stations, and numerous magazines; they are frequently highly critical of the authorities. The Government owns and operates two of the four television networks and two of the radio stations. Venezuela's print media are privately owned.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is respected. Public meetings, including those of all political parties, are held frequently, without interference. In the interest of public safety, permits are required for protest marches.

An object of "special protection" under the Constitution, labor unions are free, independent, and powerful. They have the right to strike and to bargain collectively. Unions associate with the recognized public and private international bodies in their fields. The Confederacion de Trabajadores de Venezuela, an International Confederation of Free Trade Unions affiliate, dominates organized labor in Venezuela, and has close ties to the ruling AD party. Other confederations occupy a lesser role on the labor scene, including two which are of Christian Democratic orientation and which are affiliated with the Latin American Confederation of Workers and have ties to the World Confederation of Labor.

Professional and academic associations flourish without interference.

c. Freedom of Religion

The population is overwhelmingly Roman Catholic. Most religious groups enjoy freedom of worship and are allowed to proselytize actively. A number of Protestant evangelical groups in remote areas of Venezuela are performing humanitarian as well as missionary work among the local population.

VENEZUELA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens of Venezuela generally have freedom of movement to travel within the country and abroad and to return. The one exception pertains to travel in the Amazon Region of the country, which requires a special permit for security reasons.

Venezuelans may emigrate without restriction. Citizenship can be renounced. The Constitution provides for the revocation of citizenship for naturalized citizens on specific and limited legal grounds. Recovery of nationality requires a residence period of two years for Venezuelan-born repatriates.

Venezuela has traditionally been a haven for refugees and displaced persons from many European and Latin American countries. As Venezuela does not recognize a "refugee status" for entry, refugees are given normal residence status and once within the country are expelled only for criminal activities. A special "family reunification program" exists for Cuban refugees living in Venezuela.

The Government is freely elected. As a multiparty democracy, the political process is open to all; opposition views are freely expressed and persons from the entire political spectrum contend for positions ranging from municipal council seats to the nation's presidency.

Some of the minor parties are outgrowths of former guerrilla organizations, and they currently hold about seven percent of the seats in the national legislature. Their participation in the political process is encouraged and supported by the two major centrist parties, Social Christian and Social Democrat, reflecting a widespread desire to have radical elements participate in the electoral process rather than engage in armed insurrection. These minor, mainly leftist, parties have been unable to win the electoral sympathies of voters and, as a consequence, they currently appear to be incapable of increasing their percentage of representatives in the national legislature.

Venezuela is a frequent and vocal critic of non-democratic governments in Latin America and elsewhere that commit or tolerate widespread human rights violations. It supports international human rights organizations. An Amnesty International office and the Latin American Foundation for Human Rights and Social Development operate freely in Caracas. Venezuela in 1985 was the site of several international forums dealing with the issue of human rights. Venezuela is a member of the UN Human Rights Commission.

Freedom House describes Venezuela as "free." Amnesty International's 1985 report expresses concern about the prolonged detention without judgment of civilians held under the military justice system.

VENEZUELA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In 1985, the population was 17,317,000 with a growth rate of 2.7 percent. The per capita GNP was $3840 (1983 figure).

Venezuela continued to experience economic difficulties in 1985 that required retrenchment of public sector spending and an upward adjustment of prices to reflect real costs. There was an estimated unemployment rate of 15 percent, an increase in business bankruptcies, and a considerable decrease in general purchasing power. Although the Government has sought to cushion the social effects, the poorest stratum of the population lives a marginal existence worsened by these adverse economic conditions. Despite austerity, the Government continues efforts to improve education, housing, and public health services for poorer Venezuelans. It has adopted a series of compensatory measures to offset the impact of decreased buying power on poorer workers and is actively seeking to create new jobs and combat inflation.

Life expectancy at birth is 68.5 years and the infant mortality rate is 37.3 per 1,000 live births. The ratio of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 101.6 percent in 1981. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio was 102 per cent in 1981 and the adult literacy rate was 85 percent in 1985.

The law sets a minimum age of 14 for employment, and then with certain restrictions applying. The Government establishes a minimum wage. There is an eight hour workday and a 48 hour workweek for workers over age 16. The law provides for health and safety regulation and inspection of the workplace.

The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex and accords women and children "special protection" in the workplace. Women workers receive extensive maternity leave benefits, and laws limit their amount of involuntary overtime. Women are heavily represented in many of the professions but continue to be underrepresented in the political and economic sectors and differences still exist in wage and employment opportunities. Overall there is a firm trend toward greater equality for women. Recent reforms in Venezuelan laws have been designed to promote greater economic rights for women.

Women are increasingly active in all political parties, professions, public administration, and the judiciary. About a dozen are members of the Chamber of Deputies, including one who is the assistant leader of the AD parliamentary faction and another who is a vice president of a permanent committee. Both major political parties have women members on the national executive committees.

Restrictions on property rights based on sex, religion or social status do not exist, but there are some restrictions on ownership of business property based on nationality.

EAST ASIA AND THE PACIFIC

AUSTRALIA

Australia is a longstanding multiparty parliamentary democracy operating within a federal system of government. The next federal elections must be held before March 1988.

Australia's developed industrial economy, with important mining and agricultural sectors, provides most Australians with a high per capita income. Furthermore, the Government provides assistance for the minority of relatively disadvantaged citizens. Individuals are free to hold private property, to pursue their economic interests, and to organize trade unions.

Australia has been in the forefront of those countries promoting human rights both domestically and internationally. Fundamental human rights are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. The Government makes a major effort to investigate reports of discrimination. Protection of the rights of Australia's approximately 180,000 aboriginals is a demonstrated concern of the Government, which recognizes that they are the group in Australia most disadvantaged economically and by societal discrimination, currently and historically. Aboriginal land rights remain an issue of controversy in Australia but the present federal Government is committed to some form of national legislation on the issue.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known instances of politically motivated killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There are no known instances of political disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Australian law prohibits all these practices, and this prohibition is respected.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Australian law prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and this prohibition is respected in practice. Australia has ratified and fully respects International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 105 concerning forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Australian law guarantees the right to both a fair hearing and a fair public trial with an unimpeded right of counsel. Free counsel is provided to indigents accused of crimes.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under Australian law and in practice, no search may be conducted without a judicially issued warrant. Australia is a nation of liberal political traditions and common law, and the Government does not interfere in the private lives of individuals.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

A functioning democratic political system, an effective judiciary, and an independent press combine to insure freedom of speech and the press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed in Australia. Australian law and practice afford workers great freedom to establish and to join trade unions, to choose their union representatives, to formulate union programs, and to be represented in negotiating the prevention and settlement of disputes with employers. Unions are extremely active and powerful.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is complete freedom of religion. There is no established church, and Australians are free to maintain links with coreligionists abroad. In 1985, the Government gave control of Ayers Rock, a sacred site for aboriginals, back to their complete control.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within or outside of Australia, including the right of emigration and repatriation.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Australians participate in their government by electing a two-chamber federal parliament as well as numerous state and local bodies. Voting is compulsory in general elections for Australians 18 and over.

It is the Government's policy to respond to any communication it might receive from the United Nations alleging violation of human rights in Australia. The Government also allows unimpeded access to all international and nongovernmental groups investigating supposed human rights violations.

The 1985 Amnesty International Report had no entry on Australia. Freedom House rates Australia as "free." Internally, during the 12 months from August 1984 to August 1985, the Australian Human Rights Commission investigated about 1,000 complaints under the 1985 Sex Discrimination Act, and about 400 complaints under the Human Rights Commission Act.

Internationally, Australia has been active in promoting human rights as a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission, the United Nations Working Group on Indigenous Populations, and other forums.

AUSTRALIA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Australia's 1985 population of 15,629,000 was growing at the rate of 1 percent a year. Forty percent of the Australian population is either foreign born or first generation Australian, an indication that Australian society is still rapidly evolving and is increasingly multicultural. Australia is an affluent country, enjoying one of the highest living standards in the world. In 1983 the per capita gross national product was US$11,490.

In 1985 the infant mortality rate was 8.9 per 1,000 live births while life expectancy at birth was 74.7 years. About 27.9 percent of the 1984-85 federal budget was devoted to social security and welfare. Basic food, shelter, health care, education, and social security benefits are guaranteed for the entire population, including recent immigrants.

Australia has long had a tradition that workers should be guaranteed a decent standard of living. The minimum wage is reviewed every six months by the federal Arbitration and Conciliation Commission with this in mind. A complex body of regulations and commission decisions prescribes the 40-hour (often 38) week, paid vacations, health and safety standards in the workplace, as well as other benefits, for the overwhelming majority of Australian workers. Australia is in the forefront of countries adopting regulations protecting children from dangerous or unsuitable employment.

Women comprise 38.5 percent of the Australian work force. Although women are beginning to enter jobs previously occupied only by men, they remain concentrated in a narrow range of occupations predominantly occupied by females, characterized by low pay and low status. In 1985 the Government was considering voluntary affirmative action legislation.

The Government acknowledges that the aboriginal population is the most disadvantaged group in such areas as education, housing, health, and employment. The Government has a broad range of programs aimed at providing Aboriginals services available to other Australians, plus additional services to improve their socioeconomic conditions. In 1985 the Cabinet endorsed the principles contained in the preferred model for aboriginal land rights. The Government has expressed the hope that states will implement these principles through their own legislation.

Australia has recently introduced legislation to provide a written Bill of Rights.

BRUNEI

Brunei is a small Islamic monarchy, located on the north coast of Borneo. It is predominantly Malay in population, with substantial Chinese and other minorities. A hereditary and traditional Sultanate, the country has been ruled by the same family for over 500 years. Thus, the current Sultan represents one of the oldest continuously ruling families in the world. Brunei was a British-protected state until January 1, 1984, but it had been internally self-governing since 1959 with Britain responsible for defense and external affairs.

A Constitution promulgated in 1959 provided for the first sharing of political power by the Sultan, who since independence has been advised by a Council of Ministers. However, the Constitution permits the Sultan to override the decisions of legislative and executive bodies in most instances. In elections for a legislative council in 1962, a party opposed to policies of the then Sultan won a large majority; tensions over the policy differences led in December 1962 to an armed uprising, quickly put down by British troops. The Sultan at that time invoked an article of the Constitution under which he could assume emergency powers for a period of two years; this state of emergency has been renewed every two years and is still in force. Although the Constitution is not suspended, the state of emergency allows the Sultan great latitude in ruling by orders. These orders have in effect suspended certain articles of the Constitution.

Since 1962 there have been no disturbances or agitation in Brunei. Economic factors have much to do with the general sense of well-being that prevails. Because, relative to its small population, Brunei produces substantial quantities of oil (estimated in excess of 170,000 barrels per day in 1984), it has one of the highest per capita gross domestic products (GDP) in the world. Oil revenues are sufficient to permit the Government to provide free medical care and free education (all by government scholarship abroad at the university level until this year when the first local university was opened with an initial intake of less than 200 students). A large proportion of the Malay population of working age is employed by the Government at salaries permitting a higher standard of living than that in surrounding countries. Government employees are also eligible for low-interest or no-interest loans to purchase homes, automobiles, and appliances. The only other major employer, Brunei Shell Petroleum, provides comparable benefits.

The human rights situation in Brunei in 1985 remained essentially the same as in 1984.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known instances of politically-motivated killings.

BRUNEI

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances nor evidence of persons having been abducted, secretly arrested, or clandestinely detained.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are no known instances of people having been subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no allegations or known instances of people detained, punished, or tried for expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government in 1985 or any recent year. There are, however, several detainees from the insurrection of 1962 and from the mid-70's who have not been released. Seven of the latter group were released in August and four more were freed in November. It is estimated that about six persons remain in detention without trial. Several leaders of the 1962 insurrection live abroad. They have not been sentenced to exile, a concept which does not exist in Brunei. However, they may still fear that they would be incarcerated should they return.

Brunei has applied without modification the International Labor Organization convention on forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The legal system in Brunei is in most respects derived from the British system. Those suspected of common crimes are detained, tried, and punished according to law. Lacking a senior judiciary of its own, the Brunei High Court when in session has for its Chief Justice an English judge seconded from Hong Kong. There were no known instances of interference with the judiciary by the Government in 1985 or in any other recent year.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

While the Government has considerable latitude allowing it to intrude into the privacy of individual persons, families and homes, in practice it does not do so.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

In the absence of an organized political opposition (although a political party was organized with the approval of the Government in 1985; see below), there have been no challenges to the Government which would have tested its degree of tolerance in the political arena. The single television station is government owned and consistently avoids controversial issues. There is no daily newspaper, and the single weekly newspaper also usually avoids controversial issues but quite frequently reports matters that could be embarrassing to the Government. These are sometimes attributed to foreign news media. Beginning in the latter half of 1983, the distribution in Brunei of a weekly overseas magazine was suspended. More than one article about Brunei was published just before the suspension, and it is not clear exactly what prompted the Government's action. At least one foreign journalist has been among a small number of aliens whose nonresident permits have been summarily withdrawn.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government permits the formation of associations for many kinds of private economic, recreational, or other purposes without interference, but requires their registration. In May 1985 the Government allowed establishment of the first political party since party activity ended in 1967. This, the Brunei National Democratic Party (BNDP), claimed over 3,000 members just before its official public launching on September 29. Over half of its members held government jobs, but the Government announced in late September that government employees could not attend party meetings, become members of political parties, or otherwise engage in organized political party activity. Few members of the public were attracted to the launching assembly (the local press reported that fewer than 100 attended), and the longer-term effects of the ban on party membership by government employees has yet to be seen. There have been no other known instances of government interference with party membership drives. Party officials, in conversations with the foreign press, have been outspoken about their objectives.

Formation of a labor union requires only seven persons with a common trade. Any such group has the right to request registration of its union by the Labor Department, which can refuse registration. The Labor Department says that no request for formation of a union has been denied. At present, there are only three unions registered, only one of which is believed to be active. There are no urgent labor issues in Brunei, mainly because there are only two major employers, Brunei Shell Petroleum and the Government, both of which provide substantial employee benefits. The existing unions have no political role. Unions have the right to bargain collectively and to be represented at the negotiation of any dispute. Strikes are illegal in Brunei under an Act of 1961. With government permission, unions may maintain relations with recognized international bodies.

While Islam is the official state religion of Brunei, the Constitution guarantees freedom of worship for other religions and this right is freely exercised.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement in the country or abroad for its citizens.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Under the continuing state of emergency there are no representative bodies at the national or local level. The only way in which citizens can effect changes in government is by working through appointed village headmen and district officers who meet regularly with their constituencies, and this is only at the local level.

BRUNEI

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International expressed concern about the continued detention without trial of eight persons allegedly involved in the armed uprising of December 1962. It noted that it had twice appealed to the Sultan for their release but received no reply. It also expressed concern about the continued detention of about 20 others who had been arrested for political reasons, mostly between 1975 and 1978. Freedom House rates Brunei "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Brunei's population, estimated at 232,000 in 1985 and with a growth rate of 3.7 percent, enjoyed a per capita gross national product (GNP) of $17,878 (1982 statistic). As an oil-rich state, Brunei can afford to provide the economic benefits of a modern welfare state. In the fields of health, education, and nutrition, the Government has spared little expense to assure that the needs of the population, including noncitizens, are met. The cost of food, otherwise quite high, is held down by government subsidies of the price of rice, nearly all of which is imported. The high income level of the population means that, despite high costs, the population is well-fed and, by the standards of the area and allowing for traditional preferences, well-housed. Citizens enjoy free education and medical care. In addition, civil servants, a large segment of the working population, have access to subsidized loans and a noncontributory pension program. Resident noncitizens pay only a nominal fee for medical care and can attend public schools for a reasonable fee.

Life expectancy was 73.8 years in 1985, and the infant mortality rate was 13.1 per 1,000 live births. As of 1980, 98 percent of the population had access to safe water. The calorie supply as a percentage of requirement was 114.2 according to 1977 figures. Adult literacy, based on 1981 figures, stood at 77 percent, with the primary school enrollment ratio at 122.9 percent.

Working conditions are subject to inspection by the Labor Commission on several types of occasions: routine, approximately annually; at the time of immigrant worker quota renewal; and in response to complaints. These inspections concern adherence to minimum safety and health standards and compliance with compensation plans as filed with the Labor Commission. Brunei does not have a minimum wage law, but the Labor Department determines a "prevailing wage" for each worker category. Employers are required to pay at least the prevailing wage to obtain approval for a worker quota. Theoretically, these prevailing wage rates would apply to Brunei citizens as a minimum wage as well, but in fact Brunei citizens command wages considerably above those levels. Employment of children below the age of 16 is prohibited, and below the age of 18 requires the written consent of the child's parent or guardian and approval of the Labor Commission. Other restrictions also apply, such as that women under 18 can not work at night or on offshore oil platforms. Work in excess of 48 hours requires payment of overtime. Double time must be paid for work performed on legal holidays.

BRUNEI

The status of women in Brunei appears to be substantially the same as in surrounding countries. Women are not under pressure to observe strict Muslim standards of dress and behavior, with trends in this direction reflecting personal and family conviction. Women are widely employed in the Government, primarily in clerical and secretarial positions. A few hold professional senior level positions.

The great majority of the substantial Chinese minority in Brunei are not citizens (those having no claims to other nationalities were "British-protected persons" prior to independence and are now either stateless permanent or temporary residents). Many of the Chinese are temporary residents from other countries and some of these have been here for many years. Nevertheless, the Chinese community has prospered, and most commercial activity is in Chinese hands.

BURMA

The Socialist Republic of the Union of Burma is a one-party, authoritarian state whose leaders come from a narrow elite within the military. The ruling Burma Socialist Program Party (BSPP) dominates and parallels the Government; the 1974 Constitution gives the BSPP the responsibility "to lead the state." The party is subordinate to its chairman, U Ne Win, who was commander of the army when the current regime came into power in a 1962 coup. The Government is headed by a 29-member Council of State whose chairman, U San Yu, is ex officio President of Burma. A unicameral National Assembly includes 489 members elected for 4-year terms and is the titular source of all power in the state. Though nonparty members are permitted to run for the Assembly and local "peoples' council," candidates must be approved by the BSPP.

A 1975 antismuggling law codified the wide discretionary powers of government security agencies. There are several government organizations charged with state security; in addition, each local people's council has its own security committee with block and neighborhood wardens.

Since the early 1960s, the Government has been trying to build a centrally planned economic system under an ideological program known as the "Burmese Way to Socialism." Initially the Government pursued a rigid policy of economic self-sufficiency. After encountering serious economic difficulties in the early 1970's, it has over the past decade tempered its doctrinaire socialism with some pragmatic economic measures, including greater tolerance of the private sector and acceptance of foreign grant and loan capital.

Although the State retains ultimate rights to all land and natural resources, the right to own property, alone or in association with others, is recognized by the Constitution and respected in practice.

An important contributing factor affecting the human rights situation continues to be the widespread insurgencies against the Government. Dozens of different insurgent groups, based primarily among Burma's ethnic minorities, have been fighting the Government for decades. Some of these groups are fighting for autonomy or independence and against what they perceive to be domination by ethnic Burmans, who constitute at least two-thirds of the population. The Burma Communist Party (BCP) has also been fighting for over 30 years to overthrow the Government. The BCP and many of the insurgent groups traffic in narcotics to finance their operations. Some of the groups are in effect narcotics syndicates with private armies.

There continued to be a number of serious human rights problems in Burma in 1985. Quadrennial elections of local and national-level party and government officials were held throughout the country, but authoritarian control over the political and economic system was essentially unchanged. The abuses committed by all sides in the insurgencies continued. Persons of non-Burmese ancestry continued to face elements of institutionalized discrimination.

BURMA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Although summary executions are not allowed under the Burmese judicial system, there have been credible reports that government forces have executed captured prisoners or killed suspected insurgent supporters during military operations.

There are also frequent credible reports of noncombatant deaths resulting from the fighting with the insurgents. Some insurgent groups have carried out summary executions of prisoners, opponents, and suspected informers. Attacks by insurgent groups against civilian targets increased. This included shelling towns, mining trains, kidnapping, and assassination.

There were no specific reports over the past year of people being abducted, secretly arrested, or held in clandestine detention by security forces. There is usually no attempt to conceal common criminal or political/security arrests from family members, although details about the charges may not be revealed. Some insurgent groups have resorted to abduction as a political weapon or to coerce local inhabitants into cooperation.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the Constitution provides that punishment shall not be in violation of human dignity, and the Government denies that torture or inhuman treatment is practiced, reliable reports over the years suggest that the police and other security forces use torture and psychological coercion during investigations in both common criminal and political/security cases. In addition, there are also reports of serious mistreatment of some political/security prisoners in regular prison facilities. Prison conditions are poor as a consequence of the generally low standard of living, overcrowding, low government expenditures, and limited staff. In June there were reports that Burmese army troops summarily executed several groups of captured smugglers in contested areas of the Karen state.

Insurgent groups sometimes employ death threats, beatings, and other forms of physical and mental coercion against opponents or villagers who refuse to cooperate with them.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no provision in Burmese law for a person in detention to seek a judicial determination of the legality of his detention. In cases involving national security, persons are sometimes never formally charged but held in indefinite detention without trial. The Government neither acknowledges holding political prisoners nor considers itself compelled to justify the detention or imprisonment of anyone. The number of political detainees is thought to have decreased since 1980, when there was a general amnesty. Some estimates place the current number in the hundreds.

BURMA

In common criminal cases, police may detain suspects up to 24 hours, after which a court order must be sought from competent judicial authorities. These court orders, which are renewable, authorize extensions of the detention of 14-day periods until charges are formally brought before a court. Detainees are frequently held incommunicado during the period of investigation and interrogation but are normally allowed visitors thereafter. Refugees and other stateless persons are regarded as illegal immigrants subject to arrest. If they cannot be repatriated after serving sentences for illegal entry, they may be detained indefinitely. The Government is thought to have under detention several hundred illegal immigrants from a number of Asian countries. It is reportedly willing to release those remaining if they are accepted for permanent resettlement elsewhere.

There is no statutory prohibition of forced labor in Burma's Legal Code. Civilian males in the vicinity of military operations (primarily ethnic minority populated areas) are frequently conscripted for porter duty by the Burma Army. Some of these porters are killed by mines planted by insurgents or by being caught up in military engagements. Insurgent groups also press-gang villagers as recruits or as porters.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Justice is administered by "Judges' Committees." These committees are elected from a single slate of candidates chosen by the party. Almost all judges are BSPP members, and a large number are military officers, either active or retired. Although untrained in the law, they are normally advised by professional legal officers. The legal code is residually based upon the British colonial system of law with an overlay from the present Constitution and other legal measures imposed by the present Government. The judiciary is not independent of the Government, which can influence both verdict and sentence, particularly in political/security cases.

The Constitution provides for public trials in most cases, and this practice is followed in common criminal cases. In political/security cases, special judiciary committees may be named by the Council of State. The public is normally not allowed to attend such trials.

When both common criminal and political/security cases come to trial, the burden of proof is on the prosecution, and the accused has the right to counsel. Legal counsel is provided for indigent defendants if they are faced with a possible sentence of 7 years or more. Normally, defendants can consult freely and privately with their lawyers, and defendants and their lawyers are made aware of the charges and evidence and are permitted to submit their own evidence. The verdicts of civil, security, and military courts may be appealed to the next higher court up to the Council of State.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In common criminal cases, police officials are required to have a valid search warrant or to be accompanied by a member of the local People's Council at the time of search.

BURMA

Search warrants are issued by local or state Judges' Committees. In political/security cases, security forces are not subject to judicial procedures and usually enter homes without warrants. In areas of insurgency, forced entry and warrantless searches are carried out by government security forces and rebel groups alike. It is widely believed that security personnel monitor private correspondence and telephone calls. A well-developed system of neighborhood informers reports on dissent and criticism of the Government. The State does not interfere with private religious practices. All foreign publications are subject to government scrutiny and approval prior to distribution.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are significant restrictions on freedom of speech and press in Burma. The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, expression, and publication but stipulates that the exercise of such freedoms should not be "contrary to the interest of the working people and socialism." In practice, opposition viewpoints and public criticism of the Government are not tolerated. Party members can express some views about economic problems or bureaucratic failures, but outspoken members can be disciplined or expelled. Anyone criticizing the Government's leadership in public or private is subject to arrest although muted private criticism is usually ignored.

Most mass media in Burma are government owned and operated, including television, radio, and the six national newspapers. Newspaper editors are appointed by the Ministry of Information. Editorials must be approved in advance. Journalists are subject to strict guidelines as to what can be broadcast or published, especially on domestic matters. Although subject to prior review, international news reporting is generally objective and balanced.

Criticism of government officials is not permitted, although cartoons and opinion editorials will sometimes criticize local administration indirectly. All forms of communications--domestic and imported books and periodicals, stage plays, motion pictures, and musical recordings--are subject to government control and censorship.

The Government monitors academic inquiry in the social sciences. The difficulty of obtaining scholarly publications from abroad and of communicating with foreign scholars impedes academic research although there have been modest improvements in recent years.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right of assembly and association, but only for those organizations permitted by law. In practice, most legitimate organizations are limited to the BSPP. BSPP "mass organizations" for workers, peasants, and youth have been established at every administrative level. These organizations serve primarily as vehicles for communicating national policies and implementing government programs. Opposition political groups are banned, and their members are subject to arrest. Public meetings must be sanctioned by the Government.

BURMA

There is no independent labor movement in Burma. Workers do not have the right to organize independently, to bargain collectively, or to strike. The labor force is organized into party-controlled workers' and peasants' mass organizations. Most of the leaders of these organizations are party officials, and the national leadership is made up of ranking party and government officials. For example, the workers' organization national chairman is also the Minister for Social Welfare and Labor, and the peasants' organization chairman is also the Minister for Agriculture and Forests; both are members of the party's central committee.

Labor disputes are mediated by arbitration boards composed of worker, management, and government representatives. In practice the party and the Government decide disputes. In the public sector where workers, management, and government representatives are all generally party officials, the process has little meaning. However, in the private sector this process can provide workers with a real voice. Burma is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO). Labor organizations and other professional associations are generally not permitted to maintain independent relations with international private bodies.

c. Freedom of Religion

Burma is a secular state. Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and widely observed in practice. The great majority of Burmese are Buddhist, although there are sizable Christian, Muslim, and animist minorities among minority ethnic groups. Minority religious groups are allowed to practice freely. Religious groups can and do maintain links with coreligionists in other countries, such as with the Vatican in the case of Catholics. Religious travel such as the Hajj is permitted and in some cases subsidized by the Government. Foreign religious representatives are usually allowed only tourist visas and are not permitted to preach or proselytize, although a few foreign missionaries who are longtime residents of Burma have been permitted to remain and serve their congregations. All religious organizations are required to register with the Government, and religious publications are subject to the same governmental control and censorship as other publications.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees Burmese citizens the right to live anywhere in the country. Except for limitations in areas of insurgent activity, Burmese citizens can travel freely within the country but must inform local authorities of their temporary place of residence. Noncitizens must obtain prior permission to travel.

Legal requirements and bureaucratic procedures cause long delays in obtaining passports, and the right to emigrate often is denied. Emigrants are severely limited in terms of what they are allowed to take out of the country with them. Before traveling abroad private citizens normally must reimburse the Government for their university and professional education and pay income tax in advance. Persons who retain their Burmese citizenship and who left the country legally are generally allowed to return to visit relatives. Emigrants wishing to return permanently are required to reapply for Burmese citizenship. In general, those who leave the country illegally cannot legally return.

Burma does not permit foreign refugees or displaced persons to resettle or seek safe haven within Burma. The Government treats persons claiming to be refugees as illegal immigrants to be incarcerated.

Burma has an authoritarian, one-party system in which leadership is essentially drawn from a small elite within the military officer corps.

All government institutions and other organizations in Burma are subordinate to the guidance of the ruling BSPP. The party in turn follows the leadership of Chairman U Ne Win, who has personally ruled and guided the formulation and execution of national policy for the last two decades.

Political opposition is not tolerated, and opposition political parties are illegal. The BSPP is used to mobilize popular support behind decisions of the leadership rather than as a vehicle to express individual or group opinions of the members. The party chooses a single slate of candidates for government offices. Although party nominees run unopposed, they must receive 50 percent of the vote to be elected. In a few cases, all at the lower government levels, the party nominees have not been elected. In party and governmental decisionmaking assemblies, votes are almost always unanimous. Ethnic Burmans dominate the political system although the party seeks to expand participation by Burmese ethnic minorities; women are underrepresented.

Under the 1982 citizenship law, ethnic Burmese, including indigenous minorities, enjoy advantages that are not available to immigrants and their immediate descendants. The law significantly limits the political rights of immigrants (primarily ethnic Chinese and Indian) whose parents and grandparents are not citizens.

The Burmese Government does not permit investigations of its human rights practices, nor is it willing to discuss human rights problems with outside governmental or nongovernmental organizations. The Government has permitted visits by U.N. organizations such as the ILO and the Office of the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to discuss a few specific issues. No Burmese organization, governmental or private, monitors the human rights situation in Burma. Burma does not actively participate in international or regional human rights bodies. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed its continuing concern about reports of human rights violations, including arbitrary arrests and in some instances torture, relating to ethnic minorities and the Muslim community. It also expressed concern about the practice of local civilians being impressed as porters by army personnel in areas of active military operations. Freedom House rates Burmas as "not free."

BURMA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

According to data supplied by the World Bank, Burma's population was 36,919,000 and growing at the rate of 2 percent annually. With a per capita gross national product of $180 in 1983, Burma ranks among the world's poorest nations. However, official statistics do not reflect adequately the important private/black market economy.

The country remains largely reliant on agriculture, with more than 60 percent of its labor force employed in the agricultural sector. Burma is essentially self-sufficient in food, and most Burmese maintain a marginally adequate standard of living. Partly due to decreased earnings from rice and mineral exports, Burma experienced serious economic difficulties in 1985, including a sharp decline in foreign exchange reserves. The trade deficit currently is over $300 million a year. Total foreign debt now exceeds $2 billion. Government austerity measures have had a dampening effect on development; estimates on the current economic growth rate range from 4.5 to 6.5 percent. In November the Government demonetized some denominations of Burmese currency in an apparent attempt to curb black market activity. The action initially created hardships for local residents; its impact on the economy over the longer term is uncertain. Burma receives about $450 million a year in bilateral and multilateral assistance; Japan, the largest aid donor, provides $250 million annually.

Life expectancy in 1985 was 56 years at birth, and the infant mortality rate was estimated at 89 per 1,000 live births. Calorie supply as a percentage of minimum established daily requirements was estimated at 115 in 1982. The percentage of the population with access to safe drinking water was estimated to be 21 percent in 1980. In 1978, approximately 40 percent of the population, both urban and rural, were estimated to live below an absolute poverty level.

Education in Burma is free through the university level, and the party and Government have made a major effort to improve literacy in recent years. Adult literacy rates in 1980 were estimated at 76 percent for males and 56 percent for females. The World Bank reports the primary school enrollment ratio as of 1981 was 84 percent overall: 87 percent for males and 81 percent for females.

Burma is currently in the process of revising and updating its labor laws. At present the minimum age for workers is 15. There is a 5 day, 40-hour workweek for employees in the public sector and a 6-day, 48-hour workweek for private sector employees, with overtime pay for additional work above this amount. Workers have 21 paid holidays a year, and there are numerous legal provisions to protect workers' health and safety. The minimum legal wage is about 75¢ at the official rate of exchange. In the private sector the minimum wage law applies only to cheroot-rolling plants and rice mills. The gap between legal provisions and actual conditions can vary widely, with government entities and government corporate enterprises coming closest to the legal standards. In 1984 it was reported that the Law Commission of the National Assembly had before it proposed legislation to bring Burma into conformity with ILO Conventions, 17, 62, and 87. In fact, the Commission has under consideration legislation concerning only Conventions 17 (workers' compensation) and 52 (hours of work). Because the Commission has a large backlog of work, it is not known when it might consider this legislation or send it on to the Assembly.

Women in Burma have distinct social roles, which vary with their cultural traditions and ethnic backgrounds. In general, Burmese women enjoy most of the same rights as men. They keep their own names after marriage, are active in trade, and often control family finances.

Burma's numerous ethnic minorities have their own distinct cultures and languages, and many of the minority groups have historically resisted assimilation. Economic development among minorities has lagged, and many still live at the subsistence level. This is due in part to the chronic insurgencies and geographic factors which impede economic development in rugged, isolated ethnic minority populated border areas. Minorities are underrepresented in the party and Government and are largely excluded from the military leadership. Many individuals with nonethnic Burmese ancestry, primarily Indians and Chinese, are denied full citizenship status and are not permitted to hold party or government positions but continue to play an important role in the economy.

CAMBODIA

Control of Cambodia has been contested since January 1979, when the Vietnamese army drove the Khmer Rouge Communist regime of Democratic Kampuchea out of Phnom Penh and installed its own puppet regime, the so-called People's Republic of Kampuchea, under a former Khmer Rouge division commander, Heng Samrin. Vietnam controls all major cities and towns and maintains the Heng Samrin regime in power by force of arms. This control is challenged by a three-part Khmer resistance movement, the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea, which holds Cambodia's seat at the United Nations. During the 1984-85 dry season the Vietnamese army overran all of the civilian camps and resistance bases close to the Thai border, but the resistance continues to conduct guerrilla operations throughout large parts of Cambodia.

Vietnam has attempted to develop political and economic institutions on the Vietnamese model, with power restricted to the Communist Kampuchean People's Revolutionary Party, which is dominated by the Communist Party of Vietnam. Vietnam, by highlighting the brutality of the former Khmer Rouge regime, seeks acceptance of its own military occupation while attempting to establish institutions and popular support for the Heng Samrin regime, with the declared objective of enabling the Vietnamese army to leave Cambodia by 1990.

The Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea opposing Vietnamese domination of Cambodia and contesting the authority of the Heng Samrin regime was formed in 1982 when two non-Communist resistance groups joined with the Khmer Rouge. The latter have perhaps between 30-40,000 armed men, and the non-Communists about 23,000. While in power from 1975 to 1979 the Khmer Rouge had compiled one of history's worst records of human rights violations, responsible for the deaths of probably over one million Khmer. Since its overthrow by Vietnam, the Khmer Rouge claim to have abandoned their radical ideology and policies. The Khmer Rouge leadership is attempting to gain the following of the Khmer people by public support for traditional institutions such as Buddhism and by publicizing its links with the popular former ruler, Prince Sihanouk. The Khmer Rouge formally dissolved the Communist Party of Kampuchea in 1981, and Khmer Rouge strongman Pol Pot purportedly formally "retired" to an advisory role in 1985 but the Khmer Rouge top leadership--Ieng Sary, Khieu Samphan and Son Sen--remains in place.

The Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF) with approximately 14,000 men under arms is led by former Prime Minister Son Sann and espouses government based on parliamentary ideals. The third group in the coalition, the National United Front for an Independent, Neutral, Peaceful, and Cooperative Cambodia (FUNCINPEC), with approximately 9,000 armed soldiers in its Sihanoukist National Army (ANS), is headed by Prince Norodom Sihanouk, who ruled as hereditary king and later head of state until 1970. The appeal of this organization centers on the Prince's international stature and his popularity within Cambodia.

Cambodia's economy is based on subsistence-level agriculture. Although the regime is attempting to impose a collective economic system, lack of control and administrative capacity have resulted in continued reliance on decentralized agricultural production. After seven years of Vietnamese control, Cambodian industry, reportedly consisting of some 36 operating factories and a total industrial and public sector work force of approximately 150,000, remains of marginal importance to the economy. Most other nonagricultural employment is in small family-run services or handicrafts.

During 1985 systematic violations of human rights continued. The Vietnamese and the Heng Samrin regime greatly expanded forced labor defensive work projects in support of combat operations in western Cambodia in an attempt to cut off infiltration by the resistance. As a result, there have been heavy casualties due to mines and disease.

The scope of military and paramilitary activity and associated violence by both Vietnam and the Khmer resistance groups increased in 1985. In their fight against the Vietnamese and the Heng Samrin regime, the Khmer Rouge have employed terrorist tactics, including murder and destruction of economic resources, against Khmer civilians.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Reports of political killing in the Vietnamese-controlled areas declined after an intensive Vietnamese/Heng Samrin internal security campaign against suspected opponents in mid-1983. Khmer resistance groups continue to report instances of Vietnamese and Heng Samrin officials killing suspects during interrogations. Testimony of former Heng Samrin security officials does not reveal a pattern of arbitrary killing. However, death in captivity due to torture or other mistreatment is common, according to testimony of former prisoners. These reports have been substantiated by interviews conducted in 1985 by the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights.

The number of allegations concerning the use of lethal chemicals or toxins by the Vietnamese against Cambodian resistance forces subsided in 1985. Those that were reported were fully investigated by U.S. government specialists in chemical warfare, but none of these reports were confirmed according to U.S. strict standards of proof.

The Khmer Rouge, a movement based on total control of the lives of its adherents, seems to have moderated its use of terrorist tactics in 1985. Nevertheless, civilians continue to be killed during attacks on lines of communication and other economic targets. Khmer Rouge defectors report that prisoners in Khmer Rouge jails have been killed by mines while performing forced labor. Some former Khmer Rouge believe that those deaths were intended by the Khmer Rouge. One former Khmer Rouge military officer who defected in 1985 claimed that people had been executed for marrying without permission.

Reportedly, the KPNLF conducted summary executions of a few soldiers believed to have engaged in banditry, rape, or other violent crimes near the Thai-Cambodian border. It is apparent that disaffected KPNLF troops, often deserters, and the lack of discipline in the KPNLF have resulted in criminal attacks on some Thai and Khmer refugees in the Thai-Cambodian border areas.

CAMBODIA

b. Disappearance

There have been reports that Heng Samrin security officials have been responsible for the disappearance of persons suspected of being opponents of the regime. A Heng Samrin official who defected in 1984 has reported that resistance soldiers who accept offers of amnesty from the Heng Samrin authorities frequently disappear following formal release from reeducation. The official also claimed that individuals arrested for economic violations have disappeared. Most of those who have disappeared apparently have been imprisoned, but some may have been killed.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Physical torture has been reported in both rural areas and Phnom Penh prisons. The Lawyers Committee for Human Rights reported, based on its 1984-1985 interviews, that persons suspected of resistance activity are routinely tortured in the early weeks and months of detention by Vietnamese and Heng Samrin officials. Cambodians arriving at the border in 1985 report that beatings during interrogation to uncover resistance sympathizers continue to be the most common form of mistreatment. There have also been reports of suffocation with plastic bags, burning with boiling water, deprivation of food and sleep, and degrading treatment such as removing clothing during interrogation. Psychological pressures such as the threat of indefinite confinement without trial are employed during interrogation. The Lawyers Committee reported a pattern of initial detention during which prisoners were shackled in a dark cell, interrogated, and tortured. After several months of this interrogation phase, prisoners were usually transferred to larger daylight cells, which they shared with other prisoners, and eventually to work camps prior to release. A Heng Samrin security service official who defected to the border in late 1984 reported that political prisoners in Phnom Penh were confined in isolation for up to 3 months while being interrogated by the Vietnamese military. This source claimed that criminal prisoners were frequently beaten and tortured by the interrogation bureau of the Heng Samrin police (the Ministry of Interior), but that the interrogation bureau did not torture political prisoners.

Cambodians who left Khmer Rouge control in late 1984 report that those who violate minor regulations, such as by conducting unauthorized trading, are punished by detention and forced labor. Those committing more serious offenses, such as trying to escape from Khmer Rouge control or having unauthorized contacts with foreigners, have been confined in underground cells for periods of up to 3 months or forced to work in dangerous, mine-infested areas. A number of Vietnamese prisoners who had been in Khmer Rouge hands ended up in Thailand following Vietnamese attacks on Khmer Rouge bases in early 1984. Press photographs of the Vietnamese indicated that they were close to starvation. Treatment of Vietnamese and Heng Samrin prisoners by the non-Communist resistance groups has been generally adequate.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Suspected resistance sympathizers are detained, interrogated, and often jailed for extended periods of time with neither formal charges nor pursuant to other legal procedures.

CAMBODIA

Separate sections within the Heng Samrin police are responsible for investigation of activities by the non-Communist (KPNLF and Sihanoukist) and Communist (Khmer Rouge) resistance groups. The Ministry of Interior maintains at least three prisons in Cambodia in which suspected supporters of the resistance are held without formal charges, often for more than 3 years. Provincial police and joint Vietnamese/Heng Samrin military internal security units maintain additional detention and interrogation centers. Regulations of the Heng Samrin regime call for the arrest and reeducation of "any person carrying out propaganda campaigns to sabotage internal unity and Kampuchea-Laos-Vietnam solidarity." Such reeducation means indefinite detention to force a change in political values. The 1985 Amnesty International Report expressed concern about the detention without trial of persons suspected of anti-regime activities.

There is a virtual absence of legal process for those detained. Those detained or arrested are almost never informed of the charges against them, nor are they given access to a lawyer or informed of any rights or legal protections to which they are entitled.

In Vietnamese-controlled areas, forced labor is common. The Vietnamese and the Heng Samrin regime have systematically conscripted Khmer civilians from throughout Cambodia for work on military-related projects in or near combat areas along the Thai-Cambodian border. The number of forced laborers increased to the tens of thousands in 1985 as workers were organized into paramilitary units in a massive program to construct physical obstacles against infiltration by resistance forces. The workers have suffered frequent loss of life from mines, malaria, and other diseases in the remote border areas. Foreign observers in Phnom Penh have reported that the hospitals there have been inundated with sick and injured civilians returning from the border construction projects and that malaria, including the severe and sometimes fatal cerebral variety, is spreading into previously safe areas of Cambodia. Forced participation also places the workers' lives at risk when Vietnamese or resistance military actions occur nearby.

The Khmer Rouge also require labor from all individuals under their control and prevent them from leaving, either to return to areas controlled by the Vietnamese or to join the non-Communist Khmer resistance groups. Khmer Rouge defectors in 1985 report that they were forced to carry supplies and ammunition into the interior of Cambodia in support of military operations and they claim they were punished if they failed to carry out these tasks.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Political prisoners under the Heng Samrin regime are regularly denied the right to a trial. Figures on the numbers of political prisoners in Cambodia are only rough estimates. A Ministry of Interior official who fled Cambodia in 1985 estimated that the main ministry prison in Phnom Penh (T-3) housed about 600 low-ranking former Heng Samrin officials in one section and an unknown number of other political prisoners in a separate section of the prison. A second prison, Prey Sar, reportedly holds approximately 1,000 prisoners, including many political prisoners. The Lawyers Committee estimates that political prisoners number in the thousands, and this seems to be a conservative estimate, especially if those held in provincial jails and military interrogation facilities are included.

Trials are used primarily for purposes of propaganda and public intimidation, with the verdict decided in advance. Show trials in 1980 and 1983 were intended in large part to publicize the "confessions" of the accused. There are few procedural rights for defendants. A 1982 law on the organization of courts provides the right of counsel only with prior approval of the court. The 1981 Constitution provides for public trials, but allows for closed sessions. Arrivals on the border have related little information about the workings of the Heng Samrin legal system, either in theory or practice.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Heng Samrin authorities search whenever and wherever they wish. Networks of informers report to the secret police, and Vietnamese personnel are assigned to monitor all levels of the Heng Samrin internal security apparatus. Vietnamese and Heng Samrin authorities have forced people to relocate into fortified villages in order to prevent contact with resistance forces.

The Khmer Rouge maintain strict control on the social activity of those under its control. Severe punishment may be given for acts such as marrying without permission, contacts with foreigners or listening to unauthorized radio broadcasts.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

In Heng Samrin areas the press and radio are wholly controlled by Hanoi and its client regime. Criticism of the regime is not tolerated, nor are foreign books and periodicals admitted, except those officially distributed. There have been reports of arrests for listening to foreign radio broadcasts. A similar situation exists in the Khmer Rouge camps. The non-Communist groups do not have such restrictions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The only associations permitted by the Heng Samrin regime are those for groups such as farmers, women, and youth which were created to support the regime. Organized labor is totally under the regime's control, and industries have organized branches of the official "Trade Union for National Salvation." Collective bargaining is unheard of. The Khmer Rouge do not allow associations or trade unions. The non-Communist groups encourage voluntary women's associations which have both educational and social functions.

c. Freedom of Religion

When in power in Phnom Penh, the Khmer Rouge disestablished Buddhism as the state religion, destroying temples and defrocking monks. Islam and Christianity, as "foreign" religions, were even more ruthlessly suppressed. The Heng Samrin regime has permitted the return of religious practices but has not reinstated Buddhism as a state religion.

CAMBODIA

Religious activities are closely controlled by the regime. At the second Buddhist Monks' Conference in Phnom Penh on July 4, 1984, a resolution was passed which forced Buddhism into the "two strategic tasks of the party--namely, to defend the fatherland and to build it step-by-step toward socialism through the period of transition." In general, the Heng Samrin authorities attempt to use Buddhism as one of a number of organizations for "mass mobilization," to implement party policies. Christian groups are harassed by the Heng Samrin regime. The Protestant and Roman Catholic communities in Phnom Penh are reportedly not authorized to meet. Muslims, most of whom are ethnic Chams rather than Khmer, have been encouraged by the Heng Samrin regime to renew their religious community, and Muslims have spoken out in public in support of the Heng Samrin regime and against the excesses of the former Khmer Rouge regime.

Since being driven from power, the Khmer Rouge have tried to give the impression of reform. However, defectors from the Khmer Rouge zone in 1985 report that Buddhism is still discouraged by Khmer Rouge authorities. Christianity and Islam are not known to have been revived in Khmer Rouge-controlled areas since.

Non-Communist resistance camps afford complete freedom of religion. The camps feature active Buddhist temples and often have Muslim mosques and Christian churches as well.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Heng Samrin regime tries to control tightly all travel within the areas under its authority. A system of neighborhood surveillance, modeled after the Vietnamese system, was introduced in 1981. A system requiring family registration and identification books was begun in 1980, and in 1983 the registration effort was placed under the police in each local administrative unit. Complex regulations govern movement of families and individuals within Cambodia. Passes are required for internal movement between villages. Checkpoints are ubiquitous, and bribes as well as passes are required to pass them, although checkpoints can often be dodged by avoiding roads. Only a few top Heng Samrin regime officials travel abroad. Other Khmer seeking to leave the country flee to the border to try to enter Thailand, and the Heng Samrin regime routinely imprisons those caught attempting to do so.

The Heng Samrin regime has agreed in principle to accept refugees back from camps in Thailand but has taken only a handful so far. No agreement has been reached by the Heng Samrin regime and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees [UNHCR] on the mechanics of repatriation. Thousands of Khmer have returned informally to Cambodia from the Thai border. There is no reliable information on what conditions they face if they become known to the Phnom Penh authorities, but the UNHCR does provide some limited assistance to the Heng Samrin regime for returnees. Nearly all of the Khmer allowed refugee status in Thailand have been approved for resettlement and departed for Western countries. At least 245,000 Cambodians not given refugee status (the "border Khmer") remain in camps along the Thai-Cambodian border where they are assisted by the United Nations and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

CAMBODIA

The Khmer Rouge also tightly control movement within their zone and attempt to prevent the non-Communists from operating in or crossing what they consider their "liberated areas" in Cambodia. In one 1984 instance, a group of approximately 500 Khmer escaped from Khmer Rouge control and joined a non-Communist group. Several smaller groups of Khmer Rouge escaped from Khmer Rouge control to the non-Communists in 1985. The Khmer Rouge and the non-Communist groups have accepted people back from refugee camps in Thailand.

The fundamental right of self-determination is denied to the Khmer people. The Kampuchean People's Revolutionary Party, a Communist party which acknowledges a serious shortage of members and is directed by a very small group of leaders, controls political life in the Heng Samrin regime areas. Major policies are controlled by Vietnam, and many day to day administrative decisions, especially in internal security matters, are made unilaterally by Vietnamese officials. Both Vietnam and the Heng Samrin regime have rejected any change in the system imposed following the Vietnamese invasion, calling the situation "irreversible."

Political aspirants in Heng Samrin areas must study the current political dogma, which centers on acceptance of the Vietnamese explanation for Vietnam's dominant position in Cambodia. Middle- and high-level Heng Samrin officials must attend political indoctrination courses taught by Vietnamese at political schools in Phnom Penh and in Vietnam. Relatively few Heng Samrin officials are considered reliable by the Vietnamese. Khmer with strong ties to Vietnam from before 1975 or as pre-1978 defectors from the Khmer Rouge, are afforded the highest positions of trust, followed by other former Khmer Rouge cadre, non-political "intellectuals" (including many pre-1975 school teachers), and low-ranking officials of pre-1975 governments, in that order. While attempting to build an indigenous Communist party and government structure in Cambodia, Vietnam itself maintains complete control. Elections in Heng Samrin areas do not allow genuine political participation but rather are staged by the regime to attempt to demonstrate legitimacy through voter activity, and to underscore the relative status of leaders by varying percentages of the "vote." Reports suggest that in the 1981 national elections, percentages were manipulated and some victors were named regardless of the number of votes they received. Under the Heng Samrin Constitution, the next national "election" is due in 1986, but recent Vietnamese statements suggest it may not be held until 1987.

The Khmer Rouge formally dissolved the Communist Party of Kampuchea in December 1981, but it continues in Khmer Rouge areas as a clandestine entity. In fact, the party, in which power is concentrated in the hands of fewer than 10 people, controls all political, economic, and military life in those areas. No opposition is tolerated. Although Pol Pot purportedly formally "retired" as military commander in 1985 and assumed a position of advisor on national security, defectors from the Khmer Rouge areas report that power continues to be held by the pre-1979 leadership.

The non-Communist political fronts are less disciplined and control their areas more loosely. Power is normally shared through a system of factional alliances based on personalities and the number of troops controlled.

Section 4 Governmental Attitudes Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Human rights violations in Cambodia have been the subject of intense international attention since 1978 and during the period of Khmer Rouge rule, when the United Nations Human Rights Commission and its Subcommittee on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities began investigating the problem. In February 1985 the Commission adopted the latest in a series of resolutions on Cambodia. The 1985 resolution welcomed the continued effectiveness of the Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea with Prince Sihanouk as President, reiterated its "condemnation of persistent occurrence of gross and flagrant violations of human rights in Kampuchea," and reaffirmed "that the continuing illegal occupation of Kampuchea by foreign forces deprives the people of Kampuchea from exercise of their right to self-determination and constitutes the primary violation of human rights in Kampuchea at present."

Authorities in the Heng Samrin and Khmer Rouge-controlled areas have not permitted investigation of charges of human rights violations. In late 1984 the Heng Samrin regime declined to permit the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights to visit areas it controls. The Khmer Rouge allowed two members of the Committee to visit part of the area under its control, but the Committee was not able to visit a Khmer Rouge prison or freely interview sources and the Committee's Khmer-speaking scholar was denied permission to participate in the visit. Committee members visited resistance-controlled parts of Cambodia in November 1984 and January-February 1985 and conducted in-depth interviews with over 150 people. In its report on Cambodia, the Committee concludes that, "beyond its general and pervasive control of expression and political thought, the regime has sought to stamp out opposition--both real and imagined--with a systematic practice of arbitrary arrest, brutal torture, and indefinite detention under degrading conditions, at times resulting in death. The Heng Samrin regime and the Khmer Rouge areas have Red Cross organizations, but neither they nor any other groups in those areas have a role in the protection of other rights.

The non-Communist camps along the Thai/Cambodian border have substantial daytime presence of voluntary and international organization staff who have intervened to secure better treatment of minorities, such as Vietnamese refugees among the Khmer. Also, representatives from the International Committee of the Red Cross have conducted interviews with prisoners held in KPNLF stockades.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report, expressed concern about long-term detention of political prisoners without charge or trial, reports of systematic torture and ill-treatment, and reports of the death in custody of political detainees. Freedom House rates Cambodia "not free" and, in its 1985-86 report, assigned the country its lowest ratings.

CAMBODIA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

After the years of fighting within Cambodia, statistics on the economic, social, and cultural situation are wholly unreliable. The population in 1985 is estimated to be 6.2 million, close to the 1962 census figure of 5,729,000, with a growth rate of 2.2 percent.

Cambodia is now, to an even greater extent than it was before 1970, an agricultural country. Rubber, sugar cane, and tobacco production have begun to be restored. The Vietnamese continue to attempt to integrate the economies of Laos and Cambodia with that of Vietnam, particularly the exploitation of timber, rubber, and fishing resources. There were reports that Vietnamese continued to dominate the fishing industry, especially on the Mekong River and the Tonle Sap Lake. A Heng Samrin official who defected in 1985 reported extensive transfer of resources from Cambodia to Vietnam--rice, fish, logs, maize, sesame. There have also been unconfirmed reports of diversion of international relief goods from Cambodia to Vietnam.

In rural areas, the Heng Samrin regime has instituted a system of agricultural collectivization to till the larger rice fields. Heng Samrin officials claim that 90 percent of Khmer peasants have been organized into more than 100,000 "solidarity production" teams. The Constitution permits families to occupy a small plot on which a house and garden exist. Other land is farmed collectively, although in practice most farm production is still on an individual family basis.

Earlier trends toward urbanization were reversed when the Khmer Rouge forcibly evacuated the entire urban population in 1975 with great hardship and loss of life. Since the Vietnamese invasion, urbanization has resumed, but many of the former city people, including Chinese merchants, died during the Khmer Rouge years or have since fled abroad. The embryonic Khmer entrepreneurial class faces overwhelming competition from Vietnamese who have entered commercial activities in market towns throughout Cambodia and in Phnom Penh itself.

There have been credible reports of Vietnamese immigrants taking advantage of their privileged status to force Khmer out of desirable occupations or land. Khmer arriving on the border in 1985 reported that Vietnamese pressure and commercial taxes which favor the Vietnamese are continuing to drive out Khmer and Chinese merchants. Regime Circular 351 issued in 1983 specified particular measures against ethnic Chinese who, according to the circular, are being used by enemies of the state "to engage in espionage, psychological warfare, economic warfare, and to cause turmoil in the market place." Chinese with "questionable family histories" are encouraged to volunteer to report to authorities to "clear themselves." Reports from border travelers indicate that many new Vietnamese have moved into Cambodia to join returning residents who had fled or been expelled during the Khmer Republic or Khmer Rouge periods. Most are traders or fishermen, but a large group of Vietnamese farmers have settled on rich marshland in Takeo Province.

The health, medical, and nutritional deficiencies of recent years are only slowly being overcome, and life expectancy at birth is still at a low 44.5 years. An inadequate number of Khmer medical personnel at all levels has been supplemented by foreign medical teams. Foreign teams from non-Communist countries are increasingly restricted to Phnom Penh and other cities in eastern Cambodia. Despite the presence of these teams, and a reportedly large number of Vietnamese health cadres, medical care even in the best hospitals in Cambodia is not adequate. Most Khmer have no access to medical care at all. Cambodia is subject to many kinds of tropical diseases and to an especially virulent strain of malaria. Preventive measures for mosquito-borne diseases no longer exist. The emergency relief needs that led to the massive international food relief operation beginning in 1979 have been essentially fulfilled. Vietnamese media reported in 1985 that 2.1 million tons of food (probably paddy equivalent--whereby other food grains are converted into their equivalent in paddy rice) were harvested in Cambodia in 1984-85, in contrast to 697,000 tons in 1979. Nevertheless, the nutritional situation remains precarious.

The Heng Samrin regime has tried to restore some parts of the traditional culture, reversing Khmer Rouge efforts to completely restructure the society and remold individual personality. The regime has promoted traditional music and dance and has reopened many primary schools and selected university faculties, such as medicine and dentistry. It claims a total primary and secondary school population of more than 1.8 million.

There is no known minimum age for the employment of children. Little attention has been given by authorities to ensure acceptable conditions of work, and there is little available information on this subject. Wage scales for the few industrial and government workers are set by the state.

CHINA

The People's Republic of China (PRC) is ruled by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), which sets political and economic policy and is the final arbiter of all social, cultural, and moral questions. Power within the party is shared among a small group of leaders in several key organizations, including the Politburo and its five-member Standing Committee, the Military Commission, and the Secretariat. Politburo Standing Committee member Deng Xiaoping is China's preeminent leader.

Since achieving power in 1949, the CCP has continued China's long tradition of autocratic rule, justifying it by Leninist principles and strengthening it by use of the resources available to the modern state. The leadership now also exploits the popular desire for stability resulting from the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution by equating any perceived threat to its control with a threat to social order that justifies a strong reaction. Since the late 1970's, the leadership has taken steps aimed at rejuvenating institutions ravaged by the Cultural Revolution, restoring party prestige among the population, and creating stability to facilitate economic growth. The legal system, abandoned during the Cultural Revolution, has been resurrected and is being strengthened. The authorities have promulgated many laws, including the first full-scale criminal law and criminal procedure code in the history of the People's Republic. However, the party continues to place significant restrictions on fundamental political and civil rights such as freedom of speech, the press, religion, association, and travel. The Government does not tolerate fundamental criticism of the CCP or the Socialist system, and deals swiftly and harshly with those who engage in such criticism.

China is one of the world's poorer developing countries. However, its economy has shown rapid growth in the last several years as the result of the introduction of incentives rewarding good performance. As modernization of China's economy has progressed, the leadership has repudiated more and more aspects of the Soviet economic model, the basis on which China's Socialist economy was originally structured.

The human rights situation in China improved marginally in 1985, with only some movement toward realization of the 1982 Constitution's formal guarantees of individual rights and a structure for dispersal of political power within the Government which, by implication of the preamble, remains subordinate to the party. While not relinquishing its decisionmaking power, the party has made a gesture towards broader participation in the political process through reinvigoration of the National People's Congress and the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, as well as by holding multiple-candidate elections to local representative bodies. The party has also changed Cultural Revolution policies which sought the destruction of religion in favor of a policy of limited toleration. Some growth in officially sanctioned religious activities has occurred, including return of, or compensation for, church properties, and there have been cautious contacts with foreign religious organizations.

During 1985 a campaign to "strengthen the people's concept of rights" received moderate press coverage. Training programs were established for persons engaged in legal work, and there were also programs to popularize knowledge of laws. However, significant areas of life remain basically unprotected by law.

An extensive and frequently controversial family planning program is carried on under brief provisions in the Constitution, the marriage law, and various administrative and party fiats at national, provincial, and local levels. Implementation has varied widely from place to place. Although coercive family planning is contrary to official Chinese policy, there have been numerous reliable reports of coercive birth control practices, including forced abortions and sterilizations. Another apparent result of the Government's effort to limit most families to one child has been the resort by some persons who desire a male descendant to the traditional practice of female infanticide.

An important part of China's evolution towards a less tightly controlled society is the leadership's policy of opening up to the outside world. The Government has made the promotion of foreign trade and investment an integral part of its modernization drive. Travel and emigration controls have been loosened significantly in recent years. Tens of thousands of Chinese go abroad every year to study, conduct business, or visit relatives, while millions of overseas Chinese and hundreds of thousands of other foreigners visit China. At the same time that it promotes China's opening to the outside, the party seeks to block unwelcome foreign influences. Chinese contacts with foreigners continue to be monitored by an extensive security apparatus.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

A crime suppression campaign launched in the fall of 1983 continued in 1985, although at a less intensive level. The authorities claimed that the campaign had reduced the crime rate by 30 percent, and that it would continue through 1986. During this anticrime campaign, the death penalty has been applied frequently. The great majority of the 5,000-10,000 persons estimated to have been executed since the crackdown on crime began were charged with serious nonpolitical crimes. As in 1983 and 1984, however, some of those executed in 1985 were charged with "counter-revolutionary" crimes (usually espionage).

b. Disappearance

There were no reports in 1985 of persons being abducted or disappearing permanently at the hands of the security services. There has been no information, however, regarding some of the scores of dissidents arrested in the aftermath of the Democracy Wall movement in Beijing and elsewhere in 1979, and during a crackdown on unauthorized publications in 1981.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

China's Code of Criminal Procedure specifically prohibits the use of torture. However, to indoctrinate the public and deter crime, the authorities sometimes subject persons convicted of serious crimes to public denunciation and humiliation at "mass sentencing rallies." At these rallies, often attended by thousands of people (including the families and neighbors of the accused), the accused are denounced and their sentences revealed to the crowd. Policemen force prisoners to keep their heads bowed as a mark of contrition. "Mass sentencing rallies" were rare in 1985, but at least one report spoke of a person sentenced to die at a mass rally and being led to the execution grounds afterward. Another person at the same rally was sentenced to death with sentence suspended for 2 years. In such cases, the death sentence may be commuted to life imprisonment or less if the prisoner shows good behavior.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although Chinese law details a series of procedures to be observed in the handling of suspects, including use of arrest warrants and time limits for detention during investigation and trial, these safeguards are not always honored in practice. There is no provision for preventive detention. Other guarantees in the law include the right to counsel. However, a defense attorney normally does not enter a case until after the police and procurator have finished their investigation and the defendant has been formally charged.

In July 1984 the National People's Congress (NPC) Standing Committee approved amendments extending the period of detention during investigation from 2 to 4 months and the time limit for trials from 1 1/2 to 2 1/2 months. In principle, these changes applied only to "serious" cases and required that extensions be approved by provincial procuratorates or courts. Since Standing Committee decisions in 1980 and 1981 had granted temporary authority to provinces to set their own time limits, the NPC's action represented both a return to a national standard and a probable reduction in the time limits earlier specified by the provinces. The new regulations also authorized the use of bail for accused persons not considered "dangerous," but there have been no reports about its implementation, notwithstanding claims in the Chinese press that these amendments would "promote human rights." It remained unclear how strictly they would be enforced since detainees have been held indefinitely in the past despite existing legal limits.

Sentencing to prison or labor reform usually entails participation in compulsory labor. Prison and labor reform camps are expected to be partially self-supporting if not operating at a profit.

Under "labor education" provisions, those who commit "minor theft or fraud" or who have been expelled from their work units may be deprived of their civil liberties and subjected to "education through labor" for up to 4 years without trial. This nonjudicial sentencing procedure has been used frequently against political dissidents. Judgments are handed down by a public security office in consultation with representatives of local civil affairs units. The authorities made extensive use of this provision during the initial phases of the crime suppression campaign in 1983. In 1984 they continued to transfer more serious offenders (sentenced to "reform through labor") from prisons in coastal areas to labor camps in remote areas of Xinjiang and Qinghai. Even after they complete their sentences, most of these prisoners will be denied permission to return to their homes in the East and will be expected to find employment and establish themselves as permanent residents of these underpopulated regions.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

China's judiciary is nominally independent but in practice follows party policy. Although there are presently no standing special political or security courts, the party has in the past stage-managed trials having political significance such as those involving prominent Cultural Revolution political figures.

Most Chinese trials are essentially sentencing hearings where defense representatives plead for clemency for their clients whose guilt, with very few exceptions, is not contested. The trials are preceded by extensive pretrial investigation and corroboration of testimony, and it is assumed that any person brought to trial is guilty. Defendants in criminal cases may appeal both verdicts and sentences to the next higher court. Appeals have resulted in both stiffer and reduced sentences for the accused.

The criminal procedure code requires that all trials be held in public, except those involving state secrets, juveniles, and "personal secrets." In practice, attendance at public trials requires an admission ticket obtained from organizations selected by the authorities. According to Amnesty International's 1984 special report on China, most trials of those it classifies as prisoners of conscience were held without advance notification of their families.

No reliable figures exist for the number of political prisoners in China, nor are there sufficient data to make an accurate estimate. The Government denies that it has any political prisoners and insists that it imprisons only criminals and "counter-revolutionaries." The latter group includes some who had no clear political motive in breaking the law, but whose offenses (such as jailbreak or attacks on public buildings) were nonetheless classified as "counter-revolutionary." Overall, the number of such prisoners has dropped since the late 1970's, with the "reversal of verdicts" (often initiated through extrajudicial channels) of hundreds of thousands of persons sentenced as "counter-revolutionaries" during the Cultural Revolution, and through natural attrition.

However, total inmate population in labor camps and prisons has increased since the beginning of the anticrime campaign, as tens of thousands of common criminals and persons considered socially undesirable have been processed through the courts. Estimates of outside observers on the number of labor camp inmates range from 100,000 to 10 million. Because of the large numbers released in the aftermath of the Cultural Revolution, estimates on the lower end of the scale appear more plausible.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Extensive regulation of individual and family life is one of the distinctive features of the Chinese sociopolitical system. For most Chinese (particularly urban residents), life revolves around the work unit, which provides not only employment, but also housing, ration coupons, permission to marry and have a child, and other aspects of ordinary life. The unit, along with personnel in "neighborhood committees," monitors a person's attitude and behavior and may report suspicious activity to the authorities. The unit is the party's enforcer at the local level, but its considerable autonomy may also be used to ignore or obstruct directives from the top.

Faced with one-fifth of the world's population squeezed onto 7 percent of the world's arable land, China's leaders have made family planning a top national priority. They believe that economic modernization goals will be unattainable without a low birth rate, particularly given the current high number of females of childbearing age, traditionally high Chinese birth rates, and recent medical advances leading to longer life expectancies. To achieve its goal of limiting China's population to 1.2 billion in the year 2000, the Government is discouraging early marriage and promoting as an ideal a norm of one child per family, backed by a massive, grassroots institutional effort involving education, contraceptive counseling, free contraceptive devices, and economic and social incentives and disincentives.

The authorities have instituted various controls on marriage and childbearing. The minimum age for marriage is 22 for men and 20 for women, high by world standards but lower than previous Chinese requirements. Each province sets guidelines for the desired number of children to be born during the year. For instance, in border regions and minority areas, where population densities are low, governmental control is weak and traditional attitudes strong, population growth guidelines are looser, allowing a second and sometimes third child per family. In other areas, central guidelines are often translated into rigid quotas at the unit level.

Couples who sign a pledge to have only one child get a number of incentives: free health care for the child, a 5 percent increase in their pensions, priority in housing, schooling, and medical treatment, and a monthly bonus of about $2.

Couples who insist on having a second child reportedly have the right to do so in most cases. However, in addition to losing their monthly bonus, they may be required to repay any bonuses already received, and, in some instances, give up or return other benefits as well. Women are expected to apply for permission from their unit to have a child. Although contrary to announced central government policy, significant numbers of those becoming pregnant without permission are coerced into having abortions, even in the later stages of pregnancy. Authorities have recently clarified that after the sixth month of pregnancy abortions should not be performed, unless the health of the mother is endangered. Reported instances of family planning malpractice occur for the most part in less developed rural areas, where central guidelines have sometimes been translated into rigid quotas by local officials. Chinese authorities say they take measures against local officials who violate the Government's policy in this regard, but there have been few reports of punishment of such offenders. Guidelines for local-level family planning personnel have not been made public, nor have the limits, if any, on their authority. Chinese family planning officials have reiterated that the Chinese Government does not condone forced abortions or sterilizations, but admitted that coercion, even though counter to official policy, may occur in some instances. Chinese officials have claimed that abortion ends about 25-33 percent of pregnancies. Infanticide is illegal, and the press has published cases of persons punished for infanticide.

Although contacts between Chinese and foreigners have increased considerably, the authorities closely scrutinize such association. Chinese citizens whose work does not require or permit contact with foreigners may be warned or detained and questioned if they persist in meeting foreign acquaintances. On the other hand, Chinese seem less hesitant than in the recent past to strike up conversations with foreigners. "English corners," where Chinese and foreigners can meet to talk in English, have appeared in public places. The authorities in principle permit marriages between foreigners and Chinese but specifically prohibit Chinese citizens involved in confidential and other "important" work (such as diplomats and military personnel), as well as those serving prison sentences, from marrying foreigners. In practice, romantic liaisons between Chinese citizens and foreigners are strongly discouraged.

The Criminal Procedure Code requires the use of search warrants for gathering evidence. There is no reliable information on whether this proviso is carried out in practice. There were reports several years ago of the use of electronic eavesdropping equipment to monitor suspected political dissidents.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and the press, but in practice open criticism of the CCP or Chinese socialism is not permitted. The party's policy of carefully controlling the print and broadcast media was restated in a 1985 speech by party General Secretary Hu Yaobang who said "Journalism work is the party's mouthpiece." Degrees of control vary from absolute, in the case of party organs such as the People's Daily, to "guided," for specialized publications dealing with nonpolitical topics. With party sanction, newspapers routinely publish "letters to the editor" and feature articles exposing incompetence or corruption by low- or middle-ranking officials.

In place of the earlier "spiritual pollution" campaign, by the latter part of 1985 authorities were stressing a theme of building a Socialist "spiritual civilization." This seems to be a positive attempt to build morale, encourage high standards of personal and public behavior, and avoid one-sided overemphasis on seeking personal profit. Associated with this was a crackdown on apparently widespread tabloids, smuggled pornographic publications and videotapes, and cadres who engaged in corrupt or questionable business deals, including use of false trademarks and improper use of authority or connections. A national writers' conference held in Beijing in late December 1984 promised greater creative freedom. At the conference, a CCP official criticized excessive party interference in literary affairs and said that writers must be free to choose their subjects and ways of expression, though he also made it clear that criticism of the social system would remain off-limits.

CHINA

Despite official distrust of foreign influence, the leadership has permitted greater, albeit still limited, access to various aspects of foreign culture. More foreign books and artistic works are available now than in past years, foreign films are shown more frequently, and visits by foreign artistic groups have become more common. Selected subscribers in universities and other institutions receive foreign periodicals. Tens of millions of Chinese read the Reference News, an officially controlled selection of largely uncensored translations from the foreign press. Coverage of foreign news in the open media has become more extensive and professional. Chinese listen freely to foreign broadcasts, and many universities use the Voice of American (VOA) and other foreign radio broadcasts in their language courses. Contrary to earlier practice, there is no jamming. In its weekly programming, Chinese television includes some programs from Western and other countries. Audiences in some major cities enjoy Chinese-language renditions of classical and contemporary Western plays.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees freedom of peaceful assembly and association; in practice, however, the authorities circumscribe these rights. China has a wide variety and increasing number of professional and other associations, such as the All-China Youth Federation, the All-China Women's Federation, the Chinese Writers' Association, and the All-China Sports Federation. These groups operate under party control. The authorities suppress groups which attempt to function independently.

China's trade unions are closely controlled by the CCP. The All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU) is the umbrella organization with which all trade unions must affiliate. With over 74 million members, the ACFTU enrolls about two-thirds of the urban work force. The Federation's prime function is to serve the State's interest by promoting labor discipline, enhancing labor productivity, conducting political and ideological indoctrination, and improving workers' educational and technical skills. Unions also perform a variety of social and welfare functions such as operating clubs, eating facilities, nurseries, schools, and sanatoriums. Their duties also include the promotion of workers' safety. Although government officials may consult trade union leaders on wage policy, unions have no power to engage in collective bargaining.

Chinese workers are not guaranteed the right to strike. Included in the 1978 State Constitution, this right was omitted in the 1982 revision as well as in the 1983 trade union constitution. However, a trade union spokesman said in 1983 that this omission did not necessarily mean that strikes were illegal. He then described a narrow range of circumstances (e.g., workers' safety at risk) where strikes might be permitted for a brief time. There are no known instances of strikes on these issues.

In the last several years, the ACFTU has moved actively to expand its international ties. Claiming to have contacts with trade unions in over 120 countries or regions, the Federation has stated its desire to establish links with foreign unions regardless of their affiliation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Soviet-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions, or other organizations. The ACFTU's busiest bilateral program is with the Japanese labor federations Domei and Sohyo. Since China activated its membership in the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1983, an ACFTU official has served as China's workers' delegate to that body. This representative was elected to an alternate seat on the ILO Governing Body in 1984. The ILO opened a regional office in Beijing in January 1985.

Since 1981, workers' congresses have been established in most of China's large and medium-sized enterprises. Created in principle to permit workers a role in enterprise management and selection of plant officials, the congresses have to date been largely quiescent. The October 1984 Party Plenum's decision on economic reform, while calling for "centralized and unilateral leadership" of enterprises and "strict labor discipline," also says that worker participation in management must be ensured, but no specific steps to accomplish this have yet been announced.

Reversing Cultural Revolution-era attempts to eliminate all religious practice, China's reformist leadership changed in 1978 to a policy of limited religious toleration. The Constitution guarantees freedom of religious belief and specifies that no organization or person may compel citizens to believe or disbelieve in religion or discriminate against them because of religious preference. The Constitution also provides that religious bodies must not be subject to foreign domination. Aside from these provisions, official policy forbids religious proselytizing outside places of worship or believers' homes. Earlier, unpublished regulations reportedly also limited religious freedom to those over 18, but church associations denied this in 1985.

The authorities have required all religious bodies to affiliate with eight national organizations representing four religions--Christianity, Buddhism, Islam, and Daoism. Of the five Christian associations, two are Protestant (the Protestant Three Self Movement and the China Christian Council), and three are Catholic (the Patriotic Catholic Association, the National Administrative Council of the Catholic Church, and the Catholic Bishops College). Together, these associations--with different functional responsibilities but overlapping leaderships--constitute the officially sanctioned national Protestant and Catholic Churches. Although all Protestant denominations were required to merge in the 1950's, congregations and individuals may follow preferences on such matters as forms of baptism. Since its separation from Rome 30 years ago, the Chinese Catholic Church has developed an independent theology and doctrines; for example, it rejects Papal infallibility, continues to conduct services in Latin, and supports the State's policy on birth control, provided church-approved methods are used. These five Christian associations and three organizations representing the other religions ensure that religious bodies accept the leadership of the State and party.

Within the limits of official policy, religious activities have expanded considerably in the last few years. Many religious institutions which were closed during the Cultural Revolution have reopened. In 1985 officials said there were 2,600 churches and over 20,000 mosques in service in the country. Many Buddhist and Daoist temples have reopened, often after being refurbished at government expense. In Tibet, nearly 500 Lamaistic monasteries have been restored, many with government funds--still just a fraction of the 2,700 monasteries open before the Chinese suppression of the 1959 Tibetan uprising. Similarly, only a small number of monks have returned to monastic life in Tibet, although more are being trained at a government-funded institute in Lhasa. In Sichuan a reported 550 lamaseries were reopened.

Since 1981 the authorities have permitted the establishment of seminaries to train a limited number of young people in religious orders. The Catholic Church has seven seminaries and three minor seminaries in operation. The Protestant church, apart from its national seminary in Nanjing, operates nine other theological institutes, the newest in Shanghai. In June, the Nanjing Theological Seminary held its first graduation since reopening in 1981, with 95 graduates, who will go to Protestant churches in different parts of China. The Islamic Association operates a National Theological Institute in Beijing, and another Islamic Institute opened in Ningxia in September 1985, with an initial enrollment of 20. The Buddhist Association has institutes in Beijing, Suzhou, and Nanjing, as well as Lhasa. The religious associations publish a variety of religious materials for believers, including scriptures, teaching material, theological journals, and hymnbooks. Since 1980, for example, the Protestant China Christian Council has printed and distributed over 1.3 million Bibles. Aside from appropriating funds for extensive renovation of temples, the Government provides other forms of direct and indirect financial support for religious bodies (e.g., tax exemptions for their rental income and cash subsidies to Muslims for observance of dietary law).

The number of Christians has increased since 1978, with estimates ranging from the official figure of 6 million to a more likely 10-20 million. This increase in believers has resulted in a severe shortage of places of worship, given the continued occupation of many pre-Cultural Revolution churches and temples by factories, the military, and other units. As a result, many congregations are forced to meet in believers' homes. Officials say there are 15 million actively practicing Muslims and that practitioners of Buddhism and Daoism run into the millions. Because the older generation of religious leaders is slowly dying off, and the number of recent graduates of religious training institutions is still inadequate, there is a pressing shortage of priests, ministers, monks, and imams.

Despite the greater freedom of recent years, the authorities still react harshly to unsanctioned religious activity. Some Christians prefer to worship outside the officially recognized "patriotic" church system and instead meet in unsanctioned "house churches." The public security authorities have in the past harassed these underground churches with measures including arrests in an attempt to force worshippers into an official church. In 1983, there were reports of arrests of 30 "house church" leaders in central China, 100 Christians in Henan province, and 2 ethnic Koreans active in the evangelical church movement in Shanghai. There have been no recent reports of harassment of "house church" leaders or congregations. In 1983 the NPC Standing Committee authorized the death penalty for those organizing secret sects which spread "feudal and superstitious ideas." However, this provision did not appear aimed at mainstream religious activities, but rather at traditional animist and cult practices or plain criminal activity.

Because of concern over divided loyalties, the authorities carefully monitor and control contacts between Chinese and foreign religious organizations. On the one hand, they encourage Chinese religious leaders to meet foreign counterparts and take part in international meetings. In 1985, for example, the Chinese Buddhist Association and the Indian Embassy sponsored a photo exhibition on Sakyamuni, the founder of Buddhism, in a Beijing temple, attended by 250 monks and nuns from Beijing and an Indian Buddhist delegation. In addition, a Hungarian church delegation visited Protestant churches in China. To gain support from important minority groups and create goodwill with Islamic nations, China in 1979 resumed giving permission to Muslim citizens to make the Hajj. Over 2,100 Chinese made the pilgrimage to Mecca in 1985, nearly double the 1984 figure. There are some indications that Chinese religious organizations may again be permitted to receive funds or gifts from foreign religious organizations--if no strings are attached.

On the other hand, the Government insists that the country's religious bodies must be independent of foreign control and warns against foreign attempts to interfere in Chinese religious affairs. The Government prohibits missionaries from practicing among Chinese citizens but has allowed some foreign clergymen to enter for brief periods to serve the resident foreign community. Foreigners with acknowledged ties to overseas religious institutions are permitted to work in China, often as English teachers, with the understanding that they not engage in open proselytizing of their beliefs.

The authorities' principal concern with alleged foreign interference lies with the Vatican. Relations continue to be estranged because of Rome's recognition of the Taiwan authorities as the "Republic of China" and because the officially sanctioned Chinese church does not recognize the Vatican's authority. Chinese priests who maintain their loyalty to the Pope are subject to arrest and imprisonment. The most recent case occurred in late 1983 when a provincial court sentenced the 76-year-old Bishop of Baoding, Peter Joseph Fan Xueyan, and his 70-year-old Vicar-General, Monsignor Hua Binzhang, to 10 years' imprisonment for maintaining links with the Vatican. Gong Pinmei, former Bishop of Shanghai and a prominent Catholic clergyman loyal to Rome, incarcerated since 1955, was released in July 1985.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel within China is subject to various formal and informal restrictions. Chinese citizens must have a written letter of introduction from their work unit to buy airplane tickets, secure hotel accommodations, or acquire ration coupons for purchase of basic food items in areas outside their places of residence. Those traveling by rail who plan to stay with relatives need not obtain letters of introduction but are still required to register with local police during their visits. With their higher income levels (particularly in the countryside), Chinese are traveling ever more frequently within the country, sometimes ignoring these bureaucratic requirements without much difficulty. This increased mobility prompted the authorities, out of concern for social order and public security, to announce in April 1985 the adoption of the country's first nationwide identity card system. This plan went into effect on September 6, 1985 under the auspices of the NPC Standing Committee. Local committees are working out details for eventual implementation.

Chinese citizens cannot freely change their locality of residence or workplace. They are registered as residents of a particular jurisdiction. The authorities normally grant permission to move to another locality only for a change in employment. In practice, rigid personnel policies, most notably the unwillingness of units to sanction an employee's transfer, make it difficult to change jobs. The authorities have called for and taken some steps towards reform of the personnel system, aiming at greater mobility among scientists, technicians, and certain other professionals. As part of efforts to develop commerce and industry in rural areas, the State Council issued a circular in October 1984 which authorized peasants to establish business in rural towns. Strict policies restricting rural-to-urban migration continue.

With the relaxation of controls on foreign travel and emigration since the late 1970's, tens of thousands of Chinese now go overseas every year to study, conduct business, or visit relatives. The trend toward looser controls continued in 1985. The Government announced that the number of state-financed students sent abroad would be increased by 1,000 to 4,000 in 1985. Some of the restrictions applicable to students able to secure financial support for studies abroad from nongovernmental sources were abolished. The trend towards looser controls on foreign travel notwithstanding, Chinese cannot go abroad as a matter of right. In November 1985 the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress passed the "Citizens Exit and Entry Control Law," due to go into effect February 1, 1986. The law states: "A Chinese citizen may leave, or enter, the territory without visa processing by showing a valid passport, or other valid certificates..." With some exceptions, "all applications for exit on account of personal affairs...will be approved." The law will deny exit to four categories of people--those involved in unsettled criminal or civil cases, serving sentences, placed under "education through labor," or whose exit may harm China's national security or interests. Under the law, Chinese citizens living overseas will no longer need a visa to enter China. Chinese permitted to leave the country are allowed to return. China relaxed restrictions on internal travel by foreigners in February 1985 by more than doubling the number of areas (cities and counties) open to foreign visitors without special permission. Several additional areas have been opened since then, including some suburban areas around Beijing. At present just over 100 cities or counties are open to visitors, including all of China's largest cities, and another 150-plus areas are open but require first obtaining special travel permits. Nevertheless, about 90 percent of Chinese counties and cities remain officially closed.

China does not revoke the citizenship of political dissidents. The authorities have welcomed the return for permanent residence of Chinese who had fled their homeland earlier in fear of Communist rule; such persons are also welcomed back for brief visits or to establish residence. An estimated 10 million overseas Chinese, including some political opponents and former refugees from the regime, visited China in 1984; the number of foreign visitors not of Chinese ancestry has also increased dramatically in recent years. More than 270,000 refugees and displaced persons from Vietnam and Laos have resettled in China since 1978. The number of new arrivals has dropped to around 100 per month. The authorities have also resettled over 2,000 ethnic Chinese permanent residents of the Mongolian People's Republic since 1983, after they were expelled by that country's Government. There were no known cases of forced repatriation of refugees, nor have the authorities sought to obstruct voluntary repatriation or resettlement abroad by refugees.

The CCP is the paramount source of political authority and decisionmaking in the country. Within the party, power is divided among a group of top leaders in several key organizations, including the Politburo and its five-member Standing Committee, the Military Commission, and the Secretariat. Under the doctrine of "Democratic Centralism," leaders at the top, after consultation within the party, make policy decisions which all party members are expected to support. Political debate and conflict usually take place only before a decision is made; once announced, all party members are expected to follow the party line. Nevertheless, there are means by which party members and others can debate established policies. These include the presentation of alternate points of view or criticism through thinly veiled allusions in the party-controlled press, the use of academic journals to present differing views on supposedly theoretical matters, selective enforcement of policies, exploitation of policy ambiguities, manipulation of news coverage, and informal and unpublicized debate at party and government meetings. In 1985, however, Chinese economists and political theoreticians openly debated in academic journals and a national newspaper a key national issue--the limits of economic reform. Parties or groups which oppose the CCP are forbidden.

Over the past five years, however, the CCP has promoted a modest rejuvenation of eight "democratic" parties (formed before 1949) as agents of its "United Front" policy. Admittedly subservient to the CCP, the parties function as channels through which the authorities seek to mobilize support among various constituencies the parties claim to represent: intellectuals, former industrialists, returned overseas Chinese, former KMT (Nationalist Party, the dominant party of Taiwan) military and civilian officials, and Taiwanese living on the mainland. As part of its efforts to give more visibility to these parties, the CCP increased their representation in the NPC and at the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference in 1983, and they have been allowed to reestablish party newspapers and to recruit new members. Although the CCP periodically consults with the representatives of these minor parties on important issues, the parties, whose membership totals only 120,000, and whose leaders are superannuated, have little discernible impact.

The NPC meets once a year for about two weeks to debate and approve government policies and personnel changes determined in advance by the CPP. The NPC has never rejected a government policy, although some have been modified as a result of delegates' concerns expressed behind the scenes. More important than the NPC as a whole is its Standing Committee, which meets several times a year and has the power to approve laws.

Women have scored few breakthroughs in the male-dominated political establishment. At present, none of the 20 full members of the Politburo is female (although an alternate member is female), while just three women serve among the 45 ministers and commission directors in the central Government. About 20 percent of NPC delegates are female. At present there is one female provincial governor and one female provincial party secretary.

Minority ethnic groups--who account for 6.7 percent of the population and are concentrated in border areas like Xinjiang, Tibet, Guangxi, Yunnan, and Inner Mongolia--are permitted a limited degree of autonomy. At its 1984 plenary session, the NPC adopted a national minorities law, essentially a compilation of post-Cultural Revolution policies and practices with few new departures. Like the State Constitution, the new law provides that government heads of autonomous regions, prefectures, or counties should be members of the locally prevalent minority. Although vague on the extent of political autonomy for minority areas, the law clearly sets forth their rights to enjoy and develop their own cultural traditions, use their own language, and practice their own religion. CCP policies have reportedly been designed to increase minority representation in the Government and party in minority areas to levels reflecting the minority's share of the population, and to assign senior positions to minority persons. Nevertheless, the great majority of party first secretaries in the autonomous regions as well as some other key officers are Han Chinese.

China has not been the subject of human rights investigations by official international organizations. There are no known organizations within China which monitor or comment on human rights conditions. The Chinese regard their human rights record as an internal matter, and see no justification for foreign concern about it. However, Chinese officials have been increasingly willing to meet with U.S. Government officials and members of professional groups to discuss birth control policies, and they have provided increasing amounts of information, including statistical data and visits to localities. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International noted that its principal concerns with regard to China were the extensive use of the death penalty and the continued imprisonment of prisoners of conscience. Freedom House rated China as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

One of the poorer developing countries, with a 1983 per capita gross national product (GNP) of $300 and a population of 1.04 billion, China has nonetheless experienced rapid economic growth in recent years. In 1983, national income rose by 9 percent. The official cost-of-living index rose by 2 percent in 1983, although many foreign observers believe the rate may have been closer to 10 percent. Urban employment and unemployment are a serious problem, particularly among youth. The rapid growth in the number of lower-level collectives (production units owned by employees) and of the self-employed has helped to alleviate unemployment. Together, these two categories of workers accounted for 56 percent of the 1983 increase in urban employment, although the state sector (accounting for 75 percent of the urban work force) remains dominant. The CCP announced a new "urban economic reform program" at the Central Committee's October 1984 plenum, intended to introduce market mechanisms into China's state sector. Based on the success of earlier agricultural reforms, the new reform plan envisions a relaxation of direct state control over the industrial sector, and greater reliance on small-scale collective and private enterprise in the commercial and service sectors. In theory, the State will move from direct administrative control on the Soviet-model toward a new mixture of "administrative guidance" and macroeconomic fiscal and financial signals, including tax and credit rate adjustments. Chinese leaders have emphasized that the economy will remain Socialist, but, if carried out as planned in outline, the new policies will move China towards a more decentralized economy with greater scope for market forces and individual initiative. The "urban economic reform program" would also lead to increased prices and wages as well as to increasing disparities in personal incomes, a controversial process which has already begun.

China's billion-plus people enjoy health care and nutrition at a level much higher than is typical for low-income countries. State-provided medical services are available widely at little or no cost to the user. Invalids receive public help often not provided by low-income countries. High rates of early death from rampant infectious, parasitic, and respiratory diseases, and high rates of infant mortality, have been dramatically lowered. The 1982 infant mortality rate varied from 13 per 1,000 live births in the cities to 22 per 1,000 in the countryside. Life expectancy is 68 years, above the world average. Regional variation in life expectancy ranges from 72 years in some northern and eastern cities and provinces (Beijing, Tianjin, Shanghai, and Liaoning) to 59 in the southwest (Sichuan, Guizhou, and Yunnan). China's leading causes of death now are heart disease, strokes, and cancer, the same as in high-income countries.

China's current food situation is very unusual for a low-income country, and reflects a recent break with a long historical pattern. Total food intake, in terms of both protein and calories, is above the average for middle-income countries, although the proportion of animal products in the Chinese diet remains similar to the low-income country average. From a historical situation in which food provision hovered around subsistence levels, China has made recent progress in feeding its population, due to the post-1979 surge in Chinese agricultural production. However, standards remain significantly better in urban areas than in the countryside, and better in coastal provinces than inland.

With 94 percent of eligible children enrolled in the first year of primary school, China is progressing toward its goal of universal 9 years of compulsory education by 1990. The quality of rural education, which mainly consists of primary education, lags far behind that available in the cities. Furthermore, rural primary and secondary school enrollment ratios remain low, especially in poor areas. This problem has been aggravated in recent years by decollectivization, with many rural families keeping their children out of school to work on family farms, and by rising school fees in some areas. Recent government efforts have begun to reverse this situation. However, from a high point of 46 percent in 1979, by the mid-1980's secondary school enrollment nationwide had dropped to about 30 percent, below the developing-country average of 39 percent. Only about 5 percent of high school graduates attend college. The 1982 census placed adult literates (defined as persons knowing more than 1,500 Chinese characters) at 76.9 percent of the population.

While there is no legislation which establishes a minimum age for employment, state enterprises in practice will not hire anyone who is not a high school graduate or lacks equivalent certification. Employment standards in the countryside, however, are hard to monitor and may be considerably more lax. Schools try to schedule some sort of "productive" activity as part of the curriculum, and children in rural areas often help out in farm activities. In the course of trying to universalize a system of compulsory 9 years' education, the Government is attempting to close off full-time employment opportunities (and thus the temptation to drop out of school) for those who have not finished minimum schooling. Conditions of work vary widely. In some impoverished areas, long toilsome hours do not return even a bare living, and subsidies are required for survival. There is no minimum wage law. The Government is attempting to encourage productivity in state and collective enterprises, encouraging experimentation with various incentive systems.

The Constitution endorses the principle that all citizens are equal. In the socioeconomic realm as in politics, however, women lag behind men despite progress in recent years. Female participation in the labor force has increased rapidly in recent years, reaching 36.5 percent of urban workers in 1983. Yet, women are concentrated in sectors such as light industry, where wage rates are lower. Despite increased educational opportunities, the percentage of females in school drops from 43 in primary grades to 26.2 percent of all students in universities; 70 percent of illiterates are women. Notwithstanding stiff punishment and official discouragement, selling of women and other traditional practices, such as arranged marriages and heavy dowries, continue to be reported from time to time.

Minorities have benefited from the party's more liberal programs for them, which include special treatment in marriage and family planning, employment, and university admission. Nonetheless, the standard of living of minorities--many of whom live in poor, remote areas--remains below that of most Han Chinese. Social and other discrimination against former opponents of the CCP, intellectual critics of party leadership, and former capitalists has been significantly curtailed in recent years.

The leadership's liberalization of political, economic, and social policies towards Tibet was reiterated by a February 1984 forum convened by the Secretariat. One result has been the rehabilitation of many members of former Tibetan aristocratic families, whose property is being restored, and who are given figurehead positions in the Tibetan regional government. Three representatives of the Dalai Lama visited Beijing during October and November 1984 to discuss a possible visit by the exiled spiritual leader. At the conclusion of their visit, the representatives issued a statement ruling out a 1985 visit by the Dalai Lama to Tibet, but leaving open the possibility of a trip to other parts of China, including areas where ethnic Tibetans live. These discussions took place against the background of arrests and executions in 1983 of some Tibetans, which the Dalai Lama's representatives said included political dissidents. The Chinese Government denied these allegations, saying the arrests and executions were part of a nationwide crackdown on common crime.

CHINA

TAIWAN

Taiwan's polity is dominated by the Nationalist Party (Kuomintang or KMT) in an essentially one-party authoritarian system. A vocal opposition exists, however, and enjoys a wide range of popular support, as well as some freedom of expression. The Taiwan authorities, who claim to be the government of all of China, maintain the full array of central political bodies originally established on the China mainland under the 1948 Constitution. In recent years, supplemental elections bringing in younger members have increased the vitality of these somewhat vestigial organs. The Legislative Yuan, the central legislative body, is evolving into a forum for questioning policy but still lacks power to change it.

The small and aging leadership group whose members came to Taiwan from the China mainland after World War II runs the KMT, the military, the security apparatus, and the executive bureaucracy. Political control is exercised through these bodies under a Constitution whose major democratic provisions have been circumscribed by the martial law provisions enacted in 1949. The authorities justify martial law as necessary to counter the threat of military action or subversion from the People's Republic of China (PRC). Although the people of Taiwan enjoy considerable influence in local level decisionmaking, they have little input into the major political decisions affecting them.

Throughout the past 36 years, the Taiwan authorities have promoted economic development while firmly controlling the political system to ensure stability. Although now feeling the impact of the global economic downturn, Taiwan's largely free enterprise economy in recent decades has been one of the fastest growing in the world. Taiwan's per capita gross national product (GNP) of over $3,067 ranks fourth highest in East Asia and is accompanied by high standards of education, health, and nutrition.

Political evolution has occurred on Taiwan, but it has not kept pace with economic development. Human rights are publicly endorsed but incompletely realized. Although tolerated, opposition activity is restricted. The expression and publication of political views are controlled, and opposition activities are monitored, both at home and abroad. The confrontation over the issue of press freedom that flared in 1984, when proliferating opposition publications printed a rash of articles on traditionally sensitive topics, continued in 1985. Native Taiwanese, descendants of Chinese who migrated from the mainland primarily in the 17th and 18th centuries, dominate the private economy. They now constitute 85 percent of the population but are still underrepresented at the upper levels of the ruling elite. The authorities continue gradually to recruit increasing numbers of Taiwanese to fill important economic, political, military, and security posts.

Notwithstanding the slow trend in recent years toward improvement, human rights practices in Taiwan in 1985 charted an uneven course. The rights of the work force increased significantly as enforcement provisions of the new Labor Standards Law went into effect. A revised Civil Code now affords women greater rights and protection in disputed areas of marriage and divorce. Also, the authorities admitted the involvement of some of their senior military intelligence officials in the October 1984 murder in California of a U.S.

citizen of Chinese origin, but they maintain that the crime was committed by individuals acting without the knowledge or authorization of high-level authorities. Three military intelligence officers and two gangsters were convicted in military and civil courts, respectively, and have begun serving their prison sentences.

Dissatisfaction of many in Taiwan with mainlander domination has resulted in demands for more representative government. The increasing prevalence of higher education, foreign travel, and access to news from abroad has accentuated the felt need for political development, particularly among the youth. An expanding, prosperous, and educated middle class displays a growing willingness to pressure the authorities about human rights issues.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of any killings for political reasons in Taiwan in 1985.

The Taiwan authorities maintain that their highest levels had no connection with the October 1984 murder of U.S. citizen Henry Liu in Daly City, California, and insist that the Liu murder was an act of a few misled individuals in official positions. Earlier, when investigation of the Liu murder revealed that high-ranking military intelligence officers were directly involved, the authorities suspended the head of the Intelligence Bureau of the Ministry of National Defense (IBMND), Vice Admiral Wang Hsi-ling. In April, Wang and two of his aides were convicted for their role in the murder. Wang was sentenced to life imprisonment; his aides received sentences of 2 1/2 years. However, some foreign and domestic observers at the trials claim that there are inconsistencies in the testimony and that the court's failure to pursue pertinent aspects of the case, such as the motive for the murder, has left many questions unanswered.

In recent years, there have been no substantiated reports of persons being abducted or secretly arrested by the security services.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although Taiwan law specifically prohibits the use of torture, individual members of the police or security forces are known to resort at times to physical violence in interrogating suspects.

Credible reports indicate that some Green Island Prison detainees picked up during the crackdown on crime are kept in leg irons for the first months of their unspecified period of detention and are permitted no contact with the outside world.

Taiwan's civilian prisons are severely overcrowded. According to a 1984 Ministry of Justice report, civilian prisons built to accommodate 15,983 prisoners were holding 22,908. Because of this overcrowding, prisoners are forced to share cramped living quarters and have few opportunities for work, exercise, or family visits. Even the opening of additional facilities has not provided adequate space. The massive influx of some 2,000 detainees, resulting from the authorities' crackdown on crime (which began with "Operation Clean Sweep" in 1984 and continued through 1985), has further taxed prison facilities.

In August 1985 the Ministry of Justice announced plans to build 5 new prisons over the next 6 years to accommodate 12,000 inmates. The Ministry also said that work on new sites for the Tainan and Kaohsiung detention houses is under way and is expected to be completed by April 1986.

According to a recent estimate, up to 15 percent of inmates in Taiwan prisons are serving sentences for writing bad checks. In 1984, the Legislative Yuan considered proposals which would have permitted offenders to pay fines in lieu of going to prison, a move which could have alleviated prison overcrowding. However, action on the bill is unlikely in the near term because of heightened concern about bad check writing in the wake of the 10th Credit Cooperative banking scandal in February 1985.

The security police-administered military prisons, where political prisoners are confined, are reportedly less crowded. Prisoners are said to receive the same food as soldiers and to have work and recreation opportunities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Taiwan law requires that within 24 hours after an arrest, the arresting authorities must notify in writing the individual and his designated relative or friend of the reason for his arrest or detention. The Code of Criminal Procedure, which does not apply to martial law offenses, specifies that the authorities may detain an accused person for up to 2 months during the investigation phase prior to the filing of a formal indictment, and for up to 3 months during the trial. Furthermore, during the investigation phase, the prosecuting officer may apply to the court for one extension of 2 months. The period of detention may also be extended during the trial. In recent cases, the authorities generally have followed these procedures and extended the periods of detention. Exceptions occur more frequently in the military courts. Persons indicted for relatively minor criminal offenses can, at the judge's discretion, be released on bail.

Suspects are guaranteed the right to have a lawyer present during the interrogation and investigation phases; in some cases, windows and even closed circuit cameras have been installed in police station interrogation rooms to permit lawyers and family members to view the interrogation without hearing the questioning. However, individuals arrested by the security services do not have the right to legal counsel until after they have been interrogated and formally indicted.

The police may legally arrest without a warrant anyone they suspect of committing a crime for which the punishment would be 5 years or more in prison and may call in suspects or witnesses for questioning without a formal summons. Critics in the legal establishment, the press, and elective offices point out that these powers could easily lead to abuses.

TAIWAN

In July 1985 the Legislative Yuan passed the so-called "anti-hoodlum" law, which accords police authorities broad powers, including the power to determine whether a person should be designated as a hoodlum. The civil courts confirm or deny police requests to remand "hoodlums" for reformatory education but have no authority to determine the length of such education, which may range from 1 to 5 years. Detainees can be held incommunicado, and their families need not be notified of their arrests. Some critics believe that the law may be used to repress dissent, though to date there is no evidence to suggest that the law is being applied in this manner.

Many minor crimes on Taiwan are handled under a statute which empowers the police not only to arrest but also to prosecute and punish offenders. This law sometimes has been used against political activists. The provisions of the statute empower, the police to impose and carry out sentences of up to 2 weeks' imprisonment.

Taiwan does not allow forced or compulsory labor, and there have been no reports of the practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Taiwan's legal system is based on European and Japanese models and does not provide for trial by jury. Informed observers characterize the judiciary as basically independent, although susceptible to pressure from the authorities, on whom judges depend for career advancement.

In 1985 the courts upheld plaintiffs' libel charges against opposition magazine publishers and senior editors. The defendants contend that both the lawsuits and the verdicts are politically inspired.

Under martial law, in effect since 1949, civilians who commit certain offenses, including sedition, may be tried in military courts. The authorities occasionally transfer "important" civilian cases (involving such crimes as armed robbery) to the military courts. The authorities state that the military courts' swifter and generally more severe justice acts as a deterrent to potential criminals. Sentences meted out in the military courts are reviewed only within the Ministry of National Defense.

Following the traditional Chinese pattern, in a typical criminal court case parties and witnesses are interrogated by a single judge (in high court sessions by the chief judge) but not by a lawyer or prosecutor. The judge may decline to hear witnesses or to consider evidence a party wishes to submit. Civil, but not martial law, specifically provides the defendant with protection from self-incrimination.

Court cases are generally heard through several brief court sessions often separated by weeks or months. In high court appellate proceedings new evidence may be introduced, and judicial review of district court judgments covers both fact and law. Persons convicted in cases where the sentence exceeds 3 years have the right to review by the Supreme Court. Those tried in military court do not have this right. The Supreme Court limits its review to the law of the case and to specific procedural aspects. Over one-half of all eligible cases are appealed and reviewed.

TAIWAN

The authorities deny holding political prisoners. Exact figures on the number of political prisoners are not obtainable; estimates by critics of the regime range from 130 to 256. According to the Executive Yuan (Cabinet), civilians have been tried by military courts for sedition, defined as opposition to basic policy. This includes expressing Communist sympathies, espousing views contrary to the authorities' claim to represent all of China, and supporting an independent legal status for Taiwan.

In March 1985, Ms. Lu Hsiu-lien, and in December 1985, Mr. Lin Hung-hsuan, two of eight persons convicted of sedition in 1980 for their part in the 1979 Kaohsiung Human Rights Day rally, were released on medical parole. One of the five persons still serving a sentence for his part in the rally, Shih Ming-teh, in April 1985 launched a hunger strike to protest the authorities' policies and to support his demands for implementation of democracy on Taiwan. As Shih's condition weakened, the authorities transferred him to a military hospital where he was fed intravenously. Shih ended his fast on September 1 and was moved to a prison in the Taipei area.

Conditions for most of the remaining Kaohsiung Incident prisoners reportedly have improved over the years, according to relatives. Relatives complain, however, that the prisoners continue to be denied access to regular work programs and recreational activities. They also charge that health care is inadequate. The authorities deny these charges, claiming that the curtailed activities and contact are aimed at protecting the prisoners from possible harm from other inmates and that medical care is the same for all prisoners. A key prosecution witness in the 1980 trial of the eight Kaohsiung prisoners revealed in a book published in July 1985 and banned in Taiwan that his testimony was a fabrication of the Investigative Bureau of the Ministry of Justice. The witness, Hung Chih-liang, disclosed that Investigative Bureau agents forced him to implicate opposition leader Huang Hsin-chieh and other members of the opposition. The authorities have so far refused either to review the case of the "Kaohsiung Eight" or to release those Kaohsiung prisoners still in prison, despite these charges.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The daily life of an individual not actively engaged in politics is subject only to minor interference by the authorities. The authorities impose limits on the use of the Taiwanese dialect (the mother tongue of most inhabitants on Taiwan) on television and radio. Romanized Taiwanese versions of the Bible are not permitted. The authorities do not interfere with basic family matters such as the right to marry or have children as one chooses. Membership in the KMT, the dominant political organization, is a matter of free choice.

Physical invasion of the home without a warrant is not common practice on Taiwan but does occur on occasion. As noted in Section 1.d., the Code of Criminal Procedure generally requires that searches be authorized by warrants, signed by a prosecutor or, during a trial, by a judge. However, exceptions to this rule have substantially increased following the July 1982 revision of the Code to provide for warrantless arrests under certain circumstances. When making such arrests, police may also search persons or property without prior authorization.

TAIWAN

Other types of violations of privacy, such as the monitoring of telephone calls, are believed by many to exist. The authorities deny that they monitor telephone conversations. In July 1982 the authorities instituted "selective postal checks" to intercept parcel bombs and illegal correspondence from the PRC.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press. Current martial law restrictions, however, significantly limit these rights.

Critics maintain that the security authorities monitor political expression, both in Taiwan and overseas. Individuals are not free publicly to question the regime's basic political policy of anti-Communism or its claim to sovereignty over all of China. Anyone who speaks favorably of Communism or the PRC, or questions the legitimacy of Taiwan's mainland authorities by suggesting support for "Taiwan independence," can expect to be warned and, if they do not desist, to be charged with sedition and tried in a military court. In 1985, the ruling KMT circumscribed the role of KMT legislators, particularly in interpellation sessions of the Legislative Yuan, reportedly instructing them to refrain from going beyond the area of inquiry when posing questions or expressing their own ideas in speeches or in their writing.

Credible reports suggest that Taiwan agents keep tabs on persons from Taiwan in the United States suspected of being pro-PRC or pro-Taiwan independence. The authorities deny charges that political activities of such persons residing in the United States are systematically monitored. As noted in Section 1.a., several persons, including three senior military intelligence officials, have been convicted for their involvement in the California murder of Henry Liu, a U.S. citizen journalist of Chinese origin whose writings had often been critical of Taiwan's leadership and KMT governance of Taiwan.

On September 17, 1985 the authorities arrested U.S. permanent resident and California Chinese-language newspaper publisher Lee Ya-ping, who was visiting Taiwan, on charges of sedition for publishing what the authorities claimed were views favorable to the PRC. Following a U.S. protest, the authorities announced that the charges against Lee stemmed from her propagating such views in Taiwan, not in the U.S. On September 26 a military court concluded its investigation and sentenced Lee to a period of guided probation under the terms of which she was released to the custody of her family. Lee returned to California in October.

The number of newspaper licenses is limited to 31. Nearly all are owned by the authorities, the KMT, or high KMT officials. There are, however, several smaller privately-owned and independent newspapers. Control over daily newspapers is often exercised indirectly, through guidance from the authorities' information office and the KMT. Newspapers have gradually expanded their coverage of sensitive subjects, such as news from the PRC and controversial views of U.S. citizens of Chinese origin.

TAIWAN

Censorship of publications is carried out through provisions of the publications law, which empowers the security police to seize or ban printed material which "confuses public opinion and affects the morale of the public and the armed forces." As interpreted by the authorities, this covers a wide range of topics, including articles that discuss possible leadership changes, question the legitimacy of KMT rule, criticize Taiwan's foreign policy, or merely reveal behind the scenes news that is potentially embarrassing to the leadership. In 1985 the independent newspaper Min Chung Jih Pao was suspended for 1 week for what the authorities considered to be articles favorable to the PRC.

Although the limits of acceptable criticism are not clear cut, opposition publishers generally know when an issue of their magazine is courting a ban. In addition, reporters and editors exercise a considerable degree of self-censorship. Publishers have sometimes been willing to run risks in order to test the limits and boost sales. In 1985, the financial rewards associated with brisk sales before the authorities could confiscate all issues declined as the authorities' stepped-up monitoring of both printers and newsstands resulted in full, or large-scale, confiscation of banned magazines.

By the beginning of 1985, there were 10 non-KMT weekly magazines and 1 monthly public opinion magazine. During the year, most issues of these magazines were banned. The authorities argue that the issues distorted facts and sullied the reputation of leading figures. Some magazines were suspended for 1 year but by changing the name slightly were able to publish under other previously-issued licenses. Between June and September five magazines suspended publication because confiscations resulted in circulation losses and financial problems. Also in 1985, publishers of several non-KMT magazines were sued for libel. The defendants argued that the suits and the court judgments against them were politically motivated. A document allegedly leaked by a Government Information Office employee revealed that the authorities had apparently discussed plans to harass the opposition press through various means, including libel suits.

The authorities occasionally ban books. Although the writing of pre-World War II Chinese pro-Communist authors are formally banned, a few of their famous works are obtainable.

The authorities partially or wholly own all three of the island's television stations. Nonetheless, competition among them, as well as competition with the print media, has led to a gradual expansion of the coverage of sensitive topics, both domestic and international. Public opinion has also played a role in expanding media coverage.

Foreign publications are available but are also subject to censorship. Occasionally pages carrying articles offensive to the authorities are removed or blacked out before they are distributed. Some foreign publications are available through subscription only and are not allowed to be sold on newsstands. From time to time an entire issue will be withheld from distribution.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the Constitution. In practice, however, public assembly for political purposes, except during elections, is often circumscribed by martial law provisions. During the first half of the authorized campaign period preceding elections, all candidates are allowed to hold rallies, although these are closely monitored by the authorities. During the second half, campaigning is limited to highly structured, officially sponsored rallies in which both KMT and opposition candidates participate.

The 1983 Election and Recall Law prohibits holding campaign rallies in any form prior to the authorized period. The Law also permits joint rallies of two or more candidates only at officially sponsored rallies. Opposition politicians have been sharply and openly critical of these measures, claiming they hinder their ability to reach the electorate.

The formation, purposes, and operation of labor unions are regulated in considerable detail by the Labor Union Law of 1929. Unions are supervised by the Ministry of Interior, and may be dissolved for "disturbing public peace and order." By law, an industrial or craft union must be formed in each county or municipality having more than 30 workers in an industry, enterprise, or profession. The law also mandates union membership for all workers age 16 and above in each county or municipality where an appropriate union exists. However, enforcement of the law is lax, and, according to a 1985 report, fewer than one in five Taiwan workers belongs to a union. Government employees, teachers, and defense industry workers are prohibited from forming or joining unions.

By and large, labor unions do not exercise significant economic or political influence. However, informed observers have stated that union officials serving in the Legislative Yuan played an important role in negotiating the difficult August 1984 passage of the Labor Standards Law.

Walkouts and strikes are prohibited under martial law. Collective bargaining, although provided for by legislation, does not in fact take place. Individual factory unions do, however, facilitate the resolution of disputes. It is generally believed that labor unions, especially general federations, have close ties with the ruling KMT. However, KMT control is not absolute; for example, the Chinese Federation of Labor (CFL) is on record as being critical of the ban on strikes. The CFL, Taiwan's largest federation, maintains contact with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees freedom to practice religion. This guarantee is generally observed in practice. Most Taiwan inhabitants adhere to Confucianism, Taoism, Buddhism, animism, or a combination of these beliefs. Other religions include Christianity and Islam. There is no state or favored religion. Some marginal Buddhist sects and the Unification Church have been banned in response to parents' complaints that these groups were exercising a corrupting influence on Taiwan youth.

While generally respecting the right to practice religion, the authorities have brought pressure to bear against religious organizations they consider to be involved in unacceptable political activity. The Presbyterian Church in Taiwan (PCT), whose approximately 190,000 membership is predominantly

Taiwanese, has been a prime target. An October 1985 statement issued at the conclusion of an interchurch consultation convened by the PCT, and attended by foreign delegations from Christian churches, confirmed support for earlier PCT statements critical of the authorities' policies on national affairs and human rights. The statement also expressed the PCT's concern over "the difficulties facing the original residents of Taiwan" and appealed for a joint effort to protect their dignity and human rights.

Kaohsiung County authorities have been involved since 1980 in a dispute with a denomination called the New Testament Church over the right of church members to settle on a tract of leased public land near Kaohsiung, in southern Taiwan. In 1985 county authorities continued to harass church officials and followers who were evicted from the tract and to press charges against them, leading to further accusations by the church of religious persecution. County authorities contend that the church violated the terms of the lease.

During 1985, the authorities announced plans to resubmit a revised draft of the "Law for the Protection of Religions" as part of the fiscal 1986 legislative program. This would mark the fourth submission of the law since 1979. Each time, strong opposition from all church groups on Taiwan induced the authorities to withdraw the draft. Critics note that past drafts give the authorities the right to review the appointments of church officials, to ensure that religious doctrines conform to "basic national policy," and to require foreign religious missions to pledge not to engage in nonreligious activities. The authorities argue that the law's regulatory powers are necessary to ensure that religious activities do not jeopardize Taiwan's "national security." They have, however, declared that they will consult with representatives of Taiwan's various religious denominations before submitting the new draft for legislative approval.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for the freedom to change residence, but registration of one's residence is required. Except for military and other restricted areas, there is general freedom of internal travel in Taiwan. Emigration and private travel abroad have become freer since 1979. In 1984, 750,000 Taiwan residents went abroad for tourism. Since 1980 businessmen have been permitted to travel to, and do business directly with, certain Eastern European countries. Although travel to the PRC is officially prohibited, the authorities often overlook some discreet travel to the mainland. After the last calendar day of the year in which they turn 15, males may not leave Taiwan until completion of compulsory military service. Permission to leave Taiwan may be delayed or withheld by police denial of an exit permit. Although in the past outspoken critics have been denied exit permits, in recent years a number of persons openly critical of the KMT have been permitted to travel overseas.

In general, the authorities recognize the right of those Chinese who hold Taiwan passports, and who normally reside in Taiwan, to return from abroad. Those issued "overseas Chinese" passports do not automatically have the right to travel to Taiwan for permanent residence. In principle, Taiwan will not authorize the entry of Chinese between the ages of 16 and 75, even those who have long held Taiwan passports, if they have lived in Communist-controlled areas within the preceding 5 years.

A 1984 law authorizes the authorities to detain or revoke the Taiwan passport of persons whose behavior violates the interests of Taiwan, or endangers security, public order, tradition, or Taiwan's economic interests. Critics of the law claim that it gives the authorities the power to revoke the passport of any person who makes remarks overseas that are deemed inimical to Taiwan's interests. This, they argue, places undue restriction on the opposition's right to travel and to make its views known outside Taiwan. However, there have been no reports of the law having been used in this way during 1985. The authorities say the measure is necessary to curb the activities of economic criminals--tax evaders, persons engaged in illicit activities, and those who have left large debts behind in Taiwan.

Under Taiwan's "Orderly Departure Family Reunification Program," since 1977 more than 5,500 ethnic Chinese from Indochina have been resettled on Taiwan and nearly 2,000 persons who arrived from Indochina by small boats have been granted "temporary" refuge. With the exception of 58 who found sponsors and resettled on Taiwan, all of those arriving by small boats have been resettled in third countries. Ninety are currently awaiting resettlement. The authorities report that there have been no refugee cases from non-Communist areas. They advise that any such instances would be dealt with on a case-by-case basis. Refugees are not forced to return to their country of origin.

Effective political power resides with the aging KMT leadership which fled the mainland in 1949. Reflecting their claim to be the government of all of China, the authorities maintain not only a provincial and local government system, but also an array of political bodies identical to those found on the mainland prior to 1949. The locus of power on Taiwan is the Presidency, the Executive Yuan, and the KMT Central Standing Committee. This power is exercised by a small number of top figures in these organizations, particularly by the President. Although the number of Taiwanese in the Cabinet and the Central Standing Committee has been gradually increasing, they do not wield significant power within these bodies. Hence, although Taiwanese hold a number of high positions including those of Vice President, Vice Premier, Ministers, Governor of Taiwan, and mayors of Taipei and Kaohsiung, their power individually, and even their collective influence, is limited. However, as representatives of the majority population, their views form an important consideration as the leadership decides on major policies. Taiwanese have greater effective power at the local level, where they hold most of the executive and KMT party positions.

The most important elective bodies at the central level are the National Assembly, which convenes every 6 years to elect the President and Vice President, and the Legislative Yuan, which is the Parliament. There have been no general elections to these two bodies since 1948. Surviving mainland representatives elected in 1948 continue to hold their seats and to form the bulk of these bodies' memberships. Since 1969, periodic "supplementary elections" have been held to choose additional representatives from Taiwan province and the offshore islands (which are considered part of Fukien province). Nevertheless, only 989 out of 2,691 seats of the National Assembly are currently filled, including 75 supplemental members. Of the Legislative Yuan's current membership of 760, the supplemental legislators number 71 and constitute the most active group, due largely to the advanced age and incapacity of those elected 37 years ago on the mainland.

The nature of the elective bodies continued to spark calls by both opposition and KMT politicians, academicians, journalists, and legal experts for more representative institutions. The authorities are extremely reluctant to adopt any measures that might undercut the mandates of those parliamentarians who were elected on the mainland in the late 1940's, as to do so could call into question the authorities' claim that these bodies represent all of China. In 1985 the National Assembly did not endorse any proposals to fill the vacancies. Leaving vacancies open increases the proportion and influence of the elected supplemental members.

The central authorities appoint the Taiwan Provincial Governor and the mayors of Taipei and Kaohsiung. Elections for the Provincial Assembly and county and other municipal level offices have been held regularly since 1950. The November 16, 1985 election for county and city offices and the Taiwan Provincial Assembly was, in general, considered fair, within the strictures laid down by the authorities for the conduct of elections on Taiwan. Universal suffrage exists for citizens 20 years of age and over. Voting is voluntary and by secret ballot; voter turnout runs over 70 percent.

One party, the KMT, dominates Taiwan, as it has since 1945. There are also two miniscule, nominally independent parties which came from the mainland. Although the KMT's structure and control mechanisms are based on Soviet models, the party's operations are considerably more flexible. Party organs exist at all levels of the ruling structure, as well as in the military, schools, and other public institutions. People who arrived from the mainland after 1945 dominate the highest echelons of the KMT. Taiwanese predominate at local levels and are playing an increasingly important role in the middle and higher levels. Taiwanese comprise more than 60 percent of the KMT's total membership of approximately 2 million, and 66 of the 71 elected supplemental members in the Legislative Yuan are Taiwanese.

In the 1983 Legislative Yuan elections, the KMT won slightly over two-thirds of the vote and 61 seats. The opposition and independents won six and four seats respectively. The role of the opposition is greater than its small numbers might indicate. Opposition members are very vocal in elective bodies and frequently use interpellation sessions to raise controversial or sensitive issues.

New political parties are forbidden under martial law. Candidates who oppose the KMT in elections run as "outside the party" (dangwai) candidates. Although not permitted to form a party, the dangwai politicians organize "campaign assistance groups" to contest elections.

Dangwai candidates face several disadvantages in the election process. The 1980 election law forbids the participation of students, formerly a prime source of campaign workers, and limits the campaign period before an election, i.e., 15 days for National Assembly and Legislative Yuan elections, and 10 days for local, county, and provincial elections. The revised election and recall law enacted in June 1983 abolished joint rallies and pre-campaign "get-togethers," campaign tactics favored by the opposition. The law also placed ceilings on campaign expenditures, political contributions, and the quantity of campaign paraphernalia. The opposition argues that these provisions further reduce its ability to compete with well-financed, well-organized KMT candidates and hinder contact with the electorate. Opposition politicians label as ineffective the newly adopted provisions penalizing candidates for vote-buying and bribery. Press self-censorship and banning result in less publicity for the views of the opposition, which further handicaps dangwai candidates.

The 1983 revisions of the election law also changed the method of indirect election of members of the Control Yuan (which exercises powers of impeachment, censure, and audit). Under revised election procedures, electors (members of the Provincial Assembly and various county and city councils) must cast their two mandatory votes for two separate candidates, thereby making it impossible for opposition members to pool their limited votes behind one candidate.

In past years, the Taiwan authorities have occasionally permitted representatives of international human rights organizations and private individuals interested in human rights issues to meet with appropriate officials and individuals.

The nominally nongovernmental Chinese Human Rights Association, a strongly anti-Communist organization that originally focused its attention on human rights questions in the PRC, is devoting more of its efforts to human rights on Taiwan. The association has sponsored tours for lawmakers and legal experts to examine Taiwan's crowded prisons and has established a free legal aid service. In 1984, the association strongly urged the authorities to release all remaining prisoners at the Green Island Military Prison who have served 30-year sentences. The association also acted as one of the mediators in efforts to resolve the hunger strike by Kaohsiung Incident prisoner Shih Ming-teh.

In December 1984 a group of opposition lawyers, parliamentarians, scholars, and doctors established the "Taiwan Human Rights Association (THRA)". The authorities have stated that the THRA cannot be officially recognized because it has not been registered in accordance with the "Law Governing the Organization of Civic Bodies During the Extraordinary Period." This law permits the registration of only one association per organizational function. The authorities have noted that the Chinese Human Rights Association already has been registered and, therefore, a second human rights organization may not legally be established. THRA sponsors argue that the civic bodies law is unconstitutional because it was promulgated before the Constitution was adopted. This issue has not been resolved, and to date the THRA has neither been registered nor disbanded.

TAIWAN

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International stated that it was continuing to appeal for the release of 23 prisoners of conscience, that it was investigating the cases of some 70 other political prisoners, and that it was concerned about reports of torture and ill-treatment of several prisoners detained on criminal charges. Freedom House rates Taiwan "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Taiwan's population in July 1985 was 19.1 million with a growth rate of 1.4 percent. Taiwan has one of the strongest economies in Asia. With the global economic downturn, growth began to slow in 1985, but Taiwan's GNP ($3,067 per capita in 1984) was still projected to grow 5 percent in 1985. Economic benefits are widely distributed among the population as a whole, and most basic needs are met.

Prospects for Taiwan's continued economic well-being are good as the authorities work to shift the focus of Taiwan's export-based economy from labor-intensive to high-technology industries. Official unemployment in 1984 averaged 2.4 percent. However, unemployment has been increasing in recent months, and the official rate rose to 4.1 percent in August 1985. Some estimate that actual unemployment is about double the official rate, and underemployment even higher.

Taiwan's fiscal 1985 budget allocated more than 30 percent of expenditures to education, science, culture, and social programs. Taiwan has developed an effective public health program. It consists of a health clinic system throughout the island that comprises more than 11,000 medical care facilities. In 1984, for every 10,000 persons, Taiwan had 7.9 practicing physicians, 9.0 practicing nurses, and 32.5 hospital beds. Health promotion programs include maternal and child disease control and environmental sanitation. The infant mortality rate for 1985 was 19.9 per 1,000 live births. Major epidemic disease has been reduced, although limited outbreaks still occur. Safe water is accessible to 77.6 percent of the population. Because of these public health programs and a generally good diet (1985 per capita average daily caloric intake was 2,818, the highest in Asia), life expectancy at birth has increased to 70 years for men and 75 years for women. Although successful birth control efforts have brought the population growth rate down, Taiwan has a population density of 528 per square kilometer, the second highest in the world, and the authorities remain concerned about increasing population pressures.

Education is a primary concern of the authorities and the population in general. Of the population over age six, 91.2 percent is literate. Of school-age children, 99.8 percent are currently in school. Free, compulsory education is available through junior high school. About 70 percent of junior high school graduates pass examinations and enter 3-year senior high and vocational school programs. Entry into Taiwan's extensive system of higher education is also based on competitive examinations, and departures from a strict merit system are almost nonexistent. In 1984, more than 17 percent of college-age youths (18-24 years) were enrolled in undergraduate or graduate programs.

The 1984 Labor Standards Law in principle provides for improved protection of workers' welfare. According to the Ministry of Interior, which is responsible for enforcing the law, the law is applicable to about 4 million of Taiwan's 7.5 million workers, mostly blue-collar workers or those who work in public utilities, transportation, and communications. The 1984 Law improved protection for female and child workers. The definition of child worker was raised from a person under 14 years to one between the ages of 15 and 16, who can be employed without special permission but for whom the law requires special working conditions (the Labor Standards Law prohibits the employment of anyone under age 15 unless that person has graduated from junior high school or has obtained special permission to work). Women generally earn 40-50 percent less than men and, although the law now prohibits sex discrimination, there is little to suggest that women will challenge the status quo. The law also covers working hours--Taiwan's workweek is generally 6 days, though many companies only work a half day on Saturday--and requires employers to give workers annual leave, although these provisions have not yet been fully implemented. Taiwan's official minimum wage was raised in July 1984 to $154 per month.

Under the law, firms with more than 30 workers must have rules of work approved by the central authorities and posted at the work site. A major feature of the 1984 law is that now individuals, not just corporations, can be punished for violations. The same work rules apply to Taiwan's free trade zones.

Enforcement of safety and health standards is frequently weak. Over 95 percent of Taiwan's businesses are small, family-owned firms which largely employ relatives and friends, who are often reluctant to report violations of labor and safety regulations. Much of Taiwan's mining industry is to be phased out over the next several years due to inadequate safety and low profitability, with displaced workers retrained for other occupations.

The few laws which discriminate against women relate mostly to divorce issues and inheritance. A revised Civil Code passed by the Legislative Yuan in March 1985 provides for more equal treatment of women in the areas of marriage and divorce. In recent years women have taken an increasingly active role in local politics and have been increasingly successful votegetters. Election regulations ensure that women hold a minimum of 20 percent of elected offices at both the central and local levels. Enrollment of women over 18 years of age in institutions of higher learning has increased during the past 30 years from 1,750 students in 1953 (0.3 percent of the total number of students enrolled) to 131,297 students in 1983 (9.7 percent of the total number of students enrolled). A fledgling women's rights movement is growing slowly.

Taiwan's only nonethnic Chinese minority group consists of descendants of Malayo-Polynesians who were already established in Taiwan when the first Chinese settlers arrived. These aboriginal people comprise slightly more than 1 percent of Taiwan's total population. There is no official policy of discrimination against them, but the barriers created by de facto cultural and economic discrimination are frequently difficult to surmount, and thus aboriginal "mountain people" occupy the bottom rungs of Taiwan's socioeconomic ladder. Specially designated seats in both central and provincial legislative bodies are reserved for aborigine representatives, and the authorities have instituted a number of social programs to ease the aborigines' transition into the dominant Chinese society.

FIJI

Fiji is a multiracial society of 700,000 citizens made up of indigenous Melanesians/Polynesians (43.4 percent), ethnic Indians (51 percent), and European, Chinese, and other Pacific Islanders (5.6 percent). It has a bicameral parliamentary system inherited from the British colonial period which ended in 1970. Its Constitution provides safeguards to protect traditional communal social systems, including land tenure rights of the indigenous Fijians.

The individual civil and political rights of Fiji's citizens are protected by law, a court system which functions effectively and rapidly, a free press, free democratic elections, and a government which supports cultural diversity. Basic human rights such as free association and the right to own private property are enshrined in law and observed in practice.

Fiji is a developing country whose main industries are sugar refining and tourism. Industrial development is proceeding primarily through the expansion of light manufacturing.

During 1985 Fiji continued its excellent human rights performance.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Politically motivated killing by the Government or opposition political organizations is unknown.

b. Disappearance

There were no disappearances in 1985 nor was there any evidence of people being abducted, secretly arrested, or clandestinely detained.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture, prohibited by law under the Constitution, is not practiced. Cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is illegal and neither condoned nor practiced. There are no summary executions. Treatment of prisoners is impartial and humane. In addition to constitutional prohibitions, Legal Notice No. 51 contains specific regulations on treatment, visiting rights, clothing, etc., which are respected in practice. Prisons remain overcrowded, but prisoners can serve their time and live outside the prison environment for the last 12 months of sentence and for any sentence of 12 months or less. Legislation also allows gainful employment, in addition to commitment to perform public work, while serving extramural sentences. Public defenders are available, and the Fiji Red Cross has access to detainees.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Habeas corpus exists and is honored in practice, and there is no preventive detention. In addition to constitutional safeguards, Legal Notice No. 14 establishes detailed rules to be followed by the police during arrests. A suspect can be held no more than 24 hours without charge following arrest. Exile is not practiced.

Fiji does not permit the use of forced or compulsory labor and there have been no reports of either practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Public trial is guaranteed by law and honored in practice. Defendants are entitled to counsel, and counselors have free access to defendants. Defendants are made fully aware of the charges brought against them, and they and their lawyers have access to the evidence upon which charges are based. Fiji's courts are independent of executive or military control. There are no special courts and civilians are not tried by military courts.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home is respected. Warrants issued by a magistrate are required for officials to enter a private residence. There is no arbitrary intrusion by the state or political organizations into the private life of the individual.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are guaranteed by the Constitution and observed in practice. The press is free and private and not censored or controlled by the Government. However, Fiji inherited an ordinance from the Colonial Administration which allows the Government to order a correction in the press if the Government believes it has been misrepresented. This ordinance, though very seldom used, is resented by the press since it requires giving equal space and equal placement to the Government's statement. There is no interference with academic inquiry.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no impediments to assembly or to freedom of association, although an ordinance requires obtaining a permit one week in advance of any picketing or public demonstration.

Fiji has an active trade union movement, recognized by the Government, which has the right to organize, strike, bargain collectively, and lobby. Fiji's 50 trade unions have about 45,000 members. Unions must give a 28-day notice of intent before going out on strike in the public sector. Fiji's largest trade union confederation is associated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and participates in conferences of the International Labor Organization.

c. Freedom of Religion

All religions are tolerated and allowed to practice freely. There is no dominant religion in Fiji, nor is any singled out for discrimination. Evangelical religions are free to seek converts and actively do so.

FIJI

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

All Fiji citizens are free to travel anywhere within the country and abroad. There are no restrictions on repatriation. There are no displaced persons in Fiji.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Fiji's political structure is designed to accommodate the special interests of the ethnic Fijians and of the ethnic Indian community. Election to the House of Representatives is on the basis of communal and national rolls. House elections are free and democratic, and many parties contest the seats. In Fiji's most recent national elections, 84.4 percent of the voting-age population participated. Members of the Senate are appointed by the Fiji Council of Chiefs, the Prime Minister, and the leader of the opposition.

Fiji's court system has tried, and in some cases convicted, persons charged with voting fraud, including a member of the governing party.

There have been no reported allegations of human rights violations by the Fiji Government nor any known requests for investigations. Fiji's Ombudsman investigates complaints against the Government while maintaining the confidentiality of the complainant. A free, independent, and competitive press also serves as a watchdog for human rights. There are no adverse consequences associated with actions of either of these institutions. The 1985 Amnesty International Report did not contain an entry on Fiji. Freedom House rates it as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In 1985 Fiji's population was 700,000 and the growth rate 2 percent. The economy is divided between a subsistence agriculture and a cash-based economy, the former characteristic of the outlying islands and the latter typical of the group's two main islands. Although the per capita gross national product is relatively high for a developing nation at $1,790 (World Bank figures for 1983), the country's wealth is not evenly distributed between the urban and rural sectors. In 1985, 30 percent of the rural population fell below the absolute poverty level. Fiji seeks to increase economic opportunities through regional planning and economic incentives. Its most recent development plans have called for increased attention to agriculture and rural development programs and the commitment of resources to improve housing, nutrition, health services, and education in the rural areas.

Health care has been expanded with an emphasis on preventive medicine. Fiji's infant mortality rate declined from 36.6 per 1,000 in 1982 to 23.1 in 1985. Life expectancy at birth is 66.96. The percentage of the population with access to safe water has risen dramatically in the last decade. In 1980 statistics showed 77 percent of the population had access to safe water (94 percent urban, 66 percent rural). Fiji's rich soil and tropical climate combine to give its people an adequate diet. The ratio of calorie supply relative to nutritional requirements was estimated by the World Bank at 131 percent in the 1980-1982 period.

Three-quarters of the population are literate. Almost all Fijians are bilingual in English and either Fijian or Hindustani. Virtually all primary-age children are enrolled in school, as are 90 percent of secondary school-age children. The total primary school enrollment ratio in 1981 was 116.05 (117.73 male, 115.93 female).

Worker rights in Fiji are protected under several pieces of industrial legislation. No child under age 12 may be employed in any capacity. Children (persons under age 15) and "young persons" (age 15 but under age 18) may not be employed in any capacity which is hazardous to health, dangerous, or otherwise unsuitable. Children are forbidden to be employed in industry or in attendance on machinery. With some exceptions, women and young persons may not be employed in industry between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. There is no national minimum wage; however, several statutory and nonstatutory bodies have been established to set minimum wages by sector. Fiji's Employment Act protects workers from summary dismissal without just cause. A Workmen's Compensation Act and an accident compensation plan have been enacted to set safety standards in the workplace and establish guidelines for compensation for workers injured on the job. Some unions in Fiji have criticized employers and the Government for failing to take action to remedy unsafe working conditions after they have been notified of them by the unions. The largest number of such allegations have been made in connection with Fiji's sugar industry, the largest and most "industrialized" sector of the economy.

The Government neither condones nor encourages discrimination based on sex, race, or religion. The Constitution states that "every person in Fiji is entitled to the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual, that is to say, the right regardless of race, place of origin, political opinions, color, creed or sex..." There is a growing awareness among women of both the Fijian and Indian communities of their right to participate more actively in social and political endeavors. However, women in rural areas continue to fill the traditional roles of village life and few women hold high-level business or political positions. Tribal inheritance is usually based on a patriarchal system. Women can and do, however, inherit status as chiefs; Fiji's third highest ranking chief is a woman.

About 85 percent of the land in Fiji is owned communally by the indigenous Fijian people. Approximately 6 percent is government land, leaving less than 10 percent as freehold land. Communal and government lands can be leased but not sold; only freehold land can be purchased outright. The arrangement regarding land ownership was instituted to protect the interests of indigenous Fijians from the more economically competitive Indo-Fijians, but some of the latter consider it discriminatory and an interference with their own freedom to develop. Some members of the Indian community also complain that it is difficult for them to obtain government-backed financing for investment projects.

FIJI

Indo-Fijians have generally experienced greater success in the pursuit of educational studies and in the accumulation of wealth through investment in private enterprise. Most businesses in Fiji are owned and operated by Indo-Fijians, and they are more heavily represented in the civil service. Some indigenous Fijians view the concentration of Indo-Fijians in business and government as discriminatory to their own racial group.

INDONESIA

The "New Order" Government, which came to power in 1966 in the wake of an abortive, Communist Party-backed coup, has its authority concentrated in a small group of active-duty and retired military officers and civilian technocrats acting under the dominant leadership of President Soeharto. A partly elected, partly appointed Parliament serves as a forum for consultation on and promulgation of legislation proposed by the Executive Branch. In reaction to the legacy of political and economic turmoil from the Sukarno days, the Government gives priority to economic development, stability, and social equity, and has been generally successful in these areas.

Faced with a wide diversity of ethnic, social, linguistic, and religious groups, Indonesian governments have continually sought to create a national identity and develop a governing system which can accommodate this diversity while strengthening national unity. In meeting this challenge, the Soeharto Government has made Pancasila the national social and political ideology and the centerpiece of its political program. Pancasila consists of five principles: belief in one supreme god, belief in a just and civilized humanity, nationalism, democracy, and social justice. Government based on it emphasizes social harmony and the traditional Indonesian process of consultation and consensus as major elements in decisionmaking. In 1985 the Government passed legislation strengthening Pancasila's central role in society by requiring all social organizations to acknowledge Pancasila as their fundamental philosophy.

Indonesia has a mixed economy with the State involved in nearly all sectors. The remarkable economic growth over the past decade has recently slowed somewhat. Chinese-Indonesian citizens are heavily represented in the modest but increasingly active private sector. Indonesia's national ideology and current 5-year economic plan stress improved social welfare for all without discrimination.

Although there were improvements in the human rights situation in 1985, problems nevertheless remain. These include unexplained deaths and disappearances, reports of torture and cruel treatment of prisoners, and restrictions on freedom of speech and press, freedom of movement, and activities of political parties and labor organizations.

In East Timor periodic skirmishes between the dwindling number of Fretilin guerrillas and the army continued, with unknown but relatively small numbers of casualties on both sides. The Government has permitted increased access to East Timor, including a series of escorted diplomatic visits and tours by Western newsmen. As a result of ambitious government plans, East Timor is benefiting from significant improvements in social services, particularly education and health centers, communications, and economic conditions.

In Irian Jaya, fear of activities by the Organization for Papuan Freedom (OPM) rebels and the Indonesian army continued to influence Irianese to cross into neighboring Papua New Guinea. Observers believe that reduced Indonesian military activity in Irian Jaya has significantly cut down the number of new border crossers.

INDONESIA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Press reports of covert summary executions of suspected criminals continued to appear in 1985, although the overall number of killings is believed to be less than in previous years. The executions, begun in 1982, started as a response to the fast-rising rate of violent crime. While the specific perpetrators of these executions, known euphemistically as "mysterious killings," have not been publicly identified, past comments by government officials supported the widespread public suspicion of government involvement. In contrast to previous years, government officials made virtually no public comments on the so-called "mysterious killings".

Officially, press reporting of "mysterious killings" is banned, but in practice a variety of newspapers report periodic discoveries of unidentified corpses found shot, stabbed, or beaten to death, which, combined with other characteristics, are generally understood to mark victims of "mysterious killings." One widely respected daily newspaper reports crime statistics from time to time, including unidentified, unexplained murders, implying a monthly figure of 25 to 50 victims country-wide, but it is impossible to know how many of these should be considered "mysterious killings." It is very difficult to estimate the number of such killings as they are indistinguishable from many other acts of violence, particularly among criminal bands. In the past there have been claims that some of the killings were politically motivated, but no such assertions have been made recently. Earlier claims were not substantiated.

Another police response to increasing crime is a new policy of "shoot to kill" in instances of violent crimes where the criminal is attempting to escape from the police. Presumably as part of an effort to make this new policy well-known, incidents of police shootings have received wide press coverage over recent months.

There have been no substantiated reports of political killings in Irian Jaya or East Timor, both areas of ongoing internal strife between authorities and the rebels. The Government continued to offer amnesty to rebels in both provinces. The commander of a Fretilin military unit, Muruk, and several of his followers took advantage of the amnesty and surrendered in January, 1985. Although the Government maintains restrictions on their movements, the amnesty has been generally respected for these individuals. While rebel activity in Irian Jaya continues, there have been no reports of political killings on either side.

b. Disappearance

In late 1985, an Indonesian Muslim social organization developed a list of 40 or more people who "disappeared" during the 1984 Tanjung Priok Riots and are presumed dead. Continued reports of disappearances often refer to cases before 1985. The Amnesty International report on East Timor, published in 1985, for example, lists disappearances up to 1984. Regularized International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) access to prisons in East Timor and elsewhere in Indonesia has helped to locate some persons thought to have disappeared. In Irian Jaya, increasingly, persons presumed to have disappeared are found to have crossed into Papua New Guinea.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although stated government policy discourages torture and cruel punishment of prisoners or detainees, instances of torture, cruel treatment, and even death while under detention are reported periodically in the press and elsewhere. Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report on East Timor, again cites what it claims is a military manual issued to Indonesian troops in East Timor which appears to permit the use of torture and threats on the lives of prisoners. The U.S. Government is unaware of any evidence that would verify the authenticity of the document. There have been a number of press reports of prisoners' claims of maltreatment by the police, and of individuals arrested and subsequently dying while in police custody. The authorities generally do not respond to such reports nor do they provide the public a more detailed explanation about the victims' deaths.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although the December 1981 Criminal Procedures Code (KUHAP) contains protections against arbitrary arrest and detention and specifies the right of prisoners to legal counsel and notification of family members, a number of abuses still occur. The provisions of the KUHAP are honored more often in urban areas than in small towns or remote provinces, in part because of a shortage of trained trial lawyers and ignorance of the law on the part of those detained as well as by the police. Indonesian law does not specifically include the right of habeas corpus or its equivalent. Martial law, declared in 1957, has never been lifted. Under special emergency provisions instituted in 1966, a military organization, the Command for the Restoration of Security and Order (KOPKAMTIB) has wide powers to detain and interrogate persons thought to endanger national security. These special powers supersede the KUHAP protections and apply particularly to cases of suspected subversion, sabotage, secession, or corruption. No cases of KOPKAMTIB exercising its extralegal powers were reported during 1985.

Although precise estimates of the number of persons detained without trial are unavailable, human rights observers believe there may be at least as many as 500 throughout Indonesia, including in Aceh, East and Central Java, Irian Jaya, and East Timor. The Governor of East Timor reports that a number of Timorese have been released from detention for lack of evidence. Since 1981 Indonesian authorities have used Atauro Island off the coast of East Timor as a detention facility for Timorese suspected of supporting Fretilin, or of having family members fighting with it. The number of detainees at Atauro reached 4,000 in late 1982 and then fell steadily. In October 1985, when the Government returned 239 detainees to the main Timor Island, only 932 remained on Atauro, most of them from the Viqueque area. While the Government intends to return them as soon as possible, many have asked to stay on Atauro until there is no longer any possible Fretilin threat in the Viqueque area. In the meantime, the ICRC continues to provide nutritional and medical assistance to those still detained on Atauro.

INDONESIA

Although Indonesia is a party to a number of International Labor Organization (ILO) conventions on the right to organize and bargain collectively and on forced labor, government officials have made clear that Indonesia's obligations under these conventions will not be allowed to interfere with "Pancasila" labor relations. There have been no reports of the use of forced labor in Indonesia in recent years.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Political interference and corruption exist in the Indonesian legal system. In criminal proceedings, defendants are sometimes able to buy their way out of prosecution at various stages of the proceedings. In civil cases, court decisions are sometimes influenced by the payment of bribes. In response to these abuses, from time to time the Government has taken action against particularly flagrant offenders, but by and large these practices continue unabated.

In cases involving what could broadly be defined as "political" issues, particularly instances in which persons are being tried under the subversion provisions of 1963, the accused are rarely, if ever, found innocent. The Government vigorously pursued prosecution of persons charged in connection with the 1984 Tanjung Priok riots. All of the persons tried during 1985 for involvement with the riots or the various bombing incidents in Java in 1984-85 have been found guilty of antigovernment activity and received stiff sentences. In all such security-related cases, it is widely believed that the Government will ensure conviction irrespective of the evidence presented in court. Although the Government has not announced data on the number of persons serving sentences for subversion, one reliable estimate suggests there may be several hundred.

A number of well-known figures were tried in 1985 under subversion laws: Muslim preacher A.M. Fatwa for purported instigation of rioting in Tanjung Priok in 1984; retired Lieutenant General H.R. Dharsono for subversive and criminal activity following the riots; a former government minister for involvement in bombings in Jakarta; and a 23-year-old publisher in Jogjakarta accused of printing articles appearing to oppose the Government. Fatwa was convicted and sentenced to 18 years in prison. Attorneys for General Dharsono sought to have the case dismissed on the grounds that the 1963 regulations, promulgated in response to the serious internal instability of that time, were no longer valid in Indonesia's present stable condition. The court did not accept this argument. In the same case, Dharsono's attorneys claimed the retired general was not permitted to meet with legal counsel for most of the 7 months he was held preceding his trial, and that his continued detention during trial contravened common legal practice, which would permit him to be released on bail. However, during the trial he was given full opportunity to air his views and those of defense witnesses as well; although the court permitted only 6 of the 12 witnesses the defense sought to testify. Dharsono received a 10-year sentence.

The Government's execution of four former Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) activists in mid-1985 generated strong criticism from some foreign governments and private organizations. The Government responded by noting that each of the victims had been tried, provided the right of appeal, and executed in accordance with Indonesian law.

INDONESIA

Indonesia's criminal justice system lacks the number of courts, trained judges, prosecutors, and police needed to cope with the increase in crime in recent years. As a result there are frequently lengthy delays in scheduling trials. Trials are conducted by a three-judge panel which hears evidence, decides guilt or innocence, and assesses punishment. Although the right of appeal is not absolute, it is observed in most cases. Most court sessions are open to the public, and most defendants have access to counsel.

As government employees, judges in Indonesia come under the jurisdiction of the Executive Branch. The Indonesian society of trial lawyers, Peradin, has noted that interference from the Executive Branch greatly affects the independence of the judiciary. In 1985 the Government proposed legislation which would establish judges as civil servants with a slightly more independent position.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Judicial warrants for searches are required except for suspected subversion, economic crimes, and corruption. However, forced or surreptitious entry by security agencies reportedly occurs periodically. Both local and international telephone calls are believed to be monitored selectively by government security agencies. Although, in general, correspondence is not monitored, letter mail to and from East Timor is subject to official scrutiny.

Permits are required for the import of foreign publications and video tapes, which must be reviewed by government censors. Some foreign newspapers and magazines, especially from Australia, cannot be imported. Communist literature is prohibited. Foreign publications which do enter Indonesia are subject to censorship.

Excepting one quasi-official daily newspaper which uses Chinese characters and claims a circulation of over 100,000, Chinese language publications can neither be imported nor produced domestically. Chinese characters are routinely blotted out of foreign news photos and advertising. There are no laws against speaking Chinese, but the Government lays heavy stress on the learning and use of the national language, Bahasa Indonesia, to promote national unity.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is circumscribed. The Constitution gives Parliament the authority to legislate these restrictions. In recent years, Parliament has helped create a body of law delimiting the rights of individuals and of the Government. In the absence of implementing regulations for many of these laws, different government agencies frequently interpret them as they choose. The result is that these agencies hold considerable discretionary authority in the field of civil rights; e.g., in freedom of the press and speech. Traditional governmental concern about public statements or publications which could be perceived as critical of the Government, and therefore threatening to the nation's stability, is a major factor inhibiting the exercise of free speech and press.

INDONESIA

Opposition groups are generally free to meet and formulate views, but they are inhibited from disseminating them publicly because of media reluctance to risk official disapproval or because of informal government instructions not to publish the opinions of or news about prominent opposition figures. In 1985 the Government brought to trial several well-known figures whom it accused of committing or contributing to possibly subversive acts while speaking their views. Authorities provided general topic guidelines to Muslim speakers during the Muslim holidays, when preachers addressed large gatherings. In a few instances, preachers who went beyond these guidelines were arrested.

The general lack of specific, clear guidelines on what is permissible has generated a significant degree of self-censorship both in public speaking and in the press. School faculties sometimes refrain from producing materials, including dissertations, which they believe might provoke government displeasure. Publishers also are unwilling to accept manuscripts dealing with controversial issues. Foreign books critical of the Government or dealing with sensitive topics, such as human rights, are similarly avoided by importers. Foreign periodicals, readily available in Indonesia, are scrupulously censored by their private importers in order to avoid government confiscation of the materials. With few exceptions this self-censorship is thorough and effectively responds to government concerns.

The press is largely privately owned. While espousing a "free" press, the Government expects the media to be "responsible" by supporting national economic development goals and domestic stability. While journalists and publishers practice considerable self-censorship, the Government closely monitors the media for material it finds unacceptable. In such instances, editors or journalists routinely receive oral instructions from government officials about news which cannot be reported. Articles and editorials do address sensitive issues, and, within the vaguely defined limitations, journalists are sometimes given a surprisingly wide latitude in which to operate. Directly or indirectly the press periodically criticizes government officials and policies, with no negative result from authorities. Outside Jakarta the press occasionally draws public attention to corruption cases involving government officials.

There is a single, government-run television network. Private radio stations, of which there are more than 400 throughout the country, are required to use government-provided news reports.

In 1985 the Government invited two separate groups of foreign journalists to visit East Timor. Of the resulting reports, the local press avoided publication of all but the mildest articles. Some of the same material in the foreign press entered Indonesia without trouble, and some was subsequently censored.

During 1985 the Department of Information suspended publication of two small-circulation journals, both for printing what the Government perceived to be inflammatory, antigovernment articles. One journal was permitted to reopen. The editor of the other journal was sentenced to 8 years in prison.

INDONESIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Regional and national meetings of virtually all organizations must have government permission, and local jurisdictions often require prior approval for smaller gatherings as well. While such approval is usually granted, there are restrictions on meetings in East Timor. The Government authorizes public assembly for social and ceremonial events and, as long as there is no perceived security risk, for political activities.

In mid-1985, the Parliament passed a "Social Organizations" bill (known as the "ORMAS" bill) which requires virtually all organizations to accept the state ideology of Pancasila. The law, which has yet to be implemented, empowers the Government, with the approval of the Supreme Court, to disband any organization it believes to be acting against the tenets of Pancasila. In addition, government approval will be required before any organization can accept funding from foreign donors. The ORMAS bill is the fifth and final piece of a five-part package of controversial political legislation designed to broaden and strengthen government control over the political process. The other four bills passed in the 1984-85 legislative session similarly served to consolidate and extend government influence on political parties, the composition of Parliament, national referendums, and general elections.

Indonesian workers are organized in a national federation (SPSI) which has been composed of 21 national industrial unions. These unions have recently been reduced in number and will no longer maintain regional and district organizations. No decision has been reached about the final number of unions that will be formed. They have a total membership of some 3 million out of a work force of 65 million, in which some 15 million persons are employed in the industrialized sector. The SPSI is the only trade union federation legally permitted in Indonesia, and all trade unions must belong to it. Political activity by the SPSI is forbidden. It is not permitted to organize civil servants or workers in government-owned enterprises nor in major sectors of the economy declared by the Government to be vital, such as air transportation and oil. However, some professional organizations, such as those for teachers, do act as unions in some respects.

Restrictions on the SPSI's autonomy include the imposition of government appointees in many of its positions, a requirement that its senior officials be active members of the government-sponsored GOLKAR, and extensive government intervention in labor-management relations. The law requires government permission for strikes, which as a matter of practice is never given.

c. Freedom of Religion

The constitutional guarantees of religious freedom apply only to those religions recognized by the State--Islam, Christianity, Buddhism, and Hinduism. Although the Indonesian population is overwhelmingly Muslim, practice and teaching of the other recognized faiths are permitted.

A plethora of mystical and other "folk religions" also exists. In 1985 the North Sumatra High Prosecutor banned 13 mystical sects, with approximately 18,000 adherents in all. While it appears that the Government tolerates private practice of banned religions, adherents of these groups are occasionally harassed by local authorities.

A 1972 letter of the Supreme Prosecutor reiterated a Presidential Decree of 1962 banning membership in Jehovah's Witnesses and the Baha'i faith. Although technically belief in one of these religions is not prohibited, legal decisions based on the 1972 and 1962 decrees made clear that such belief implies membership, which is illegal.

Because the first tenet of Pancasila specifies belief in a Supreme Being, atheism is forbidden. Some animists in remote parts of Indonesia have reportedly been pressured to convert to Islam or Christianity in order to fulfill the requirement of belief in a Supreme Being. There are no legal bars to religious conversion, and conversions between faiths do occur. However, proselytizing in heavily Islamic areas is seen as potentially disruptive and is discouraged. For this reason, restrictions on the activities of foreign missionaries, such as difficulty in obtaining or renewing visas or residence permits, have increased in such areas in recent years. In other areas, missionary activities are relatively unimpeded and in fact are welcomed in remoter districts where government resources in fields such as education and health are insufficient.

Official holidays include Christian, Hindu, and Buddhist, as well as Muslim holy days. Indonesian Muslims, Christians, and Buddhists maintain active links with coreligionists outside Indonesia. Travel to religious gatherings is permitted. The Government organizes annual Hajj trips to Mecca for Indonesians wishing to undertake this pilgrimage.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Although movement within Indonesia generally is unimpeded, restrictions do exist. The Government requires permits to change residence in certain areas, primarily to control the further shift of population from rural to urban locations. Since 1958-59, ethnic Chinese have been denied the right to live in rural areas of Java. Travel to certain regions, including much of eastern Indonesia, requires a permit. There are also restrictions on movement to and within East Timor and within parts of Irian Jaya. Former political detainees associated with the abortive 1965 coup attempt are required to notify authorities of travel away from their homes. Members or alleged supporters of the PKI outside Indonesia have not been allowed to return except on a case-by-case basis. The Government has tried to keep track of all of the 2.5 million former members of the PKI and some 20 million members of its front groups. However, government statements indicate that it has lost track of several million of them (including fairly senior members.)

The Government periodically restricts foreign travel of domestic critics and others in disfavor with the Government. An estimated 20,000 Indonesians are currently not permitted to leave the country. They include "Petition of 50" members critical of the Government, those arrested in the student riots of 1974, and others. However, other critics of the Government are free to travel abroad, and a person banned at one time may be permitted to travel subsequently. A Presidential Instruction in 1985 removed a requirement for students to obtain government permission before going abroad to study. In July the Director General of Immigration announced that Indonesian students will no longer be permitted to study in 31 countries: those which are "Socialist-Communist;" those with which Indonesia has no diplomatic ties; and those termed "extremist," particularly Libya, Iraq, Syria, and Iran. Although many of the countries concerned protested this decision, it is unclear whether the Government has rescinded it.

In October the Government announced that it will move 1,324 "illegal immigrants" to the Island of Sumba. Most of these reportedly are Chinese who illegally reentered Indonesia after having left it for China in the 1960's. Government officials state that Sumba will be a temporary residence site until the countries of origin of these people agree to take them back. Earlier in the year the press reported signs that the Government planned to settle up to 15,000 "illegal immigrant" families in Sumba.

Under its humane refugee policy, Indonesia has given first asylum to over 95,000 Indochinese refugees since 1975. In cooperation with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the Government also has provided one of the region's three refugee processing centers, where Indochinese refugees who have landed in Indonesia, as well as those from other first asylum countries, are given training to prepare them for permanent residence in other countries.

In 1985 residents of Irian Jaya continued to cross into territory of Papua New Guinea, but in much smaller numbers than in 1984. There currently are an estimated 10,000 Irianese in refugee camps in Papua New Guinea. Most fled their homes in response to rebel warnings or threats of Government and OPM warfare or other disturbances in their home areas. Continued rebel allegations of Indonesian military reprisals against border crossers have kept most of them from returning to their homeland. Since 1984 the Indonesian and Papua New Guinea governments have worked together closely in an effort to resolve the border crosser problem and to ensure the peaceful return of Irianese to their homes. To date, however, less than a thousand have returned under government-sponsored programs. In late 1985, the Government agreed that any Irianese who wished to return to Irian Jaya were welcome, and those who did not were free to live where and how they wish.

The Government has its authority largely concentrated in the hands of a small group of active-duty and retired military officers and civilian technocrats led by President Soeharto. This system ensures the continued role of the military in all fields of governmental activity. The Parliament, political parties, and the general public have little ability to influence government decisions. However, particularly in budgetary matters, including military procurement, civilian technocrats exercise decisive influence, and government ministers are obliged to defend their departments' budgets and programs before parliamentary committees, the proceedings of which receive wide press coverage.

All adult citizens, except active-duty members of the armed forces and convicted criminals serving prison sentences, are eligible to vote in 1987 for the 400 elected members of Parliament. In mid-1985 the Government announced that persons convicted of involvement in the 1965 PKI-inspired coup attempt may be permitted to vote for the first time under the New Order Government. To do so, however, they must pass a stringent government review of their current and past activities to ensure there is no lingering PKI taint. Elections for Parliament, held every 5 years, are scheduled for 1987. Currently, the military is represented in Parliament by 75 appointed members, who join the 360 elected members and 25 other appointed ones for a total of 460. In accordance with the 1985 law, in the 1987 election 400 members of Parliament will be elected; there will be 400 appointees, all from the military.

INDONESIA

The President is elected by the People's Consultative Assembly (MPR), which consists of Parliament plus an equal number of appointed members and sits in a special session every 5 years following the general parliamentary election.

Parliament considers laws presented to it by government departments and agencies but does not draft laws on its own. The Government seeks to resolve any potential parliamentary concerns before the bills are officially presented to Parliament. Parliament can and does change the text and intent of bills it reviews. Bills of major significance, however, are often passed with little or no alteration. Usually Parliament works on the basis of consensus, not majority voting, to resolve any differing views during committee consideration of a bill.

A 1975 law limits the number of political parties to three. One of these is made up of four former Muslim political parties and another of former nationalist and Christian parties. Members in these two parties occasionally reflect their earlier party affiliations, thereby exacerbating factional splits in their new parties. This is one factor weakening the parties' election prospects and diminishing their ability effectively to represent their constituents' concerns to the Government. The third, GOLKAR, is a longstanding, government-sponsored organization of functional groups which serves a role similar to that of a political party. In the three national elections since 1971, GOLKAR has won with more than 60 percent of the vote each time. Civil servants and their families are expected to vote for GOLKAR. Districts which support non-GOLKAR candidates may find government resources devoted to development projects in the area reduced. The two parties and GOLKAR are prohibited from organizing and operating officially below the district level except during election campaigns. Critics contend this system gives GOLKAR an advantage, since its civil service members have constant access to small towns and villages because of their official duties.

The PKI and a formerly powerful Muslim party (MASYUMI) linked with separatist rebellions in the late 1950's are specifically banned. Members of the former and many leaders of the latter are not allowed to run for office or to be active politically. In 1985 even a family relationship to a person accused of Communist party sympathies or involvement could prevent one from running for office.

INDONESIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government considers outside investigations of alleged human rights to be interference in its internal affairs. Amnesty International representatives, for example, have been refused official access to Indonesia because of the organization's continued criticism of the Government and the Government's belief that it is biased. There is no local chapter of Amnesty International, although individual citizens may have memberships.

In 1985 the Government concluded an agreement with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) permitting it to: conduct an annual series of visit to prisoners detained in connection with the events in East Timor; provide medical and food aid to displaced persons on Atauro Island as well as to assess the situation of those persons returned to the main island after having been displaced in Atauro; carry out medical-nutritional surveys to vulnerable villages in East Timor; and continue efforts to reunite divided families in East Timor and abroad (mainly Portugal).

In addition, the ICRC is permitted to visit prisoners convicted of participation in the PKI-backed attempted coup in 1965.

The Government largely declined to comment on the Amnesty International Report on East Timor issued in mid-1985 and refused to respond to any of the allegations made in it. In response to a European Parliament resolution condemning the execution of former PKI activists and a proposal to condemn human rights practices in Indonesia, the Indonesian Government sent a delegation to the Parliament to defend Indonesia's policies.

A number of domestic organizations are concerned with human rights. The Department of Justice has an agency charged with the drafting of legal codes to replace the colonial laws still in effect. This agency also has responsibility for the establishment of legal documentation facilities and for programs to inform citizens of their legal rights. In addition, several state university law departments and private groups associated with mosques and churches are involved in providing legal counseling services. The trial lawyers association, Peradin, provides some free legal services to the disadvantaged.

There are private legal aid organizations which help in cases of human rights violations by defending or representing aggrieved parties in court and by stimulating press attention and discussion. Several of these were prominent in defending persons charged in connection with rioting in Jakarta in 1984. These private legal aid organizations have established offices in many larger Indonesian cities but they are dependent on donations. In 1985 the Government refused to permit a foreign donation to one of these legal aid groups. The Jakarta city government withdrew long-supplied funding to another, reportedly as a cost-cutting measure. The ORMAS bill requiring government approval of any foreign funding is expected to result in an overall reduction of contributions to these organizations.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expresses concern about continuing reports of extrajudicial executions,

INDONESIA

"disappearances," torture, and arbitrary arrests and detention on political grounds by the security forces. It was also especially concerned about alleged human rights violations in the aftermath of and related to the 1984 Tanjung Priok riots, and, in connection with the abortive 1965 coup, the continued detention of about 200 prisoners, a number of whom it believes may not have received fair trials. Freedom House rated Indonesia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Indonesia is the fifth most populous country in the world and the largest nation in Southeast Asia, with a population in 1985 estimated at 173,103,000. Although the population growth rate has been reduced to 2 percent, population pressure on the overcrowded islands of Java, Madura, and Bali continues to be a government concern. In an effort to reduce some of this pressure, and to develop more isolated parts of the country, the Government has an ambitious "transmigration" program which attempts to resettle farmers from overcrowded areas in less populous and usually more backward and remote areas.

The memory of the economic and social chaos of the last years of the Sukarno regime continues to ensure that orderly social and economic development for all segments of society remains the New Order's primary goal. This goal is reiterated in the fifth principle of Pancasila, social justice, which is interpreted to mean that the basic human needs of all Indonesians should be satisfied without discrimination. While there continue to be great disparities in wealth and opportunity, under the Soeharto Government the benefits of development and improved economic conditions have been widespread. Although the Government has largely abandoned special programs designed to strengthen the "Pribumi" or ethnic Indonesian role in business, an increasing number of young ethnic Indonesians are now choosing business careers over civil service jobs.

World Bank figures show the per capita gross national product (GNP) at $560 for 1983. Although agriculture is the most important domestic sector of the economy, accounting for more than 30 percent of the GNP and employing about 66 percent of the labor force, petroleum exports of 800,000 to 900,000 barrels per day dominate the external economy. Economic growth continues at a moderate but steady pace but is expected to decline from 1984's 6 percent to about 3 percent for 1985. A continued soft international petroleum market and generally lower prices for commodities hindered more rapid economic growth. The World Bank estimates 26 percent of the urban population and 44 percent of the rural population were below the absolute poverty level in 1980, a sharp drop from 1970 levels of 51 percent and 59 percent respectively.

Agricultural output has increased significantly in recent years, about 3.8 percent per annum. A good harvest in 1985 followed a remarkable increase in food production in 1984. In that year the country achieved self-sufficiency in rice production for the first time since independence, a feat repeated in 1985. Partly as a result of improving output, the percentage of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 110 in 1981.

Community health standards remain low, although intensive government efforts are underway to train doctors and other health specialists and to provide medical facilities and supplies. Tuberculosis, mosquito-borne diseases, including malaria, and skin disease are endemic. In 1985, life expectancy at birth was 55 years, and the infant mortality rate was 89 per 1,000 live births. In 1981, 23 percent of the population (40 percent in urban areas and 19 percent in rural areas) had access to safe water.

By 1981, virtually all primary school-age children were enrolled in schools, although the Government continues to face difficulty recruiting and keeping teachers for schools in isolated areas. In 1984, the President announced compulsory education through primary grades and encouraged wealthy Indonesians to "adopt" poorer students and help them pay for schooling. The World Bank estimates that as of 1981 total adult literacy stood at 67 percent--77 percent of men and 58 percent of women; 83 percent of urban and 52 percent of rural dwellers.

Employment of children under age 14 is forbidden by the basic labor law of 1948. The law also established an 8-hour day, 48-hour week, 1 rest day per week, and a definite vacation period. An extensive body of labor law and ministerial regulations provides for minimum standards of industrial health and safety. In practice, these statutes are rarely observed.

Indonesian law provides that the Department of Manpower Office in each region shall, at regular intervals, establish a minimum wage for its particular region. A new minimum wage for Jakarta, for example, was established in November 1985 at $1.18 per day. The range of regional minimum wages is from a high of $1.18 per day in some areas to a low of .50¢ per day in others. The Department of Manpower and the Central Statistical Office also report for each region a minimum physical needs figure.

Indonesian women generally enjoy a high degree of economic and social freedom, and there is significant cultural latitude for women's participation in public life. Women occupy important mid-level positions in the civil service, educational institutions, labor unions, the military, the professions, and private business. The Cabinet named in 1983 includes two women: The Minister of State for Women's Affairs and the Minister for Social Affairs. Although legislation guarantees women equal treatment, women seldom receive equal pay for equal work. In addition to a government-sponsored women's organization in which membership and participation are mandatory, there are several voluntary, private groups which work to advance women's legal, economic and political rights. Chief among these is KOWANI (Congress of Indonesian Women), an umbrella organization for some 55 women's groups.

Ethnic Chinese are pressured to adopt Indonesian customs and take Indonesian names. While they are also encouraged to become citizens, some Chinese find legal avenues to citizenship blocked or are discouraged by the time-consuming and expensive task of obtaining citizenship documents. Government regulations prohibit the operation of all-Chinese schools and institutions of higher learning, teaching in Chinese languages, the formation of exclusively Chinese cultural groups or trade associations, and the use of Chinese characters on signboards or in publications. However, social and religious groups which are in effect all Chinese are not proscribed and do exist.

JAPAN

Japan is a parliamentary democracy in which democratic institutions are firmly established. Its industrial free market economy is the second largest in the world in terms of gross national product (GNP). Japan's culture incorporates many elements from the West while retaining strong Eastern roots. Buddhist and Shinto traditions continue to have a basic and pervasive influence on thought and social institutions, but several minor religions also flourish. Less than one percent of the population is Christian. Although the Japanese are receptive to foreign ideas, the citizens of this densely populated nation have a cultural, ethnic, and racial homogeneity which makes them less willing or able to integrate alien residents in Japan into their society.

While the legal system has gradually evolved toward granting equality of opportunity to minorities, there has been little positive change in the social prejudice against Koreans, approximately 676,000 of whom are first, second, and third generation permanent residents, in addition to the approximately 120,000 naturalized Japanese nationals of Korean ancestry. An estimated 1.2 million descendants of persons historically considered to be outcasts ("Burakumin") also suffer social but not legal proscription.

The Japanese Constitution states, "All of the people are equal under the law and there shall be no discrimination in political, economic, or social relations because of race, creed, sex, social status, or family origin." The human rights guaranteed by the Constitution are secured by a just and efficient legal system. Political liberties are guaranteed to all nationals. Over 70 percent of the electorate usually vote in general elections, which involve candidates from seven freely-functioning political parties. The right of workers to organize, bargain, and act collectively is guaranteed by the Constitution. Slightly under 30 percent of the active work force belongs to labor unions. Most unions are involved in political activity as well as in labor relations.

In May 1985 the Diet passed the Equal Employment Opportunity Law prohibiting discrimination based on sex. This law will take effect in April 1986, but it contains no sanctions for violations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There are no known cases of murder for political motives on the part of the Government or any other organization.

b. Disappearance

There are no known cases in which people have been abducted, secretly arrested, held in clandestine detention, or held as hostage by security forces or any other organization.

JAPAN

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture, cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. There is no evidence that penal treatment varies by social class, sex, or religion.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest or imprisonment is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Japanese law provides for a writ of habeas corpus. Individuals cannot be detained without charge, and prosecuting authorities must be prepared to demonstrate before trial that probable cause exists to detain the accused. The length of time before a suspect is brought to trial depends on the nature of the crime but rarely exceeds two months; the average is one to two months. Preventive detention does not exist.

The key statute protecting workers, the Labour Standards Law of 1947, prohibits the use of forced labor, and there are no known cases of forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial tribunal in all criminal cases, and this right is respected in practice. The defendant is made aware of charges upon arrest and guaranteed a public trial by an independent civilian court with defense counsel and the right to cross-examination. Defendants are guaranteed free and private access to counsel as well as the right not to be compelled to testify against themselves under the Constitution, although access is often restricted immediately after arrest. Defendants also are protected from the application of ex post facto laws and have right of access to evidence deemed to be necessary for trial after a formal indictment has been made and generally before a trial. Judges are appointed by the Cabinet for permanent terms, but face periodic review through popular referendum. A defendant dissatisfied with the decision of a trial court of first instance may, within the period prescribed by law, appeal to a higher court as the reviewing court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the Constitution, each search or seizure must be made upon separate warrant issued by a judicial officer. Japanese authorities have been scrupulous in observing the legal requirements for warrants. The standards for issuing such warrants exist to guard against arbitrary searches. There are no reports that the Government or any other organization has arbitrarily interfered with privacy, family, home, or correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Japanese Constitution, an independent press and judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press.

JAPAN

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice.

Japanese law grants unions the right to organize, strike, bargain collectively, lobby, and to make political campaign contributions, and the unions actively do so. Unions are involved also in international bodies and bilateral exchanges. Public employees do not have the right to strike but do have recourse to mediation and arbitration in order to resolve disputes. Members of the armed forces, police officers, and fire fighters are not permitted to organize. In exchange for a ban on their right to strike, government employees' pay raises are determined by the Government based on a recommendation by the independent National Personnel Authority (NPA). Citing tight finances, however, the Government in 1985, as in the previous three years, has not fully implemented the NPA recommendations for wage increases.

In response to the Government's failure to implement fully the NPA's recommendations, the General Council of Trade Unions of Japan (SOHYO) has in the past filed complaints with the International Labor Organization (ILO). The ILO Committee on Freedom of Association has urged Japan to respect the NPA recommendations and has also asked that Japan establish new procedures for deciding wages and working conditions for government employees.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. While Buddhism and Shintoism remain the two major religions, there are many others, including several Christian denominations. Missionaries are welcome and receive special visa status. Some temples and shrines, as treasured national properties, receive public support for maintenance.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Japanese citizens have the right to travel freely, both within Japan and abroad, to change their place of residence, to emigrate, and to repatriate voluntarily. Nationality is never revoked.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

As a parliamentary democracy, Japan is ruled by the political party or parties able to form a majority in the lower house of its Bicameral Diet. The Liberal Democratic Party has ruled Japan since 1955 and currently governs in a coalition with an offshoot party, the New Liberal Club. Five opposition parties are active. All adult citizens have the right to vote. Voting is by secret ballot. Political interest groups, regardless of their political hue, can organize and engage in nonviolent political activity. Well-organized labor unions ensure participation by workers in the political process.

According to law, aliens with five years continuous residence are eligible for naturalization and the simultaneous acquisition of citizenship rights, including the right to vote. In fact, however, relatively few eligible aliens have been naturalized. Naturalization is a difficult and complicated process requiring "proof of assimilation into the Japanese culture." Many Korean residents are unwilling to seek naturalization on the grounds that their cultural identity would be erased by the requirements. Korean human rights activists have urged Japan to restore, unconditionally, the citizenship which Korean residents of Japan had previously but which was revoked after World War II.

Various groups have petitioned the office of the United Nations Human Rights Commissioner (UNHRC) to take up allegations of discrimination against Koreans in Japan and of maltreatment of mental patients in Japan. The Government responded to the complaints and the UNHRC decided not to take up these matters for further discussion or investigation. The International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) and International Commission of Health Professionals (ICHP) released a joint report in July 1985, which described Japan's mental health system as "seriously inadequate." Through its membership in the UNHRC, the Japanese Government is active in working for improvement of human rights practices in other countries. There is a Human Rights and Refugee Division in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to give long-range attention to these matters. Amnesty International's 1985 Report expressed concern over the practice of capital punishment and the reported treatment of some prisoners during official police interrogation. Freedom House rates Japan as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Japan's population in 1985 was 120,731,000, with an annual growth rate of approximately 1 percent. In total land area, Japan is slightly smaller than California. While Japan is one of the three major industrial complexes of the world, and the industrial sector is the most important part of the economy, agriculture is practiced so intensively that Japan has an agricultural self-sufficiency rate of around 70 percent. Per capita GNP in current U.S. dollars was $10,120 in 1983.

Good quality food, shelter, health care, and education are widely available to inhabitants of Japan regardless of race, religion, ethnic background, or political opinion. Life expectancy at birth in 1983 was 77 years. The infant mortality rate was 6 per 1,000 live births in 1985. With a highly competitive education system that provides nine years of free compulsory schooling, Japan has virtually total primary school enrollment and virtually total adult literacy.

The Labour Standards Law of 1947 provides for an 8-hour day, a 48-hour week, and an overtime rate of time and a quarter. Workers under the age of 18 years may not be employed in dangerous or harmful work and minors under 15 years of age may not be employed as workers. A system fixing minimum wages on industry and regional bases was introduced by the Minimum Wages Law of 1959. The Ministry of Labor administers various laws and regulations governing occupational health and safety, principal among which is the Industrial Safety and Health Law of 1972.

JAPAN

Women comprise approximately 36 percent of the employed population. Social pressures discouraging involvement of women in positions of managerial and professional responsibility remain strong. Discrimination by private employers against women continues despite its prohibition by the Constitution and by legislative measures adopted over the past 30 years to accord women the same legal status as men. In a recent government survey, around 60 percent of responding corporations indicated they have job categories that exclude females, and more than 65 percent hire only men as executive recruits. Another recent survey indicated nearly 86 percent of women workers said they had no interest in management positions and preferred marriage and motherhood to careers.

In May 1985, the Diet passed the Equal Employment Opportunity Law which will take effect in April, 1986. This law prohibits discrimination based on sex in such areas as recruitment and hiring, pay inequality, and the number of night or overtime hours that can be worked. The law has been criticized, however, as containing no concrete measures, such as penalties for violators, to ensure equality for women workers.

In recent years the Government has enacted several laws and regulations extending to permanent resident aliens, 82 percent of whom are Koreans, the benefits of equal access to public housing and loans, social security pensions for those who otherwise qualify, and certain public employment rights. Rectifying another issue of concern to resident Koreans, the Foreign Ministry now pronounces Korean names according to the Korean, rather than the Japanese, reading of name characters. The Government has also extended, until 1987, a Special Measures Law (first issued in 1969) designed to help assimilate Burakumin (descendants of Feudal Era "outcasts" who practiced so-called "unclean" professions such as hide tanning) into mainstream society through a number of social, economic, and legal programs. Nevertheless, entrenched social prejudice against both Koreans and Burakumin restricts the access of both groups to private housing, employment, and marriage opportunities. There is a growing conflict between alien residents, primarily Koreans (although some Americans are also involved), and the Government over the requirement that foreign residents be fingerprinted every five years. Korean rights activists have recently been arrested and fined for refusing to be fingerprinted. They argue that it harms the individual dignity of foreign residents (Japanese citizens are not routinely fingerprinted) and is in violation of the International Human Rights Covenant as well as the Equal Protection Article of the Japanese Constitution. The Government asserts that it is a reasonable way to confirm the identity of foreign residents and justified on the basis of public welfare.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA*

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea, formed in 1948 during the Soviet administration of the northern half of the Korean peninsula, is a rigid Communist dictatorship, strictly dominated by one man, Kim Il Sung, and his family. Although some internationally respected human rights are acknowledged by the 1972 Constitution and laws, individual rights are entirely subordinated in practice to the ruling Korean Workers' (Communist) Party (KWP), with its overriding aim of imposing a social revolution and enforcing unanimous popular support for the country's governing system and its leaders. While there were pro forma elections to the Supreme People's Assembly in February 1982, free elections do not exist in North Korea because citizens have no choice among candidates.

The North Korean people are subject to rigid controls. The State establishes security ratings for each person, and these ratings determine access to jobs, schools, medical facilities, and stores, as well as admission to the Korean Workers' Party, the route to the highest levels and privileges of the society. Persons who fail to cooperate face imprisonment, confiscation of property, or enforced removal to remote villages. Surveillance by informers is prevalent. Punishment for "political crimes" against the State is severe. Virtually no outside information other than that approved and disseminated by the North Korean authorities is allowed to reach the public. However, senior government officials seem to be somewhat better informed.

President Kim Il Sung's 12-year effort to groom his son, Kim Chong Il, as successor is testimony to the enormous power the elder Kim has amassed during 37 years of rule. The younger Kim was elevated to several senior party positions in 1980. The absence of any evidence of public debate about the succession is also indicative of the lack of real popular participation in the political process.

North Korea has not been successful through its command economy in producing the desired economic development. It remains a less-developed country with a low standard of living and a severe balance of payments problem.

Kim Il Sung's commitment to reunification on his own terms has led to periodic attempts to destabilize the Republic of Korea. More recently, North Korea has engaged in talks with South Korea. These have addressed possibilities for cooperation in the economic, parliamentary, sports, and humanitarian fields. This last area of discussion has focused on the plight of families separated during the postwar division of the peninsula

*The United States does not have diplomatic relations with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea; even representatives of governments that do, as well as journalists and other occasional invited visitors to North Korea, are not permitted the freedom of movement that would enable them effectively to assess human rights conditions there. Nor does North Korea publish socioeconomic statistics. Most of this report, therefore, is a repeat of previous human rights reports based on information obtained over a period of time extending from well before 1985. While limited in scope and detail, the information is indicative of the human rights situation in North Korea today.

and the Korean War (1950-53). During September 20-23, 1985, both sides arranged historically unprecedented exchange visits by separated family members.

However, there is little evidence to suggest that North Korea has improved its dismal performance in the human rights area. Both short- and long-term trends indicate continued one-family rule with scant respect for basic human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No reliable information is available on politically motivated killing in North Korea. However, the North Korean attitude toward political killing was clearly demonstrated in the October 9, 1983, Rangoon bombing and the November 23, 1984, shooting in the Joint Security Area of the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) dividing North and South Korea.

After a careful investigation, the Government of Burma determined that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea was responsible for the attempt to assassinate Republic of Korea President Chun Doo Hwan during his 1983 visit to Burma. Two North Korean army officers brought to trial in Rangoon were convicted and sentenced to death for the attack, in which four cabinet ministers and a number of officials were killed. In the DMZ incident, North Korean security guards opened fire on a Soviet student trying to defect from a tour group, triggering an exchange of fire in which several lives were lost.

There is no information available on disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

According to the Freedom House 1984-85 report, "torture is reportedly common" in North Korea. The accounts of torture and beatings of crew members of the USS Pueblo after their capture in 1968 are well-known and documented. The only other reliable source on prison conditions and treatment of prisoners in North Korea is Venezuelan poet Ali Lameda, who was detained in North Korea from September 1967 through 1974, allegedly for attempted sabotage and espionage. While physical torture was not used on Mr. Lameda, he stated that Korean prisoners were routinely beaten. Lameda noted that "beating was also used as a means of persuasion during interrogation."

Lameda reported the use of deprivation of food to force "confessions," as well as solitary confinement, continuous interrogation, enforced waking periods, poor or nonexistent medical treatment, and 12 hours of forced labor per day. In addition, prisoners were denied family visits, parcels, correspondence, writing materials, newspapers, and clothing changes. Prisoners appeared to be regarded as persons without any rights.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Information on specific criminal justice procedures and practices in North Korea is extremely scarce. North Korea has refused to permit outside observation of its legal system and practices. The accounts provided by the crew members of the USS Pueblo and by Lameda, while clearly from an earlier period, comprise virtually all the specific information available on the operation of the criminal justice system in North Korea.

North Korean law states that no prisoner may be held for interrogation over 2 months. This period may be extended indefinitely, however, if the Interrogation Department obtains approval of the Chief Prosecutor. Lameda states that he was detained for 12 months without trial or charge. His request for a lawyer of his choice and an open trial were ridiculed as "bourgeois." Habeas corpus or its equivalent does not exist in law or practice.

According to newspaper reports, North Korean defectors in South Korea estimated in April 1982 that at least 105,000 "ideological offenders" were being held in eight major labor camps in the North. Amnesty International has received unconfirmed reports of arrests of those opposed to heir apparent Kim Chong Il.

There is no prohibition on the use of forced or compulsory labor. Information as to whether it is practiced is not available.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The North Korean Constitution states that courts are independent and that judicial proceedings are to be carried out in strict accordance with law. All courts, however, are responsible to the people's assemblies, which effectively means government control of the judiciary. Article 138 states that "cases are heard in public, and the accused is guaranteed the right to defense; hearings may be closed to the public as stipulated by law." Lameda claims that he was twice denied public trial. He reports that after his first arrest he was imprisoned for a year without a hearing; after his second arrest, he was put through a closed session without benefit of counsel of his choice or even knowledge of the charges. His tribunal was under the direction of the Ministry of Internal Security, with one person serving as both judge and prosecutor.

Lameda stated that, other than to admit guilt, he was refused the right to speak out or defend himself at his trial. His "defense counsel" represented him by making a lengthy speech praising Kim Il Sung and then requesting a 20-year sentence, which the tribunal imposed after 5 minutes of deliberation.

In a 1979 interview with American journalist John Wallach, North Korean Supreme Court Justice Li Chun Uk noted that the defense counsel's job is "to give the suspect due punishment." Open court appears to consist of an announcement of the term of imprisonment, which has already been determined by the Provincial Safety Bureau.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The populace is subjected to regular indoctrination, designed to shape individual consciousness. Preschool children are drilled in homage to Kim Il Sung and his family, while youths and adults are required to participate in daily ideological training conducted by youth organizations or at places of employment. The propaganda requires rote recitation of party maxims and positions and strives for ideological purity. Multiple North Korean security organizations enforce these controls.

Reports, primarily from defectors, indicate that forced resettlement is common, particularly for those deemed politically unreliable. Permission to reside in, or even enter, Pyongyang, the capital, is strictly controlled.

According to reports in South Korean journals, Japanese wives of Koreans repatriated from Japan since 1959 have not been permitted to visit Japan and many have lost contact with their families because their letters are subject to strict censorship.

The Constitution states that "citizens are guaranteed the inviolability of person and residence and the privacy of correspondence." Lameda reported, however, that the privacy of his residence was not respected and that listening devices were used against him. He was arrested and his collected papers and poetry seized and destroyed without warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution states that "citizens have the freedoms of speech, the press, assembly, association, and demonstration." In fact, North Koreans enjoy none of these rights. Such activities are permitted only in support of government objectives. Other articles of the Constitution that require citizens to follow the "socialist norms of life" and to obey a "collective spirit" take precedence over individual political or civil liberties. Foreign media are excluded, domestic media censorship is enforced, and no deviation from the official government line is tolerated. Listening to foreign media broadcasts is prohibited, and violators reportedly are subject to severe punishment. Most urban households have a radio and some have television, but reception is limited to domestic programming. Artistic and academic works are controlled by the Government, and visitors report that a primary function of plays, movies, operas, and books is to contribute to the cult of personality surrounding "the great leader," Kim Il Sung, and his son, "the beloved leader," Kim Chong Il.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government has developed a pervasive system of informers throughout the society. No public meetings can be held without government authorization. There appear to be no organizations other than those created by the Government.

Trade unions and professional associations appear to exist solely as another method of government control over their members. There are no effective rights to organize, bargain collectively, or strike.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Constitution guarantees that "citizens have religious liberty and the freedom of antireligious propaganda," North Korea, in fact, has severely persecuted Christians and Buddhists since the late 1940's. No churches have been rebuilt since the Korean War. The regime uses religious organizational facades to proclaim the practice of religious freedom but appears to have long since purged the membership out of existence. Persons whose family or relatives once had a strong religious involvement are discriminated against. Though religious practice appears impossible, some foreign visitors to North Korea believe that the Government does not currently persecute the very small number of Christians who continue to worship at home.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal travel in North Korea is strictly controlled. A travel pass is required for any movement outside one's home village and is granted only for required official or personal travel. This requirement is strictly enforced. Foreign travel is limited to officials or trusted artists and performers. Emigration is not allowed, and few refugees or defectors succeed in fleeing the country. Retaliation reportedly is taken against the relatives of those few persons who manage to escape. According to Freedom House, "rights to travel internally and externally are perhaps the most restricted in the world: tourism is unknown--even to Communist countries."

In 1959 North Korea began actively encouraging Korean residents overseas to repatriate to "the Fatherland." Some observers estimate that during the next several years over 100,000 overseas Koreans, almost all from Japan, voluntarily repatriated to North Korea. Since then, however, reports of the harsh treatment given repatriates have reached overseas Koreans, reducing the flow to North Korea to a trickle. (Because of their "corruption" by exposure to foreign influences, repatriates are isolated from North Korean society after their arrival until they can be indoctrinated and their ideological reliability gauged.)

North Korea has permitted entry to some overseas Korean residents to visit their relatives, and several have made repeat visits.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The political system in North Korea is dominated by Kim Il Sung, who leads the Korean Workers' Party, and also heads the Government. Kim has groomed his son Kim Chong Il to succeed him, and there are reports that Kim Chong Il has been acquiring increasing power and influence. The legislature, the Supreme People's Assembly, has never taken any action other than unanimous passage of resolutions presented to it by the leadership. In an effort to create an appearance of democracy, North Korea has created several "minority parties." They exist only as rosters of officials who have token representation in the People's Assembly and completely support the government line.

DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF KOREA

Free elections do not exist in North Korea. Although elections to the Supreme People's Assembly were held in February 1982, and to city and county assemblies in March 1983, in all cases only one candidate was approved by the government party in each electoral district, and, according to the government-controlled media, 100 percent of the voters turned out to elect 100 percent of the approved candidates. Such "elections" in reality are a mandatory exercise in which voters are required to participate and to approve the party's candidates.

Most citizens are completely excluded from any real participation in the political process. To achieve even a semblance of real participation, one must become a member of the Korean Worker's Party. The selection process for entrance to the party is long and rigorous. Individuals from "bad social backgrounds," i.e., those who have relatives who fled south during the Korean War, those whose families had strong religious involvement or were once property owners or members of the middle class, and those who have relatives who are political prisoners, effectively are denied entry into the party and are discriminated against. Most levels of the party have no voice, serving only to carry out the decrees and "on the spot guidance" promulgated by party leader Kim Il Sung and his top subordinates.

No organizations exist within North Korea to report on or observe human rights violations. North Korea does not participate in any international or regional human rights organizations.

Amnesty International has requested a visit to North Korea; the Government has not responded to or acknowledged this request. A December 1982 request by Amnesty International for information on North Korean laws, on use of the death penalty, and on reports of arrests and long-term imprisonment of political figures also received no reply.

The Amnesty International 1985 Report noted that its work continued to be seriously impaired by the virtual absence of any official information during the year concerning any arrests, trials, or death sentences, that it continued to investigate reports that four prominent political figures had been detained for several years, and that it did not receive any replies to correspondence directed to the Government. Freedom House rates North Korea as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of North Korea is estimated to be about 19.6 million, with an annual growth rate of 2.3 percent. It is a less-developed country that has a low standard of living by most measures. It has a highly centralized, planned economy, with a gross national product (GNP) of $23 billion (1984), or $1,175 per capita (1984 dollars).

Many observers believe that, after a short period of rapid growth in the early 1970's, the economy experienced difficulties due largely to policies that overemphasized military expenditures, stressed attainment of self-sufficiency, and pushed for rapid growth of heavy industry. During that period,

North Korea imported large quantities of industrial equipment from the West for which it was unable to pay. It remains in default to Western creditors on an estimated $1.5 billion. More than 20 percent of North Korea's GNP is committed to military expenditures, the second highest such rate in the world.

There have been recent signs of a shift in policy emphasis toward expanding trade. In September 1984 North Korea promulgated a joint venture law to attract foreign capital and technology. The apparent shift in economic policy was also suggested by North Korean willingness to discuss economic trade and cooperation with South Korea. North Korea's default on its foreign debt is in large measure responsible for scant foreign interest in joint ventures. The only such ventures North Korea has publicized involve a project with a French company to build a hotel in Pyongyang and one with overseas Koreans in Japan to build a department store that has recently opened in Pyongyang. The new emphasis on expanding trade has not produced any shift in internal economic priorities away from support of military industry. North Korea receives assistance from the Soviet Union and China, but actual levels are difficult to estimate.

The 1985 infant mortality rate was 30 per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth was 65.6 years in 1985. North Korea appears to have invested considerable effort and money in developing a health care system. It includes care for nonworking-age citizens. Basic food supplies are heavily subsidized and rationed. The proportion of rice in the grain ration has been steadily reduced, with grains considered less desirable, such as millet or barley, being substituted. Reportedly because quality foods are difficult to obtain, jobs in food-handling industries are highly prized. Foreign visitors have noted that North Koreans appear adequately fed. The World Bank estimated in 1981 that the calorie supply available for consumption was 129 percent of nutritional requirements.

The party, government, and military elite enjoy significant economic privileges, such as access to special stores and medical facilities, better housing, and better education, which are not available to ordinary citizens.

The North Korean Government provides 11 years of compulsory free education to its citizens and claims to have eliminated illiteracy. The primary school enrollment ratios for 1976 were 96.3 percent for females and 101 percent for males, for a combined ratio of 98.5 percent.

There is no data available on minimum age for employment of children, minimum wages, maximum hours of work, or occupational safety and health.

The Constitution states that "women hold equal social status and rights with men." Few women have reached high levels of the party or the Government. Women are represented proportionally in the labor force, and personnel in small factories are predominantly women.

REPUBLIC OF KOREA

President Chun Doo Hwan dominates the political scene in the Republic of Korea. The elected legislature has limited power but considerable influence on public opinion. President Chun, a former army general, assumed power with military support in 1980, at which time martial law was declared and civil disturbances in Kwangju were harshly confronted. The Constitution was adopted by referendum in October 1980 under strict martial law conditions, leading many Koreans to question the referendum's fairness. At the time of the next presidential election, in late 1987 or early 1988, President Chun has promised to step down to provide for a peaceful and constitutional change of power.

Korea's traditional sociopolitical ideology, Confucianism, emphasizes order and conformity, as well as a subordinate role for women. This thinking retains great strength, coexisting uneasily with Western democratic ideals.

Citing this tradition and faced with a heavily armed Communist North Korea that once invaded the South and that remains extremely hostile to it, successive South Korean governments have given top priority to maintaining external and internal security, implemented in part by the large and well-organized security forces. Many Koreans have charged throughout the years that the very real threat from the North was also used as a pretext to suppress internal opposition politics, despite the democratic ideals professed by all South Korean leaders.

Koreans enjoy considerable personal freedom, including economic and religious freedom and broad rights to pursue private interests. Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press, in practice both are abridged.

During the past 20 years, Korea's export-oriented, mixed economy has achieved one of the world's highest growth rates and a twentyfold increase in per capita gross national product (GNP). The population is urbanized and well educated. Abject poverty has been largely eliminated. The rapid growth of the economy has created a growing middle class with increasing access to education and wealth. They have joined with other groups to become a strong voice for fuller political participation and greater freedom to express political views.

Human rights issues as well as "democratization" issues were the focus of greater public discussion and debate than in recent years. There was some progress in the human rights field in the early months of 1985, continuing the trend of 1984. The National Assembly election held on February 12 was widely regarded as among the most democratic in the Republic's history, with candidates freely criticizing the Government at large rallies. Press coverage was frank and lively. The election resulted in a new party, supported by leading opposition politicians, becoming the largest opposition party in the Assembly since the Republic's founding.

In March a statutory political ban originally applied to 567 politicians was lifted on the remaining 14 persons affected, including prominent dissident leaders Kim Young Sam and Kim Dae Jung. (The political activities of Kim Dae Jung and some other politicians remained restricted, however, by other legal provisions.) At the same time, Kim Dae Jung was freed from the house arrest imposed on him on his return to Korea one month earlier. Nine political prisoners were released in an amnesty on May 27. Under the Government's "campus autonomy" policy, the formation of independent student councils was permitted and police stayed off campus as students began the most active semester of student protest since 1980.

The Government soon responded heavily to the newly assertive opposition and the increased student activism, initiating a new wave of repression of dissent. Political tension remained high throughout the remainder of the year. On several occasions journalists were detained for writing politically sensitive articles. There were credible reports of torture or physical intimidation of several journalists and dissidents. After the May 23-26 student sit-in at the U.S. Information Service library in Seoul, the Government returned to its pre-1984 practice of arresting and trying student protest leaders, and police entered campuses readily to stop demonstrations. During the fall semester, student protests became increasingly violent. The Government reacted by arresting some or all of those involved in the more violent protests, raising the number of students in prison at the end of the year to over 400, the largest number since 1980. The Government announced that it was considering a plan to send activist students to 6-month-long ideological reeducation centers, but it backed off because of widespread opposition.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Reports of torture or cruel treatment in 1985 increased significantly over 1984. The Constitution prohibits torture, and the Government insists that it has issued injunctions against it and that these are strictly enforced and violations sternly punished. Nonetheless, there were credible reports of torture, such as that of an antigovernment youth activist who was subjected to torture while under police detention in September, and reliable reports of three senior Korean journalists who were detained and beaten by security officials for breaking a government embargo on a news story. Korean human rights groups and political opposition leaders also made plausible charges that a number of students and other prisoners in politically related cases were subjected to various degrees of physical maltreatment including beatings, sleep and food deprivation, electric shock, and forced water intake during police interrogations in the latter half of 1985. The Government publicly denied that any of these prisoners had been mistreated.

On February 26, 1985, the Supreme Court upheld a lower court's acquittal of a woman whose conviction for murder had been based on a confession which she later said had been made as a result of police torture. She was awarded the equivalent of about $29,500 in compensation from the State. Court sources say some cases were prosecuted in 1985 under a law adopted by the National Assembly in 1983 increasing sentences for those convicted of killing or injuring through torture.

The use of excessive force by the police has proven to be a pervasive and ingrained problem, despite some high-level efforts to reduce or eliminate it. Rioters have been beaten on apprehension, often by plainclothes police. Charges of police beatings in nonpolitical cases occur fairly frequently and are sometimes reported in the press. There were reports in 1985 that police were using a stronger form of tear gas to break up student and other unauthorized demonstrations which caused skin blisters on those who came into direct contact with it.

Conditions in Korean correctional institutions are austere, especially in winter as cells are not heated. Discipline is strict. Under normal circumstances, convicts are not subjected to physical punishment, but prisoners who break rules or protest conditions are sometimes beaten. There were reports that 19 political prisoners transferred to Taegu Prison in July were beaten severely when they protested overcrowded conditions.

Prisoners may receive visits only from their lawyers and immediate families. Their mail is monitored and sometimes censored. There does not seem to be a difference between the treatment of political and non-political prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrest warrants are required by law but are sometimes not produced at the time of arrest in politically related cases. In 1985 the Supreme Court ruled that police may not detain persons for more than 48 hours without arrest warrants. An indictment must be issued within 30 days after arrest. Within 40 days after making an arrest, the police must notify an arrested person's family of his detention and whereabouts. The police normally wait at least several days, and occasionally more than 40 days, before making notification. The Constitution guarantees the right of prompt legal assistance and the right to request court review in case of arrest.

Habeas corpus, not traditional in Korean law, was introduced after World War II, abolished in the 1970's, and reintroduced in 1980. It does not apply to those charged with violations of the National Security Act or laws punishable by at least 5 years' imprisonment, which includes most politically related offenses. There is a system of bail, but it does not apply to offenses punishable by 10 or more years' imprisonment. In 1985 the Government adopted a new policy to compensate persons held for questioning but who are subsequently found to be innocent by prosecutors.

Dissidents who openly criticize the Government are sometimes picked up and detained for short periods and then released. There were several instances in 1985 of journalists who had written politically sensitive articles being detained for short periods, usually overnight, by security forces.

From time to time, the security services have not only detained persons accused of violating laws on political dissent but have also increased surveillance of, or put under various forms of house arrest, those they think intend to violate the laws. In the longest continuous application of such restrictions in 1985, opposition politician Kim Dae Jung was not permitted to leave his home for about 1 month after his return to Korea from the United States in February 1985. Kim and others were also confined to their homes on several other occasions for briefer periods. In the latter half of 1985 the Government arrested and charged with National Security Law violations about 80 students and other Koreans associated with student and youth organizations the Government characterized as pro-Communist and/or pro-North Korean; about 60 of these had been convicted or remained under detention awaiting trial at the end of 1985. Government critics claim that, in many of these cases, the National Security Law was misused to suppress domestic, particularly student, dissent.

For persons deemed "socially dangerous," the law allows preventive detention under provisions of the Social Protection and Social Stability Laws. Neither provision affords the accused the benefit of legal counsel or appeal. Under the Social Protection Law, a judicial panel may order preventive detention for a fixed term of 2 years, which can be extended by the panel for additional 2-year periods. The Social Stability Law allows for a preventive detention term of 7 to 10 years. In the city of Chongju there exists a "preventive custody center" where prisoners judged to be insufficiently repentant are held following the completion of their original prison sentences. Soh Joon Shik, whose original 7-year sentence ran out in 1978, is one of two political prisoners believed to be held in this facility. The Government has not released figures on the total number of persons under preventive detention.

There were no reports in 1985 of forced labor as defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO).

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees many rights to defendants: The right to presumption of innocence, the right against self-incrimination, freedom from ex-post facto laws and double jeopardy, the right to a speedy trial, and the right to legal counsel. These rights are generally observed. Trials, with some exceptions, must be held within 6 months of arrest. In Seoul, trials usually begin within a month after indictment.

The President appoints the members of the Supreme Court, whose Chief Justice in turn appoints lower-level judges. The Chief Justice serves a 5-year term. The judiciary is considered independent in ordinary criminal and civil cases but much less so in politically sensitive cases. In 1985 the Chief Justice was criticized in opposition and legal circles for transferring several judges to less desirable positions, allegedly because they had ruled in favor of defendants in cases involving student protesters or had complained about the treatment of their colleagues who were accused of being too lenient toward student defendants. The Korean Bar Association called for the Chief Justice's resignation; an impeachment sponsored by the opposition was voted down in the National Assembly.

In several politically sensitive trials in 1985, as in the trial of students who seized the U.S. Information Service (USIS) Library in May, public attendance was limited, and the defendants sometimes were removed from the courtroom for attempting to disrupt the proceedings by shouting slogans and singing. Judges generally allowed great scope for examination of witnesses by both prosecution and defense, but they often denied defense requests to call witnesses to discuss the political or ideological leanings of the defendants, even when the prosecution had introduced evidence on such topics.

Trials are usually open to the public, but trial documents are not part of the public record. Charges against defendants in the courts are clearly stated, with the exception that, in lengthy and complex indictments, the relationship between specific acts alleged and violations of specific sections of the penal code may not always be clearly drawn. In cases involving a mixture of political and criminal charges this can bring into question the fairness of the proceedings. The same courts try political and ordinary criminal cases. The military courts do not try civilians. Defendants have the right of appeal in felony cases, a right which is often exercised and frequently results in substantial reductions in sentences. Death sentences are automatically appealed. The list of political prisoners maintained by the Human Rights Committee (HRC) of the National Council of Churches hovered around 100 names throughout the first 5 months of 1985. The list grew to around 700 names by November as the Government continued its crackdown on activist students begun in the aftermath of the USIS Library seizure, but the number had dropped to around 600 by the end of December. The HRC includes on its list persons indicted but not yet tried for politically-related offenses as well as those already convicted; this list contains the names of some persons who have advocated or used violence. The Minister of Justice reported to the National Assembly in October 1985 that there are no prisoners of conscience in the Republic of Korea.

Of the 600 names on the HRC list, more than 400 are university students. About 30 people on the HRC's list were charged with illegal labor actions; several were farmers charged with illegal assembly and demonstration. The list also includes 40 or so persons, many of whom were Korean residents in Japan, accused of espionage for North Korea.

Not included in the HRC political prisoner list are students and others briefly detained but not indicted in connection with student and labor demonstrations during 1985. According to government statistics, between May and October police referred over 1,000 students to summary court where they were charged with minor offenses, and sentenced to a maximum of 29 days' detention. Some students receiving summary judgments chose to exercise their right to formal trials.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Many political and religious dissidents are subjected to surveillance by the security forces. During politically sensitive periods, this surveillance by one or more security agencies may increase or a form of house arrest may be imposed. There have also been charges of telephone tapping and opening or interception of correspondence. Koreans who meet with foreigners, particularly with journalists and foreign diplomats, are sometimes questioned afterwards. In the aftermath of the seizure by students of the USIS library in May, police tried to stop relatives of the students involved and others from meeting U.S. Embassy officials.

While the Constitution requires a warrant issued by a judge upon request of prosecutor for search and seizure in a residence, the police at times force their way into private homes without warrants. During politically sensitive periods, the police and security force presence in city centers and near university campuses is very heavy. Citizens, particularly students, are frequently stopped, questioned, and searched.

Traditional Korean police practice requires police commanders to know a good deal about the personal and business affairs of all residents in their jurisdictions. This system is effective in crime control, and urban residents generally credit it with keeping their streets safe. By contrast, the presence of police informer networks on college campuses with the primary purpose of keeping track of political activities has been a key complaint among students, including those who are not politically active.

In most other respects the Government honors the right of personal privacy and the integrity of the home and family. Parental rights to educate children are broad, and restrictions on study in foreign-administered schools (whether in Korea or overseas), originally imposed to force wealthy Koreans to involve themselves in the nation's social and educational development, have been relaxed in recent years. The State rarely seeks to intervene in such inherently personal decisions as marriage, choice of vocation, and formation of social and familial ties. However, persons thought to have politically suspect backgrounds are denied some forms of employment and advancement, particularly in government, press, and education. In 1985, Korean newspapers reported that a number of teachers and college graduates had been denied jobs in public schools solely because of their past involvement in student protest activities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although freedom of speech and press are guaranteed by the Constitution, in practice the expression of opposition viewpoints is limited, sometimes severely. Government critics say that laws such as the Basic Press Law, under which media organizations are licensed and permitted to operate, and criminal code provisions against the spreading of "rumors which eventually disturb peace and order" and "defiling the state" are used to muzzle and punish dissident views. Opposition political parties have called for the repeal or reform of the Basic Press Law.

During the February 1985 National Assembly election campaign, opposition candidates made speeches before large crowds in which they were highly critical of the Government. Most Korean and foreign observers alike agreed the campaign was characterized by the most outspoken political debate permitted in the Republic of Korea in many years. Print media coverage was extensive, although television reporting reflected much more government influence. When the new National Assembly was inaugurated, it continued to be characterized by a breaking of old taboos on speaking out on sensitive political topics, including thinly-veiled challenges to the Government's legitimacy stemming from the serious civil disturbance in Kwangju in 1980, policy toward South-North Korean dialogue, and constitutional revision, all of which received print media coverage. The government party, concerned about increasingly sharp opposition criticism, sought with limited success to precensor opposition politicians' remarks. After several opposition politicians complained of government intimidation when they or their aides were summoned for questioning about critical remarks made on the Assembly floor, the Government promised it would respect Assemblymen's rights to free speech. Details of the most critical speeches were generally not reported in the press, and government party speeches received heavier coverage. Nonetheless, newspapers did report in greater detail than in many years about opposition views on previously taboo political subjects.

The domestic media engage in self-censorship, according to verbal or written guidelines the Government regularly gives to editors. Journalists who object to or ignore these guidelines or criticize the guidance system have been picked up for questioning and on occasion dismissed or sent out of the country on assignment; in one case in 1985 journalists were beaten. Nonetheless, the domestic media, notably newspapers and magazines, became noticeably more outspoken during and in the aftermath of the February National Assembly election. An edition of a prestigious monthly magazine carrying an article on the 1980 civil disturbances in Kwangju was confiscated by the Government shortly after its publication, and the article's author was interrogated by security officials. In late 1985 about 30 reporters, mostly from provincial papers, were fired for corruption on orders from the Ministry of Culture and Information. There were reports that at least some were in fact fired for holding views critical of the Government. In December a visiting U.S. Washington Times journalist was ordered out of the country temporarily, reportedly for writing an article on an alleged meeting between North and South Korean leaders.

The early months of 1985 saw the publication of an increasing number of books and magazines by dissident religious, political, and cultural figures. In May police confiscated books they considered dangerous on the grounds of being "leftist" or "encouraging revolution." According to the Minister of Culture and Information, in October 11,000 copies of 395 books were confiscated.

Twenty teachers who contributed to a magazine criticizing the Government's education policy were arrested or fired, and the magazine's publishing company was closed under the Basic Press Law. The Basic Press Law was also used against a student charged with editing a "seditious" publication; at least seven other students were charged with National Security Law violations in connection with publications said to be "sympathetic to Communism and serving the interests of the enemy." In July police raided an art exhibition and jailed five artists for a week, saying the paintings and prints there were objectionable on ideological grounds. A Christian youth activist received a suspended sentence for "defiling the state" by distributing dissident leaflets to foreign journalists.

Academic freedom is subject to some political limitations. In fall 1985 a group of professors who signed a petition opposing the proposed campus stabilization law came under official pressure to retract their views.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

A number of specified categories of assembly, including those considered likely to undermine public order or cause social unrest, are prohibited by the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations. The law also requires that demonstrations of all types and outdoor political assemblies be reported in advance to the police. Violation of the law carries a maximum sentence of 7 years' imprisonment or a fine of about $3,750. Under this law, police have at times intervened and broken up meetings. Most peaceful nonpolitical assemblies take place entirely without official supervision or restriction. However, meetings of dissidents are monitored and sometimes prevented, often by placing the scheduled speaker under some form of house arrest.

The Law on Assembly and Demonstrations was most often used in 1985 against student demonstrators. According to a government report submitted to the National Assembly in late October, a total of 1,923 students had been taken to police stations for involvement in demonstrations on and off campus since the May USIS Library seizure. Of that number, 309 were charged with violating the Law on Assembly and Demonstrations and/or laws punishing violent acts. Another 104 were booked without physical detention. About 1,000 were summarily tried on minor charges, and the remainder were released with warnings.

In September two opposition National Assemblymen and several other oppositionists were indicted under the Law on Assembly and Demonstration after they were stopped by police for shouting protest slogans against the Government at the gates of a Seoul campus on the day of a scheduled protest meeting. In October the lawyers for some of the students charged under the Law on Assembly and Demonstration requested a review by the Constitution Committee of the legitimacy part of the law, asserting that the vagueness of one clause rendered it unconstitutional. The Supreme Court ruled against the claim, stating that the right to assembly and protest is limited.

Under the Constitution, workers are guaranteed the right to independent association, to bargain collectively, and to collective action. These rights are circumscribed by law and practice and do not extend to workers employed by the Government, public utilities, defense-related industries, or firms "that exercise great influence on the national economy." In the past the last category has applied primarily to heavy industry.

The single national labor federation, the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU), and its 16 national affiliate unions are not controlled by the Government, but their activities are limited by law and subject to government interference. In 1985, five ranking FKTU officials were forced to resign under government pressure, reportedly because they were either held responsible for or did not agree with the Government's tough policy on recent labor disputes. Labor organizations are forbidden by law to support politicians or political parties, though the FKTU does lobby National Assemblymen, and Assemblymen often attend labor gatherings.

According to the FKTU, after an increase in 1984, dues-paying union membership in 1985 remained at about 800,000 workers, about 10 percent of the full-time work force. Ministry of Labor figures, based on reports submitted by individual unions, place total union membership at slightly over 1 million.

Some FKTU-supported revisions to labor regulations, approved in 1985, permitted a larger role for the Federation in local affairs. The FKTU continued to press for broader revision of the labor law, as did the main opposition party.

The FKTU is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and its constituent unions are affiliated with recognized international trade union federations. The Republic of Korea has observer status at the International Labor Organization.

All local unions must be organized within individual enterprises, creating a structure of thousands of individual unions, most of them small and weak. Direct participation in local unions' bargaining activities by outside agencies is forbidden. The FKTU and its constituent national unions can and sometimes do bargain on behalf of the locals and conduct education programs, but only with government and employer approval. Religious labor ministries such as the Catholic Young Christian Workers and the Protestant Urban Industrial Mission are also severely limited in the assistance which they can provide the unions. Under these circumstances, government and employer influence has greatly exceeded that of unions in setting wages and resolving other major labor issues.

Collective actions and strikes, though technically legal, are strongly discouraged. The Government used the Law on Assembly and Demonstration on a number of occasions in connection with workers' and farmers' rallies. Despite the legal restrictions and other obstacles, collective actions by workers, including strikes, increased in 1985. The Government charged radical student involvement in many of the disputes, saying it had identified at least 277 "disguised workers" through the end of September who had hidden their university credentials in order to "infiltrate" the workforce and "instigate" the workers to strike. Of these, 160 were fired by their employers, 97 "voluntarily" quit their jobs, and 20 are still working. In a few strikes, groups of nonstriking workers wielded pipes and stormed their workplaces to end worker sit-in's forcibly. They were not prevented by police from doing so, and many Koreans charged that the attacks were government-sponsored.

According to government statistics, the government committee charged with investigating unfair labor practices heard 227 cases in the first eight months of 1985, 205 of which involved problems with union organization and alleged employer obstructionism. The committee decided in favor of the workers in 64 cases.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state-favored religion in Korea. There is generally complete freedom of proselytizing, doctrinal teaching, and conversion. Korea both sends and receives missionaries of various faiths. Many religious groups in Korea maintain active links with coreligionists in other countries. Minority sects are not discriminated against, and adherence to a faith confers neither advantages nor disadvantages in civil, military, or official life. Churches and religious groups are subject to many of the restrictions on political activity and criticism of the Government that apply to all other institutions. On those occasions where pastors are harassed by the authorities, it is usually for religiously motivated social or political activism. One Protestant minister active in human rights issues has made plausible charges that a government security agency has sponsored efforts to disrupt his church services; other ministers have joined with him to protest what they term government infringement on religious freedom. The Government denied the charges and says the church's troubles are an internal problem. Conscientious objectors are subject to arrest.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is almost universal freedom of movement and freedom to change employment in Korea. Because Korea is one of the most densely populated countries in the world, the Government does not discourage emigration or discriminate against prospective emigrants. Most people can obtain passports, except for criminals and some persons considered politically suspect. A number of dissidents, former political prisoners, and persons banned from political activity have been allowed to travel abroad. The Government limits the number of passports issued to tourists and prospective students, citing foreign exchange considerations and the problem of unqualified students going abroad. Passports, when issued, are typically limited to 1 year, although there are exceptions in which passports are issued up to the legally maximum 5-year period of validity.

A small continuing influx of Vietnamese boat refugees is admitted to first asylum in Korea. They are cared for at a camp in Pusan by the Korean Red Cross until they can be resettled abroad. Over 700 displaced persons from Vietnam have passed through Korea in the last several years. Very few have been permanently resettled in Korea.

Korea's Constitution and statutes, as well as its traditions, concentrate political power in the President, a concentration further intensified by the support the President enjoys from the military. The President and the members of the National Assembly are the only elected officials in Korea. Under the 1980 Presidential Election Law, the President is chosen by a popularly elected electoral college of at least 5,000 members. By law, presidential campaigns are brief and candidates severely restricted in campaigning, including the amount they may spend, the number of speeches they may deliver, and the number of publications they may distribute. In the 1981 presidential election these restrictions, together with the authorities' screening of electoral college candidates, resulted in the absence of effective opposition to incumbent President Chun Doo Hwan, who won nearly unanimously. In the 1985 National Assembly election, two of the most prominent opposition politicians, Kim Dae Jung and Kim Young Sam, were not allowed to participate.

The Constitution limits the President to a single 7-year term and may not be amended to allow the incumbent president to run for another term. The next presidential election will be held in late 1987 or early 1988. President Chun continued to reaffirm throughout 1985 that he intends to step down in 1988 to provide for a peaceful and constitutional transfer of power. His party, the Democratic Justice Party (DJP), has announced that it will convene in early 1987 to choose a presidential candidate. However, the main opposition party and most dissident groups are calling for a revision of the Constitution to allow for direct popular election of the president, contending that it would be less susceptible to government manipulation than the current system.

The National Assembly, although institutionally weak, acquired new importance in 1985 with the holding of elections and the emergence of a new, more outspoken opposition party. Members are directly elected and serve a 4-year term. The election law passed in 1981 provides for a proportional representation system that reserves 92 of the Assembly's 276 seats for members designated by the parties, with two-thirds of those seats awarded to the party gaining a plurality of the popular vote. The government party faced a strong challenge in the February 1985 Assembly election from a new opposition party, the New Korea Democratic Party (NKDP), formed only weeks before the election and led largely by politicians recently freed from the political ban. The government party, the Democratic Justice Party (DJP), garnered a plurality of 35.3 percent and, with its proportional representation seats, maintained a comfortable majority of 148 out of 276 Assembly seats. However, the NKDP obtained a surprising 29.2 percent of the popular vote. The former main opposition party, the Democratic Korea Party (DKP), received only 19.5 percent. Almost all of its members defected to the NKDP after the elections, boosting the NKDP's Assembly seats to 102 and making it the largest opposition party in the Republic's parliamentary history in terms of Assembly seats held. The campaign included outspoken criticism of the Government and its leaders by the opposition at large rallies and calls for constitutional revision to allow for direct presidential elections. Voter turnout was 84 percent, the highest since 1958. Press coverage was extensive, television less so.

In the aftermath of the election, the DJP pledged to practice the politics of "dialogue" and to "reflect the people's wishes as expressed in the election." The NKDP took a more aggressive stance than that adopted by other opposition parties since 1980, taking the Government to task on sensitive issues including the handling of the 1980 civil disturbances in Kwangju and constitutional reform.

On March 6, 1985, the Government lifted the political ban on the 14 people still affected by it. However, several persons, including prominent opposition figure Kim Dae Jung, although freed from the political ban, were still prohibited from joining a political party or running for office because they were under suspended sentences from prior convictions.

Women are free to vote, become government officials, and run for the National Assembly. Women hold seven Assembly seats, all but two appointed by their parties. In practice, however, the power structure remains male-dominated, and in many significant respects the legal system and social custom strongly discriminate against women. There is some pressure to address women's rights; in recognition of this, the ruling party has formed an ad hoc committee to study the issue.

The Republic of Korea does not belong to any international human rights bodies and usually does not welcome outside involvement in the human rights area, although government officials have allowed the visits of and met with representatives of international human rights bodies, including Amnesty International and Asia Watch. Prison authorities rebuffed attempts by human rights groups and opposition politicians to investigate conditions in prisons.

There are no government agencies charged with the protection of human rights, although political parties and the National Assembly have committees which are concerned with oversight of some aspects of the issue. In March 1985 opposition party leaders held up the convening of the National Assembly to negotiate the release of prisoners convicted on political and security charges. While the negotiations did not result in the release of many prisoners, they did represent the most open discussion of the issue in several years and received extensive press coverage in Korea. The autumn session of the National Assembly saw opposition interpellation of government ministers on human rights issues including torture and arbitrary arrest. Although the Government rejected calls for a special Assembly committee to investigate human rights abuses, especially torture, the opposition party and other opposition groups dispatched investigative teams, held press conferences, formed special committees, and provided legal defense in connection with numerous human rights issues.

A number of politically nonaffiliated private organizations have long been active in human rights, chiefly the Human Rights Committee of the Korean National Council of Churches, the Catholic Justice and Peace Committee, and the Korea Legal Aid Center in Seoul. The Committees and other human rights organizations submit petitions to the Government and make their views known both inside and outside Korea. People working with these groups are frequently questioned and sometimes detained by the security services, though apparently none have been arrested in the past several years.

Amnesty International temporarily closed its office in Seoul in 1985, over the objections of its Korean chapter, on the grounds that the group's independent activities were not possible under present conditions. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International remained concerned about the imprisonment of people for peaceful expression of their views. While it welcomed the release in the early part of 1984 of over 200 students, it was concerned about an increase in the use of short-term detention for people participating in public protests and about several well-known critics of the Government being placed under house arrest. It noted that it had received fewer reports of torture during interrogation, but that there were numerous reports of police violence against demonstrators both before and after arrest. Freedom House rated South Korea "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Republic of Korea's population in 1985 was 42.6 million. Over the last 20 years the population growth rate has decreased from 2.6 to 1.5 percent, due in part to concerted efforts by the Government to encourage voluntary family planning. During the past 20 years, Korea's export-oriented, mixed economy has achieved one of the highest growth rates in the world, with per capita GNP rising from $100 in 1965 to $2,010 in 1983. A notable feature of this rapid growth has been the relative evenness of income distribution, though many Koreans characterize the gap between rich and poor as worsening. The percentage of the population below absolute poverty was estimated to be 18 percent in urban areas and 11 percent in rural areas. There is no economic discrimination based on race or religion. The right to own property, both alone and in association with others, is recognized in law and practice.

Improved health care and nutrition have increased life expectancy to 68.2 years, while infant mortality has declined to 29.6 per 1,000 live births. In 1980, an estimated 78 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water, and caloric supply per person was 126 percent of minimum nutritional requirements.

Education is highly valued in Korean society. Ninety-six percent of the population was estimated to be literate in 1980-82. Primary school education is universal for both sexes, and over 90 percent of elementary school students enter secondary school. About 34 percent of all high school graduates pass competitive entrance exams and enter college. There is great social mobility based on merit in education and employment.

Chapter V of the Labor Standards Law governs the employment of minor and female workers. Under this provision, minors under age 13 must have a special permit issued by the Ministry of Labor to be employed. Minors under age 18 must have a parent's or guardian's written approval in order to work, and they are prohibited from night work without special permission from the Ministry of Labor. The law requires that employers of 30 or more minors provide educational facilities or arrange scholarship funds for them. Employment of minors is widespread, particularly in family-operated enterprises and in some labor-intensive industries, and abuses of legal protections are common.

The Constitution states that the Government "shall endeavor to promote the employment of workers and to guarantee optimum wages through social and economic means." Standards of working conditions are to be "determined by law in such a way as to guarantee human dignity." The Labor Standards Law provides for a maximum workweek of 60 hours with mutual consent of employer and employee, a paid day of rest during the workweek, compensation for overtime and holiday work, paid holidays, and annual leave. There are no exceptions to working conditions standards for industries established in export-processing zones. Recent statistics indicate that the average full-time worker spends 54.4 hours per week on the job. Korea has no minimum wage system, but the Government has pledged to institute one as part of the 5-year economic plan beginning in 1987. Meanwhile, the Government is attempting to persuade the employers of the 300,000 workers earning less than 100,000 won ($112) per month to raise wages. The Government announced in late 1985 that its efforts had resulted in a decrease of 112,000 workers in the below 100,000 won per month category.

Responding to a series of labor disputes highlighting criticism of its labor policy, the Government promised in 1985 to use stronger measures, including fines and imprisonment, to curb employer abuses such as delayed wage payments, illegal firings, and violations of regulations on working conditions. The Minister of Labor reported in late 1985 that 24 employers were arrested in the first half of 1985 for failure to pay wages and for physical abuse of employees. During that period, the Government reported uncovering 16,000 cases of employer wrongdoing, including nearly 2,500 cases of non-payment of wages, about 150 cases of unfair dismissal, and 40 violations of safety and health standards.

In the first half of 1985, 685 job-related deaths and 64,000 injuries were reported by government sources. In 1984 there were 1,667 deaths and 156,133 injuries reported in connection with industrial accidents. A government study cited lack of adequate safety precautions as a major cause of industrial casualties in about 10 percent of all cases. The Government has mandated insurance to cover industrial accidents at places of business employing 10 or more workers. The 1981 revision of the Industrial Accident Compensation Law covers job-related medical costs, sick leave benefits, disability benefits, and other costs.

Women's rights constitute a problem area. Some progress has been made--the family law was revised in 1960 and 1979--but critics contend that the law is still inconsistent with Korean constitutional guarantees of sexual equality. Women do not have equal rights with men in passing nationality to their children, nor do they have equal rights with regard to child custody in divorce cases. Women's rights groups are campaigning for changes in these and some other points of the family law.

Women do enjoy full access to educational opportunities. They are increasingly represented, though still largely at entry levels, in the military, the police, and in private industry. Other areas are more problematic. As of 1985, only 24 women had ever passed the bar examination. Five had passed the National Administration Examination, given for higher level civil service jobs. In general, women are not protected against discrimination in hiring, pay, or advancement. Some members of the National Assembly, however, are trying to focus more attention on women's rights.

LAOS

The Lao People's Democratic Republic (LPDR) is ruled by a Communist Government established in December 1975 after an insurgency of 20 years supported by North Vietnam. The sole political party, the Lao People's Revolutionary Party, takes its political ideology from Marx, Lenin, and Ho Chi Minh. It is dependent on Vietnamese and Soviet military and economic support to retain power. Laos' approximately 3.6 million ethnically diverse people, scattered over more than 91,000 square miles of rugged terrain, have no common national history and share few common traditions. National institutions remain weak. There is no constitution or codified body of law. No national elections have been held since the establishment of the regime.

The Government's insecurity and efforts to establish a Communist political and economic structure based on the Soviet and Vietnamese models have resulted in numerous human rights violations. Regional and domestic political tension, scattered anti-government resistance activity, and poor economic conditions continue, contributing to a siege mentality on the part of the narrowly-based Lao leadership. The Government is faced with a number of resistance groups which field as many as several thousand fighters seeking its overthrow. The approximately 50,000 Vietnamese troops in Laos regularly conduct operations with the Lao People's Army (LPA) against resistance groups and serve as the ultimate guarantor of the Government's survival. The state security apparatus, which reinforces central control through threats, fear, intimidation, and imprisonment, is a primary source of human rights abuses. Its power over the lives of Lao citizens is legally unrestricted.

Laos is an extremely poor and underdeveloped country. Although Laos apparently met its food needs with a successful 1984/85 crop year, nutritional levels remain barely adequate. Most large businesses were nationalized after 1975 and efforts during 1985 to reduce further the scope of private trade have disrupted supplies.

Human rights violations continued in 1985, and the individual remained subject to the arbitrary control of the state and the Communist Party. Compared with the period just after the Communist takeover, there have been a few limited improvements in the human rights situation since 1983. In 1985, few people were apparently sent to "re-education camps," some were released, and the conditions of some who remain under detention reportedly improved. However, serious abuses such as arbitrary arrests and detention without trial still exist. Government pressures against private economic activity increased. The totalitarian nature of the regime is mitigated somewhat by the importance of humane values in traditional Lao culture.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Refugee reports continued in 1985 of villagers, particularly Hmong tribespeople, being killed or made ill by government and/or Vietnamese forces using toxic weapons. However, such reports were fewer than in 1983 and 1984 and have not been verified. There are occasional reports that Lao government and Vietnamese patrols have fatally shot persons fleeing from Laos and those entering the country illegally, usually smugglers or suspected members of the anti-government resistance.

An unknown number of people are killed annually in combined Lao/Vietnamese military operations against resistance forces. Many of the insurgents appear to be former Royal Lao Army troops and Hmong tribesmen. Both sides are reported to use brutal tactics, with the anti-government forces attempting ambush and assassination of Lao, Vietnamese, and other Communist military and civilian personnel. There are recurrent reports of lethal attacks in isolated areas on vehicles bearing government officials and on buses. These are attributed to resistance elements but have also involved ordinary robberies. Resistance groups in 1985 also reportedly killed a few aid experts from Communist countries. Official policy calls for the execution of resistance leaders, but no such executions were reported in 1985.

Although there were numerous cases of secret arrest and removal of persons to "re-education" camps in the first years of the present regime, disappearances have been reported only infrequently in the last several years and not at all in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reports of torture for the past six years. Some "re-education" prisoners continue to be held in harsh conditions. Former prisoners have reported that punishment for misbehavior could include brutal public beatings, shackling, deprivation of food, and sometimes, for those who tried to escape, execution. Some inmates died from malnutrition. Lao government officials have publicly denied reports of mistreatment of persons in the "re-education camps."

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Lao Government continues to maintain a number of "re-education camps" in which persons associated with the previous Government are imprisoned. Firm figures are not available, but it is believed that 1,000 to 3,000 persons remain imprisoned.

Since 1979, conditions in most of the "re-education camps" have reportedly improved, and a number of camps have been closed. Most detainees are now living in a kind of internal exile under conditions that--except for the severe restriction on their freedom of movement--generally are no worse than those of poor Lao living in the countryside. Many have reportedly been assigned to collective farms or construction units in areas near their former camps. Some are on probation or cannot arrange necessary internal travel documents. Others who have lost property and families are reported to have chosen to remain in areas near the camps to begin new lives. Amnesty International estimated, in its 1985 Report, that as many as 6,000 individuals live under some form of restriction and it has adopted more than 40 such political detainees as prisoners of conscience.

LAOS

In 1985, government officials claimed, as they had in 1984, that nearly all soldiers and officials sent to "re-education camps" in 1975-76 had been "released" and that "only a few" people remained under detention. Some government officials contend that all "re-education camps" have been closed. In June 1985 the Council of Ministers reportedly adopted a resolution authorizing the return of detainees to their homes, but without specifying any dates of release. In 1985 the Government permitted at least 50 "re-education camp" prisoners to return to Vientiane.

Those accused of hostility to the regime or of what the Government calls "socially undesirable habits," such as prostitution, drug abuse, idleness, and "wrong thought" are sent to "rehabilitation" centers, usually without trial. Most of these persons have been allowed to return to their homes after periods ranging from a few months to several years of hard labor, political indoctrination, and admission of guilt. In 1985, there were reports that some unemployed and idle youths in Vientiane and other urban areas were rounded up and sent against their will to the countryside to work on public works projects, in some cases to join "patriotic youth" groups also working on such projects.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

No code of law exists in Laos and there is no guarantee of due process. The Government is still revising the pre-1975 law code and rehabilitating the court system. It has promulgated interim rules and regulations for the arrest and trial of those accused of specific crimes, including armed resistance to the Government. Although the regulations allow an accused person to make a statement presenting his side of the case, they provide no real opportunity for the accused to defend himself and do not permit bail or use of an attorney. Rather, the Government has issued instructions on how to investigate, prosecute, and punish wrongdoers. These instructions are applied capriciously and inconsistently. People can be arrested on the unsupported accusations of others and detained while the accusations are investigated, without being informed of the charges or the person making the accusations. Those arrested are not always informed of the charges against them, and investigations often take a long time unless family members and friends take a strong interest in the case. Government officials and their families can easily influence the judgments reached. There is some provision for appeal, although important political cases tried by "people's courts" are without an appeal process. Amnesty International reported that seven persons sentenced to prison in 1983 were permitted informally to appeal their convictions and were released in 1984. Death sentences must be approved by the Council of Ministers. Lao regulations call for judgment to be given in public. This is, in effect, a public announcement of the sentence and not a public trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Search and seizure are authorized by the security bureaus themselves rather than by an impartial judicial authority, and government regulations, which are not always followed, provide little protection for the persons affected. International and domestic mail is selectively opened on a routine basis. Mail from China and non-Communist countries is particularly suspect. Telephone calls are frequently monitored. Privately-owned land may not be sold but can be inherited. Houses, appliances, and other private property can be sold only with difficulty in most cases, since the possession of large amounts of cash in this poor country draws immediate government suspicion. Inheritances cannot be passed on to relatives who have left the country as refugees and acquired another nationality. Only government officials and others whom the Government determines have a professional need are allowed to possess non-Communist foreign newspapers, magazines, and other publications. The Government makes no attempt to stop Lao from watching Thai television or listening to foreign radio stations such as the Voice of America. The state security apparatus monitors family life extensively through a system of neighborhood wardens and informers.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Lao press is owned by the Government and party and used to disseminate official positions. Written or spoken opposition to the Government is not permitted. Persons who have engaged in such activities have been jailed. Most Lao are intimidated from discussion or association with foreigners. Academic freedom does not exist.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government controls all meetings and, except for religious and athletic events, organizes them. Individuals do not have the right to join together to promote causes not sponsored by the regime or to protest government policies. All associations--such as those for youth, women, workers, and a "peace organization"--are government-controlled and authorized "mass organizations." These are organized to exercise government control and disseminate government policy. All professional groups are organized by the party, and their leadership is ordinarily drawn from party ranks.

Trade unions are organized as "mass organizations" of the party without the right to engage in collective bargaining. They have no real influence in determining working conditions.

Lao associations are permitted to maintain relations with like-minded organizations in other countries, particularly those in Communist countries. Ordinarily Lao citizens are permitted association or contact with foreigners only in rare and unusual circumstances, usually involving their work.

c. Freedom of Religion

Nearly all Lao are Buddhists or, in the case of some hill tribes, animist. After 1975, the Government took over some Buddhist and Christian places of worship for use as political indoctrination centers or warehouses. This practice appears to have ceased, however, and construction of Buddhist temples has been observed. Buddhist temples have become more active, and the number of monks has increased.

In official statements, the Government has recognized the right of the people to religious belief as well as the contributions religion can make to the development of the country. However, many Lao believe that the Government has begun a long-term effort to subvert the role of religion, in part because it considers the maintenance of temples and the activities of monks non-productive. This effort includes carefully controlling the education of young monks and compelling the Buddhist clergy to propagate some elements of Marxist-Leninist doctrine. Monks are the only remaining social group still entitled to special honorific terms of address, and even high party and government officials continue to use them. Religious festivals are permitted to take place without hindrance. Young people regularly enter into religious orders for short periods. Links may be maintained with coreligionists and religious associations only in countries approved by the Government, usually other Communist countries. Traditional links to Thai Buddhists are no longer permitted. In theory, missionaries are not banned from entering Laos to proselytize, but in most cases they have been denied permission. Many top party officials still participate in religious ceremonies, but the military are forbidden even to have Buddhist funerals.

Roman Catholics and Protestants are permitted to worship without harassment, but the activities of their churches are closely observed. Since 1975, they have not been permitted to operate schools, seminaries, or associations, although some short-term training sessions for local Protestant church leaders have been permitted. In 1985 a few church leaders remained under detention, allegedly for anti-government activity. In addition, two priests were confined to "re-education camps" with no charges made against them. Catholic Church officials visited Laos in 1985 to meet with local Catholic Church leaders. The Government has taken steps, including the use of media, to persuade hill tribe minority groups to abandon their "old-fashioned" animist beliefs.

Lao citizens must obtain permission from the authorities for all internal travel of any distance and in all cases when crossing provincial boundaries. A curfew exists in the capital and other major cities. Its rules change from time to time, as does its enforcement. Government officials have cited threats of "disorders" created by "reactionary" elements as the reason for the restrictions.

Foreign travel is permitted for officials, students in government-approved programs, and some others who have access to foreign exchange. Lao are rarely permitted to study or train in non-Communist countries even at their own expense. Exit visas are required and are difficult to obtain, but in 1983, 1984, and 1985 there were noticeable increases in the number of Lao permitted to travel abroad. Border crossing permits are available for those with business in Thailand. Although the Government has said that those wishing to emigrate will be allowed to do so, as a practical matter legal emigration is rarely authorized for ethnic Lao and, when it is, reportedly requires substantial bribes. Since 1975 over 300,000 of the Lao who have fled Laos have registered as refugees in Thailand. An unknown number of other Lao who have fled the country have simply settled in with kindred ethnic groups.

Some of those fleeing have been fired upon and killed by Lao, Vietnamese, or Thai border patrols as they attempt to cross the Mekong River. Many Lao caught seeking to leave illegally have been imprisoned, although in some cases they have only been sent to short indoctrination seminars and then released.

The Lao and Thai Governments have agreed to take back, on a case-by-case basis, those of their respective citizens who have illegally crossed into the other country and wish to return home. Since May 1980, when agreement was reached with Thailand and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) on a voluntary repatriation program, about 3,000 Lao refugees voluntarily returned to Laos under the auspices of the UNHCR. Those accepted for return receive several days of political indoctrination and are then released to return to their homes, where they are placed under the control of the village authorities. The UNHCR provides basic necessities and monitors treatment and living conditions thereafter. Perhaps as many as 5,000 to 10,000 refugees have repatriated themselves without official involvement. There is reportedly no pattern of official harassment or maltreatment of these voluntary returnees. Laos has also agreed in principle to receive back Lao citizens determined not to be entitled to refugee status by the Thai-UNHCR screening program begun in 1985.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Laos is ruled by a small elite of the Lao People's Revolutionary Party, the sole party. There is neither freedom to participate in politics outside the party nor popular choice of policies or officials. After the Communists seized power in May in 1975, but before the establishment of the present regime in December of that year, local elections were held in which voters chose from a list of candidates selected by the party. Representatives to the Lao Supreme People's Council were reportedly chosen by those local officials, although this process was not made public. Recently, Phoumi Vongvichit, Vice Chairman of the Council of Ministers, told an Australian academic that the Supreme People's Council was "elected" on December 2, 1975, by the National Congress of People's Representatives which proclaimed the LPDR. There have been no national elections. A few "by-elections" have been organized to replace representatives who have died or been transferred.

Laos has refused to cooperate with the U.N. Secretary General's investigation of the use of chemical/toxin weapons in Laos. It does not cooperate with private international organizations interested in human rights. It does occasionally permit visits by officials of international human rights organizations if the purpose of the visits is not specifically related to allegations of human rights violations. In the past, the Lao Government has permitted the UNHCR to investigate to a limited degree the status of Lao refugees voluntarily repatriated from Thailand. In 1985, a senior UNHCR official made a brief visit to Vientiane. Amnesty International in its 1985 Report stated that its main concern "is the continued restriction in remote parts of northeast and southeast Laos of large numbers of people being detained without trial since 1975 because of their alleged positions or activities under the pre-1975 government." It also expressed concern at the lack of due process or legal safeguards due to the absence of a constitution or code of law. Freedom House rates Laos as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Laos is approximately 3.6 million. Overall population growth is estimated as 2.0 percent annually. About 85 percent of the population is engaged in agriculture. The World Bank in 1983 estimated Laos' per capita gross national product (GNP) at $143. The country's economic problems are complicated by inadequate internal transport and isolation from the sea. The avowed aim of the Government is economic self-sufficiency and improved conditions for the people through a socialist transformation of the economy, including collectivization of agriculture. The Government has declared that farmers will not be forced to join collectives but continues to apply strong pressure on them to join, and economic incentives are given to those who do so. The Government has nationalized most of Laos' few industries and tried to impose strict controls on private enterprise. Limited private trade continues, however, because the Government recognizes the present limitations of the state trading system. In 1985 efforts to restrict such trade intensified.

The economy in 1985 was tied more closely to that of Vietnam by, among other things, reducing foreign trade links through Thailand and upgrading such links through Vietnam. The dollar exchange value of the kip dropped more than 30 percent between January and October. Laos continues to experience serious foreign exchange problems and has difficulty in paying its import bills for many necessities, including fuel. Natural and man-made problems continue to hold timber and coffee exports far below their potential. In addition, the Government has used these commodities and minerals to pay for barter trade with Soviet bloc countries, rather than selling them for hard currency. Partial Thai restrictions on the types of goods permitted to transit through Thailand may have played a role in these developments.

Health conditions are poor but improved marginally in 1985. In 1985, the World Bank estimated infant mortality at 116.2 per 1,000 live births, which represents a slight reduction from 1984 and a significant one from 1976 when government figures placed the rate at 204 per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth was approximately 44.66 years in 1985. According to government statistics, in 1982 there were only 226 physicians and 1,184 other medical personnel in the country. Major causes of death in Laos are gastrointestinal diseases from unsafe drinking water, malaria, respiratory infections, and malnutrition. In 1982 the daily calorie supply of the average Lao was recorded by the World Bank as being 90 percent of requirements. The Government is attempting to improve public health by training more personnel in basic health care, modernizing 13 provincial hospitals, constructing clinics in all districts, inoculating against cholera and other diseases, promoting adult education on preventive hygiene, and improving water supplies. In 1975, 100 percent of the urban but only 32 percent of the rural population had access to safe water, according to the World Bank.

LAOS

Lao authorities are continuing a campaign to reduce illiteracy and claim it has been eliminated in some provinces. The World Bank estimated the literacy rate at 43.6 percent for the period 1980-1982. The Government claims that approximately 93 percent of children aged 5-14 attend school regularly. The World Bank estimate for 1980 was 73.69 percent. Teacher training, however, has usually been rudimentary. According to some accounts, in both provincial and urban areas the time teachers must devote to supplementing their meager salaries causes them to reduce classroom hours substantially. The Government carries out an intensive program of adult education aimed at indoctrinating adults along "socialist lines."

Emphasis in higher education is placed on training technicians and engineers to work on development projects. Thousands of Lao students have been sent abroad for training in the U.S.S.R., Vietnam, and Eastern Europe. The pool of trained manpower in Laos is gradually increasing as students begin to return from abroad, but some do not find jobs in their areas of training.

Laos has set neither minimum wage, maximum workweek, nor safety or health standards for the workers in its almost entirely rural and agricultural economy. Workweeks typically fall well under forty-eight hours, with some exceptions such as during urgent road-building or construction projects. Workplace conditions are not systematically exploitative, but they sometimes fail to protect workers adequately against sickness or accident. Work permits customarily are not issued to persons under eighteen, although children frequently work with their parents in traditional occupations such as farming and shopkeeping.

The role of women in Lao society has been traditionally subservient to that of men, but discrimination is not highly pronounced. The government-controlled Lao Women's Federation has as one of its stated goals achievement of rights for woman "equal" to those of men. Lao women are currently being encouraged to take an increasing part in economic and state-controlled political activity. According to 1980 World Bank figures, the primary school enrollment ratio for girls is 80 percent of that for boys, although the literacy rate among women is only 70 percent of that among men.

Approximately half of the population in Laos is ethnic Lao, also called "lowland Lao"; 20 percent are tribal Thai; 15 percent are Phoutheung (or Kha); and other mountain tribes constitute another 15 percent (Hmong, Yao and others). The Lao Government is attempting to integrate these groups and overcome traditional antagonisms between lowland Lao and minority groups.

The Hmong are split along clan lines. Many were strongly anti-Communist, but others sided with the Communist Pathet Lao and the Vietnamese. The Government is repressive toward all groups that fought against it, especially those who continue to resist its authority by force. The Hmong tried to defend some of their tribal areas after 1975 and some continue to support anti-LPDR resistance groups. Vietnamese and Lao armed forces conduct military operations against both resistance groups, the tribally-based ones in the north and the resistance forces from lowland Lao groups, mainly in southern Laos.

LAOS

The Government wants to resettle in the lowlands some ethnic minorities who now inhabit mountainous areas where they would be under closer government control and engage in settled agricultural production. The Government has reportedly abandoned the use of force in favor of a voluntary program based on material inducements.

Deterioration in Sino-Lao relations since 1979 has resulted in continuing increased Lao Government suspicion and surveillance of local ethnic Chinese. The Government so far has not persecuted or expelled Chinese although it allows them to emigrate rather freely; in fact, the majority of Chinese resident in Laos in 1975 have since left on their own, largely for economic reasons. Those who remain have maintained Chinese schools in Vientiane and Savannkhet and Chinese associations in several provincial capitals.

MALAYSIA

Malaysia has a parliamentary system of government based on free elections contested by a number of parties representing a range of political opinion. The ruling National Front (composed of three major and several minor community-based parties) has won a two-thirds or better majority in the Federal Parliament in every election since Malaysia achieved independence, but opposition parties are active and vocal participants in the political system and have occasionally held power at the state level. Malaysia is a multiethnic society. The politically dominant Malay community comprises a bare majority of the population. There are also large Chinese and Indian minorities and many smaller communities. Most of the latter are indigenous to the East Malaysian states of Sabah and Sarawak.

A strong free market economy, abundant natural resources, and a relatively small population have helped Malaysia become one of the most prosperous of the developing countries.

Internal security in Malaysia has been seriously threatened twice. A major Communist insurrection began in 1948 and peaked in the early 1950's; it still smolders in a few border areas. In 1969, in intercommunal rioting following national elections, several hundred persons were reported to have died. In addition, the Government explicitly classifies the country's current serious drug problem as a threat to national security. The remnants of the Communist insurgency, the possibility of renewed communal conflict, and escalating drug abuse are cited by the Government as justification for laws that allow preventive detention of persons suspected of subversive activity or of other activities, including drug crimes.

Prime Minister Mahathir's administration has been relatively restrained in its use of Malaysia's internal security legislation to deal with political offenses in comparison to previous regimes. The number detained under security legislation reportedly has been sharply reduced to 64, from about 500 when Mahathir took office in 1981. However, the Government has made clear its intention to continue to use security legislation when necessary in the future. Important developments in 1985 include passage of a new drug law providing a specific basis for preventive detention in drug cases, and the arrests of two well-known journalists under the Official Secrets Act and of a prominent lawyer (and human rights activist) under the seldom-used Sedition Act.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports during 1985 of political killing by the Government or by any other organization.

b. Disappearance

During 1985 there was no evidence of abduction, secret arrests, or clandestine detention attributable to the Government or to nongovernmental or opposition forces.

MALAYSIA

- c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is no evidence of torture. Allegations of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are rare.

- d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Government can detain suspects without benefit of judicial review under three legislative acts.

The 1960 Internal Security Act (ISA), spawned by the Communist insurgency of the 1950's, is aimed at controlling internal subversion. Detainees must be informed of the charges against them and given the opportunity to protest those charges to an advisory board. The advisory board must also review each case at least every 6 months. However, neither advisory board decisions nor recommendations are binding on the Government. The Government has the power to extend detention indefinitely, in 2-year increments. According to the Home Minister, the number of ISA detainees was reduced from 168 in September 1984 to 64 in June 1985. Most of these are long-term detainees alleged to be members of the Communist Party of Malaysia, although members of legal opposition parties (at least two during 1985) have also been detained under the ISA.

The Emergency Ordinance of 1969 stemmed from that year's communal riots. The state of emergency has never been rescinded, although Parliament regained its legislative power, suspended as part of the emergency, in 1971. The Emergency Ordinance gives the Government the power to detain anyone "in the interests of the public safety or the defense of Malaysia." As under the ISA, detainees must be informed of the charges against them, and they can appeal to an advisory board. In contrast to the ISA, however, the Emergency Ordinance allows the Government to detain suspects for a maximum of two years, although upon release it can put them under "restricted residence" for an additional 2-year period. The Government has relied on the Emergency Ordinance to detain suspected major narcotics traffickers when it has insufficient evidence to prosecute them under drug laws. Based on figures provided by the Malaysian Government, it appears that about 900 suspects are presently in detention, including 250 taken into custody in the first 9 months of 1985.

The Dangerous Drugs Act of 1985, adopted in May after extensive public hearings by a parliamentary select committee, gives the Government a specific act under which to detain suspected drug traffickers. It strengthens the Government's hand in that suspects can be held indefinitely for successive 2-year periods. However, certain due process safeguards not found in the Emergency Ordinance were incorporated in the anti-drug law. An "inquiry officer" must both receive a copy of the police report to the Minister of Home Affairs which recommends detention and also submit his views to the Minister. Also, the opinion of the advisory board, following either its initial hearing or its periodic reviews of each case, is binding rather than optional on the Minister. Finally, the act expires after 5 years unless reaffirmed by Parliament.

Malaysia subscribes to International Labor Organization Convention 105 which prohibits forced or compulsory labor.

MALAYSIA

Some observers think conditions for some plantation contract workers amount to forced labor. However, Malaysia has effective legal sanctions, and forced labor does not appear to be practiced. (See further reference in last section of this report.)

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Malaysian judiciary is generally regarded by the public and the legal community as committed to the rule of law. Although the courts have rarely challenged legislation, they have not hesitated to rule against government prosecutors in specific cases, both civil and criminal.

Ordinary (nonsecurity-related) civil and criminal cases are tried under a fair and open judicial system derived from British jurisprudence. Charges must be levied against a defendant within 24 hours of arrest, and police must decide within 14 days whether to bring the case to court. Defendants have the right to counsel, and lawyers are able to represent clients without penalty to themselves. Bail is available, and strict rules of evidence apply in court. Defendants may appeal lower court decisions to the federal courts and, in criminal cases, may also appeal for clemency to the King or local state rulers, as appropriate.

Persons detained under security legislation and for certain classes of crimes, if their cases are brought to trial, are tried under special procedures contained in the essential (security cases) regulation of 1975. The accused is allowed counsel but does not receive a statement of the evidence; trial is by a single judge without a jury; and witnesses may be examined in the absence of the accused. Admissible evidence includes hearsay and secondary evidence, testimony of children and spouses, self-incriminating statements to police, and information from seized records or communications. If the accused is found guilty, the judge must impose the maximum penalty. For certain internal security crimes, including the possession of firearms, the mandatory sentence is death. In 1985, at least three persons were executed after conviction under the ISA for illegal possession of firearms. A fourth, Sim Kie Chon, convicted in 1983 under the ISA for the same crime, is under a stay of execution pending appeal.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the ISA, the police may enter and search without warrant the homes of persons suspected of threatening national security and confiscate evidence from them.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Government permits individuals and the media a relatively large degree of freedom of expression, a number of important restrictions exist. The statements and activities of domestic political figures are reported in some detail; opposition politicians get significantly less coverage. The Government is particularly sensitive to criticism of the constitutionally-guaranteed special position of Malays in society and, closely related to this, any statement that threatens public order by promoting ill-feeling between ances. Under the Seditious Act of 1948, strengthened by amendment after the 1969 rioting, such public criticism is considered seditious, as is criticism of the Government's administration of justice and other matters. A prominent lawyer who commented on the Sim Kie Chon case, as noted in Section 1.e., has been charged under the Seditious Act for pointing out publicly that the pardons board did not grant clemency to Sim, a Chinese, even though he did not use his gun, while it did commute the sentence of a prominent Malay who was convicted of using a gun to commit murder. Both Haji Suhaimi Said, legal advisor to the Islamic Party PAS, and Fan Yew Teng, Secretary-General of the Socialist Democratic Party, were charged with publishing books containing material judged inimical to communal harmony.

The media are further constrained by ownership and legislation. All radio stations and two of the three television stations are government owned. The other television station, which began broadcasting in 1984, and most of the press are owned by groups close to the Government. Government control over publishing licenses, reinforced in 1984 by the passage of the Printing and Publications Act, has moved the press towards considerable self-censorship. This act also allows the Government to restrict the importation of foreign publications, a right exercised during 1985 when several issues of a prominent regional newspaper were denied distribution. Also, an expatriate reporter from a well-known regional publication was questioned by police regarding his sources for a report on a confidential Malaysian foreign policy document, and he was prosecuted, convicted, and fined under the Official Secrets Act. In November, a Malaysian reporter was arrested under the Official Secrets Act and charged with receiving and writing a story based on an official document on the force structure of the Malaysian Air Force. He faces a maximum sentence of 7 years' imprisonment or a substantial fine, or both.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Malaysian Constitution guarantees the rights of freedom of peaceful assembly and association. It also grants the Government extensive powers to limit those rights by legislation in the interest of security and public order. After the 1969 communal riots, the Government passed laws greatly limiting the right to public assembly by large groups. In recent years, however, these laws have been selectively enforced. "Political meetings," which the Government alleged were being used by the opposition party PAS to sow division within the Malay community, were banned for short periods in late 1984 and again in late 1985. The controversial Societies Act empowers the Government in effect to prohibit societies which comment unfavorably on political or public issues; this act is used by the Government to set limits to lobbying by groups although not to suppress it entirely. Under the Universities and University Colleges Act, student associations must be approved by the Ministry of Education and are prohibited from engaging in political activity.

The Trade Unions Act of 1959 and the Industrial Relations Act of 1967 govern the rights of workers to engage in trade union activity. The latter specifically prohibits any person from interfering with, restraining, or coercing a worker in the exercise of the right to form or participate in the lawful activities of a trade union. Unions may bargain collectively with an employer, form federations, and join international labor organizations. The Government promotes the settlement of disputes between unions and employers through the Ministry of Labor conciliation service, the industrial court, and the public service tribunal.

Although labor standards in Free Trade Zones are the same as those in the rest of Malaysia, there has been a problem about the recognition of unions in electronic component manufacturing plants, most of which are located in Free Trade Zones. (Conditions of employment and wages in electronic component manufacturing plants are among the best in Malaysia's manufacturing sector.) When the plants were first established in the mid-1970's, an attempt was made to organize the workers by the Electrical Industry Worker's Union (EIWU). The Government determined that a distinction should be drawn between the electrical product manufacturing industry and the electronic component industry, and that therefore the electronic component workers would have to establish their own union. A second legal challenge was mounted by the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC) in the early 1980's when it attempted to organize electronic component workers. The High Court determined early in 1985 that the MTUC did not have standing in this matter, as it does not represent electronic workers and is not a trade union. Although it appears Malaysian unions will continue their efforts to organize electronic component workers, it is widely understood that the Government, as an inducement to electronic component manufacturers in Free Trade Zones, has offered such firms varying periods of union-free operation.

Labor legislation grants the right to strike to Malaysian workers. However, union leaders complain that 1980 amendments to the two acts noted above interfere with their right to strike and to bargain collectively without fear of coercion. Specific union charges about government interference with the right to strike and bargain collectively are contained in a complaint presented to the ILO by the MTUC. The MTUC alleged that the amendments to the Trade Unions Ordinance of 1959 and the Industrial Relations Act of 1967, passed in May 1980, contain prohibitive and oppressive anti-union provisions which erode the basic rights of workers, restrict union activities, and result in government and employer interference in the internal administration of trade unions. In 1983, the ILO urged the Malaysian Government to amend these laws further to bring them into conformity with the convention on the right to organize and to bargain collectively. In 1985, the MTUC and the Malaysian Employers Federation conducted a joint seminar on Malaysia's labor laws in which Ministry of Labor personnel participated. As a result of this seminar, Malaysia's labor laws may eventually be amended to expand the right to organize and bargain collectively.

According to the Ministry of Labor, there are 386 trade unions in Malaysia representing about 620,000 workers, or about 10 percent of the work force. While unions do not engage in political activity, individual trade union leaders have served in the Parliament, and individual union members may belong to political parties.

The official religion of Malaysia is Islam, and Malays are legally bound in some civil matters, e.g., family relations, diet, etc., by Islamic religious laws administered by state rather than by Federal authorities. Nonetheless, the Constitution guarantees freedom of religion for all. Religious minorities, which include large Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh, and Christian communities, are free to practice their faith without interference by the Government. Conversion is permitted, but proselytizing of Muslims is strongly discouraged. Although an Islamic religious establishment is supported by government funds and it is government policy to infuse "Islamic values" into the administration of Malaysia, the Government has refused to accede to demands for the imposition of Islamic religious law in cases involving non-Muslims. Non-Muslims are excused from public school instruction in the Muslim religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Persons wishing to travel abroad must obtain passports, which have been denied in a few cases on what the Government terms security grounds. Travel to the Soviet Union and several Eastern Bloc countries is closely restricted, although recently controls on travel to some East European countries have been reduced. Traditionally tight controls on travel of Malaysian Chinese to China have also recently been loosened. They can visit China for medical treatment, to see relatives, to tour (if over age 60), and for business trips when they can satisfy the Government that such commerce will be of "net benefit" to Malaysia.

Malaysia has provided first asylum to 200,000 Vietnamese refugees since 1975. It has cooperated closely with international organizations and resettlement countries in facilitating the eventual movement of the refugees to those countries. Malaysia itself has resettled over 7,000 Khmer Muslim refugees but has not accepted non-Muslim refugees for permanent settlement. About 40,000 Philippine Muslims have permanently settled in Sabah since 1975, although they have not yet been offered citizenship.

Malaysia's parliamentary system is based on the British model. The Prime Minister and Cabinet are responsible to Parliament. Elections must be held at least once every 5 years. The opposition concedes that elections to date have been free and fair; votes are cast secretly and recorded accurately.

Through the United Malays National Organization (UMNO), Malays dominate the ruling National Front coalition of ethnic-based parties which has controlled Parliament since independence. Malays fill most important cabinet posts. The National Front parties benefit substantially from gerrymandered electoral districts. In April 1982 the National Front won 132 of the 154 seats in the House of Representatives. Although the opposition regularly criticizes the Government in Parliament, it rarely succeeds in influencing legislation.

MALAYSIA

The Malaysian Government is not a member of any international or regional human rights body. The Government was not the subject of resolutions, investigations, or other action by human rights organizations in 1985. Although Amnesty International has noted that most detainees held under the ISA have been released in recent years, a March 1985 summary of its concerns in Malaysia again criticized the Government for detention under this act and called for the unconditional release of specific "long-term" detainees. The Government has taken the position that Malaysia is the best and sole judge of its security needs and that the act will remain in effect. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International also criticized conditions and treatment in Taiping detention camp and at interrogation and "rehabilitation" centers. Freedom House rates Malaysia as "partly free."

There are no government or private organizations in Malaysia which deal specifically with protection of individual liberties. The bar council, a Muslim youth movement, and a social reform group all devote some time to the subject, usually in response to government actions they believe endanger civil liberties. The bar council also investigates some cases of possible violation of human rights, but more on an ad hoc basis than through set procedures.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Malaysia in 1985 was reported to be approximately 15.3 million, and the population growth rate about 2.0 percent. Government policy encourages a high birth rate. Malaysia's abundant natural resources (tin, rubber, palm oil, petroleum, gas, and timber) have helped to make its economy one of the more prosperous ones in Asia for the last two decades. Manufacturing is on the rise, with textiles, electronic components, and other manufactures increasingly being exported. Gross national product per capita was estimated at $1,981 for 1984.

In 1985 life expectancy at birth was 67.7 years and infant mortality about 25 deaths per 1,000 births. In 1980 an estimated 63 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water. The per capita calorie supply in 1982 met 120 percent of nutritional requirements. Education is free, compulsory for 9 years, and available to all. The Government provides scholarships at special boarding schools and at universities abroad for gifted students, particularly Malays. The primary school enrollment ratio is 96 percent. The estimated adult literacy rate in 1980 was 72 percent.

Various government regulations are designed to ensure that workers enjoy acceptable conditions of work. Work hours are not to exceed 8 hours per day or 48 hours per week, and vacation time must be granted. Factories must maintain minimum standards of industrial safety and insurance plans. Employers must provide severance pay and maintain a retirement fund. However, there is no minimum wage except in a few minor occupations.

Plantation work is increasingly being done by contract workers, many of whom may be illegal immigrants from

MALAYSIA

Indonesia. Working conditions for contract workers are significantly below those of direct hire plantation workers, many of whom belong to the National Union of Plantation Workers. Additionally, many of the immigrant workers, particularly the illegal ones, may not have access to Malaysia's excellent juridical labor system.

Employment of children is covered by the Children and Young Persons (Employment) Act of 1966, which stipulates that no child under 14 may be engaged in any employment except light work in a family enterprise, in public entertainment, work performed by the Government in a school or training institution, or employment as an approved apprentice. It is illegal for children to work more than 6 hours per day or 6 days per week, or at night.

There are no restrictions on the political rights of Malaysian women. Government policy supports their full and equal participation in government, education, and the work force. The position of women in society is conditioned by the cultural and religious traditions of the country's major ethnic groups. With a general resurgence of Islamic piety among Malays, Malay women have in recent years tended toward close conformity with Koranic stipulations on women's roles.

The Government implements on an extensive scale programs designed to boost the economic position of the ethnic Malay majority which remains poorer, on average, than other Malaysians despite its political dominance. As a result of these discriminatory government programs and policies, non-Malay opportunities for education, government employment, and ownership of new homesteads are limited. Virtually all institutions of higher learning are required to use the national language, Malay, as the medium of instruction for nontechnical courses.

MONGOLIA*

The Mongolian People's Republic is a rigidly controlled Communist state. Only the Mongolian Communist party, the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party (MPRP), is permitted to function. The leadership of the country is vested in a 10-person Politburo of the MPRP Central Committee headed by Jambyn Batmonh. Nominally, the People's Great Hural, or National Assembly, enacts the basic laws of the country. It meets for 3 days once each year. Between sessions, the Council of Ministers (Cabinet), appointed by the Hural, issues current legislation.

The Soviet Union dominates Mongolia politically and economically. The Mongolian State is modeled on the Soviet system, and MPRP Leaders travel often to Moscow for consultations. The Soviets guarantee their influence by stationing approximately five combat divisions on Mongolian soil. As in the political arena, Mongolian economic life is shaped by the Soviet bloc: 95 percent of Mongolia's foreign trade is conducted with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Soviet involvement in the Mongolian economy is largely exploitative, particularly in the area of mining and mineral exporting. The Mongolian economy remains heavily agricultural, with an emphasis on live animals and animal products.

Little information is available concerning government control or treatment of Mongolian citizens. There are no known domestic opposition groups, and emigre groups are small. Much of what information is available comes from the Mongolian regime. The few resident diplomats and occasional visitors to Mongolia are mainly limited to the capital city (Ulaanbaatar). Travel to other parts of the country is restricted.

It is known, however, that Mongolian life and society are highly regimented. Few Mongolians are authorized to travel outside the Soviet bloc countries. Political opposition to the ruling Communist party is not permitted. Freedoms guaranteed to the individual under the Mongolian Constitution, including speech, demonstration, and assembly, can be exercised only to "strengthen the socialist state system." In effect, individual civil and political liberties do not exist, and this situation is unlikely to change in the foreseeable future.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no information available concerning political killing by the Government.

b. Disappearance

There is no reliable information available concerning disappearance in Mongolia. High government officials

*The United States has never recognized nor has it had diplomatic relations with the Mongolian People's Republic. The absence of normal channels of intercourse makes it more difficult to comment authoritatively on conditions in that country.

occasionally disappear from public view, and no information is released concerning their subsequent fate.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

No information is available concerning this subject.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no information available on this question.

Information is also unavailable as to whether forced or compulsory labor is prohibited or practiced.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Current civil and criminal codes stipulate the right of the accused to judicial process, a legal defense, and public trial "except as stipulated by law." Closed proceedings are permitted in the case of crimes against the State. As the civil code places a heavy emphasis on this category of crimes, and because the MPRP controls all legal systems, those accused of such crimes are unlikely to receive a fair trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy of person, home, and correspondence is guaranteed in the Constitution, but there is no information available concerning the application of these rights by Mongolian authorities. Travel, as well as job and residence changes, are decided in accordance with economic needs as determined by the State.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech but specifies that the exercise of individual rights must be to "strengthen the socialist state system." Actions which the party deems not to be in accord with this definition would likely result in arrest and detention. Criticism of the Government is not tolerated. Control is exercised through various government organizations, notably the People's Control Organization, which extends down to the neighborhood committee level. The press is state-owned and heavily restricted by the Government. It serves primarily as a propaganda tool. Non-Communist foreign media representatives generally are not allowed into the country. Academic and artistic life is also tightly controlled in accordance with government policy.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of demonstration and assembly are guaranteed by the Constitution, but in practice only government-authorized organizations may assemble, and the only demonstrations allowed are carefully orchestrated by government authorities.

The Constitution gives workers the right to organize professional and trade unions, but all are controlled and directed by the Government to promote its policies.

MONGOLIA

While the Labor Law does not mention specifically collective bargaining, it does provide for settlement of labor grievances by "Commissions for Labor Disputes" formed by local trade union councils and people's courts, and composed of equal numbers of trade union council representatives and enterprise managers. There is no information on how this works in practice.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion exists in theory, but the current regime strictly controls religious activity through an Office of Religious Affairs attached to the Council of Ministers. Religion no longer plays any significant part in the lives of most Mongolians. The Buddhist religion, which was a central force in Mongolian life prior to the establishment of the Communist Government, has been reduced to a few showcase monasteries and a handful of monks. They serve primarily as propagandists and as showpieces for tourists. Religious figures do not hold high positions in government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Until recent years, few Mongolians traveled abroad, even to the Soviet Union. Foreign travel usually has been permitted only for official purposes, but government-sponsored education abroad has become increasingly common. As many as 40,000 Mongolian youth go to the Soviet Union yearly for short training programs. Almost all travel abroad remains restricted to Soviet bloc countries. No Mongolians are known to have requested repatriation to Mongolia. There is no known routine emigration from Mongolia.

All Mongolians over age 16 must have internal passports and must obtain permission from the Security Bureau in order to travel within the country. Attempts to change jobs or residences must be approved by both the Security Bureau and the People's Control Organization.

Although the 1978 Constitution guarantees the right "to reside in the territory of the MPR" to foreign citizens, Mongolian authorities in 1983 began a systematic expulsion of ethnic Chinese. Many of the between 6,000 and 7,000 ethnic Chinese in Mongolia were evidently offered a choice between resettlement in the barren northern part of the country or expulsion to China. The Mongolian authorities claimed the expellees had no formal occupation and/or did not abide by Mongolian law, despite the fact many of them had been living and working in Mongolia since the 1950's.

By late September 1983, over 2,000 Chinese had returned by train to the People's Republic of China. Many of the expellees were reported to have been stripped of their personal property by the Mongolian customs authorities before being allowed to cross the Chinese border.

The expulsions continued in 1984, though apparently at a reduced rate. Some estimates place the number of Chinese who left Mongolia in 1984 at approximately 1,000. If these estimates are correct, then nearly half of the Chinese population has been forced to leave the country by the authorities. The Government is reportedly now permitting Chinese to leave on a less onerous basis, without confiscation of their possessions, yet the authorities appear determined to expel or widely disperse the remaining Chinese.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The MPRP does not tolerate political groups outside of its control. It is established on the Soviet model, with a narrow pyramid of power topped by Party General Secretary Batmonh. Batmonh reached the top by replacing former leader Yumjaagiyn Tsendenbal at a Central Committee meeting called while Tsendenbal vacationed in the Soviet Union. Tsendenbal had been in power for 40 years. Both Soviet and Mongolian press reports stated that Tsendenbal relinquished power voluntarily. Nothing has been heard of him since August 1984, when the Government announced the shakeup.

Lower-ranking members of the MPRP have no real ability to influence the decisions of their superiors. Elections are held at regular intervals, but only one candidate is listed for each office, so the choice is to vote for him or cross his name out. Many elections result in a 99.9 percent turnout. Winning candidates regularly receive 99.9 percent of the vote. While there is no officially espoused policy of minority disenfranchisement, there is no evidence of religious persons occupying elite party or government positions, and only a few members of minorities do so.

Mongolia acceded to the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights in 1976. However, the Mongolian regime has consistently followed the Soviet human rights policy and practice, whether or not it is consistent with the Covenant. There have been no known opportunities for outside investigators to examine human rights practices. It is highly unlikely that Mongolian officials would permit such investigation by any outside authority or organization. There is no known organization dedicated to the protection of human rights in Mongolia. The Amnesty International 1985 Report does not contain an entry for Mongolia. Freedom House rated it "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

According to the World Bank, Mongolia's population of 1.9 million grew at a rate of 2.6 percent in 1985. Mongolian statistics state that 76 percent of the population is under 35 years of age. The Mongolians have patterned their economy on the Soviet model with resource allocation controlled rigidly by the central authorities. The majority of the population is still engaged in agriculture, primarily herding. Gross national product per capita in 1979, the latest year for which statistics are available, was $780.00. There is no information available on inflation rates, unemployment, or underemployment.

World Bank and Mongolian Government statistics tend to confirm Mongolian claims of some improvement in the standard of living. Mongolian government figures indicate that there were 23.3 physicians per 10,000 population in 1983 and that the infant mortality rate had declined to 46.4 per 1,000 live births in 1985. Life expectancy at birth rose from 52 years in 1960 to 65.6 years in 1985. According to the World Bank, the percentage of calories available for consumption relative to nutritional needs reached 111 percent in 1982.

Despite the substantial rise in the Mongolian standard of living over the last 50 years, the country remains extremely backward. National economic growth is severely limited by an inefficient and overcentralized bureaucracy and a centrally-run economy subordinated to the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance, a Soviet-dominated organization. These combine with a lack of resources, extreme geographic isolation, and a severe climate to keep the quality of Mongolian life poor by international standards.

Education has been a high priority since the mid-1950's. According to Mongolian government statistics, the total number of students per 10,000 persons increased from 1,375 in 1960 to 2,723 in 1983. There appears to be little sex, racial, or religious discrimination in education. World Bank figures for 1982 show the adjusted primary school enrollment ratio for females as being almost the same as for males. The seventh 5-year plan (1981-85) continues to encourage the learning of the Russian language in the Mongolian educational system. The Government claims universal literacy.

The Mongolian Labor Law sets a minimum work age and maximum work hours for all workers, and exhorts state enterprises to observe work safety requirements. Children under 16 are not permitted to work, although 15-year-olds may work if allowed to by the local trade union committee. Those under 18 are prohibited from doing arduous work or to work in dangerous areas such as mining. The workday for adults is 8 hours; for those aged 16 to 18 it is 7 hours, and for those aged 15 it is 6 hours. Information on wage rates is not available.

Universal franchise and equal rights for women are official policy, and according to Mongolian government statistics, the proportion of women in the work force rose from 30 to 46 percent between 1960 and 1980. While few women occupy positions of responsibility in the Government or party, it is reported that they do hold high professional positions in institutions such as hospitals. The Mongolian Women's Committee is the only known organization devoted to women's interests. It is controlled by the MPRP, and its aims are unknown.

NEW ZEALAND

New Zealand's system of government is patterned on that of Great Britain. Executive authority is vested in a 20-member cabinet led by the Prime Minister, the leader of the political party or coalition of parties holding a majority of seats in Parliament. Of the 95 members of the unicameral legislature, 4 are elected from a separate roll to represent the minority population of native Maoris. Representatives to Parliament are elected for three-year terms. The judiciary consists of a Court of Appeals, Superior Court, and Magistrates' Court. New Zealand law is rooted in three primary sources: English common law; certain statutes of British parliamentary law enacted before 1947; and statutes of the New Zealand Parliament.

Of New Zealand's population of 3,271,000, native Maoris of Polynesian origin number 280,000 and 88,000 are Polynesians from other Pacific islands. The rights of the increasingly urbanized, disadvantaged, and activist Polynesian minority have been receiving increased public attention, and this has been institutionalized in the Ministry of Maori Affairs.

Real annual average economic growth has been low in recent years. However, the free-enterprise economy affords the opportunity for a reasonable standard of living for most New Zealanders.

In 1985 New Zealand continued its good record in the human rights field. New Zealanders continue to enjoy personal freedom, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, universal suffrage, and the rule of law. Respect for minority rights, concern for the economically deprived, and the humane treatment of prisoners are accepted principles. Education is freely available to all. Subsidies are provided to the unemployed and the economically deprived. The sick and handicapped have access to a socialized system of medical care. State-sponsored pension plans guarantee a continuing income to the elderly.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for political motives by the Government or by New Zealand political organizations does not occur.

b. Disappearance

There have been no incidents involving disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The rights of those arrested in New Zealand are protected by law and no such activities take place. Capital punishment is illegal. Prisoners are provided access to legal assistance and visits by family members. Food, facilities, and medical care are good. Prisoners are given the opportunity to work.

NEW ZEALAND

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention, and exile is guaranteed under New Zealand law and is respected in practice. New Zealand law provides for a writ of habeas corpus. Persons arrested in New Zealand are charged promptly. Access to counsel is prompt, and legal aid is provided by the court to those who cannot afford to pay for a private attorney. New Zealand does not permit preventive detention or the use of forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

New Zealand law guarantees a prompt, public trial. The rights of the accused are scrupulously maintained and subject to public scrutiny. The judiciary operates independently of governmental influence.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy is guaranteed under New Zealand law. The Government does not violate the privacy of the individual, the sanctity of the home, or the integrity of correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and the press are guaranteed by New Zealand law and are respected in practice. There are 156 newspapers and 602 magazines published which cover the spectrum of political and social thought. The Government makes no attempt to censor the press, and opposition viewpoints are freely discussed.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no restrictions on peaceful assembly or association.

Independent labor unions, which in 1984 organized 46 percent of the work force, actively engage in recruiting members and in collective bargaining, and they have the right to strike. Public sector unions are, in some cases, precluded from engaging in strike action but generally only for reasons of public safety. Mediation and arbitration procedures are independent of government control. Unions have the freedom to maintain relations with international bodies and participate in bilateral exchanges. Upon the reintroduction of compulsory unionism in 1985, the New Zealand Employers' Federation lodged a complaint with the International Labor Organization (ILO) that compulsory unionism denies workers the right to freedom of association. To date, the ILO has taken no action on this complaint.

c. Freedom of Religion

New Zealand enjoys a long tradition of religious tolerance. There is no state religion, and all faiths are given equal treatment under the law.

NEW ZEALAND

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no controls upon citizens of New Zealand regarding internal movement or resettlement. Foreign travel is unrestricted and the right to return is guaranteed. Within the limits of the nation's resources, New Zealand accepts and resettles refugees. Asylum requests are handled in the same manner as refugee cases.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The New Zealand Government is genuinely elected by its people. The nation is a multiparty parliamentary state. Two major parties, Labour and National, dominate the political scene and have alternatively formed governments since the 1930's. Universal suffrage at 18 years of age and triennial elections provide the opportunity for citizens of New Zealand to change their government. The New Zealand Labour Party won the general election of July 1984 with 42 percent of the vote, ending a 9-year period of government by the National Party. There are other, smaller parties and groups which are, for the most part, devoted to limited and parochial issues, and are usually of little consequence in the national electoral process. There are no restrictions based upon race, sex, creed, or national origin which limit participation in the New Zealand political process. Women parliamentarians number 12. Both major political parties now have women presidents. Voting rates remain high, and participation in political groups is common. Opposition groups have every opportunity to voice their views.

In the absence of allegations of abuse of human rights in New Zealand, no international or nongovernmental bodies have conducted investigations. New Zealand's endorsement of the principles of human rights is adequately demonstrated by participation in local, national, and international bodies organized to protect human rights and prevent discrimination. Representative among these groups are governmental entities such as the New Zealand Human Rights Commission, the New Zealand Council for Civil Liberties, and private organizations such as the Citizens Association for Racial Equality, the New Zealand Chapter of the International Commission of Jurists, the Race Relations Conciliator, Amnesty International, and the National Organization of Women.

The Amnesty International 1985 Report does not include a section on New Zealand. Freedom House rates New Zealand "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

New Zealand's population of 3,271,000 is growing at the rate of only 1 percent yearly. Although manufacturing is increasing, agriculture remains the backbone of the economy. The major portion of export earnings comes from meat, wool, and dairy products. Real annual average growth has been low in recent years and there is little prospect of any dramatic acceleration.

NEW ZEALAND

The free-enterprise economy affords a reasonable standard of living for most New Zealanders. Per capita income in 1984 was US$6,619. However, according to the 1981 census, the median income level of the Maori population is significantly lower than the level for non-Maoris. The 1983 unemployment rate among non-Maoris was 6.4 percent; among Maoris it was close to 27 percent.

Life expectancy (1983) for men was 71 and for women 77. The overall infant mortality rate continues to decline and in 1985 was 10.40 per 1,000 live births. The adult literacy rate is 99 percent.

New Zealand enforces a 40-hour work week and a minimum 3 weeks of annual paid vacation for all employees, in addition to 11 paid public holidays. Children under age 16 cannot be employed without special government approval and must not work at all between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. The hourly minimum wage is NZ$4.25 (US$2.20). Acceptable conditions of work are guaranteed both by national statute, such as the Machinery Act that requires secure fencing around most moving and dangerous parts of machines, and by safety, health, and welfare provisions included in collective agreements.

There is a growing sensitivity to the status of women and Maoris in New Zealand society. In 1985 the Labour Government established a Ministry of Women's Affairs and it also ratified the U.N. Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. In addition, the Human Rights Commission (established in 1977 by the Human Rights Commission Act) continues to hear complaints about most forms of discrimination. The largest category of complaints concerns discrimination against women in employment.

Maoris lag significantly behind non-Maoris in many important respects. The Maoris have become a largely urbanized population, 90 percent now living in cities. The urban Maori population is predominantly young, marginally educated, and economically disadvantaged. Unemployment statistics indicate that most Maori have not yet moved into the socioeconomic mainstream. Despite the historical absence of overt discrimination, the noteworthy success of some Maori, and extensive intermarriage with Pakeha (Caucasians), the stresses of transferring from a rural, traditional society to an urban Western environment are evident in various social indicators. Concurrently, there has been a rise in Maori activism as well as development of some ethnic radicalism. One focus of activism is the Waitangi Tribunal amendment bill, currently awaiting legislative action. If passed, it would allow the Tribunal to investigate Maori grievances dating back to 1840 and would extend the jurisdiction and membership of the Tribunal. Maori activists believe that much of the land once owned by Maoris was taken from them unjustly and illegally by British immigrants, and that passage of the bill would help to resolve these grievances in their favor. While the Labour Government's long-term, structural economic reforms address the concerns of Maori only indirectly, their eventual success could significantly improve the socioeconomic status of Maoris.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Papua New Guinea covers half of the second largest island in the world plus additional major islands to the north and east, together constituting a large portion of the cultural area commonly referred to as Melanesia. It has a federal, parliamentary form of government with a unicameral legislature. Political legitimacy rests on popular will expressed by majority vote in accordance with a Constitution embodying extensive public consultation and Melanesian tradition, which accords prestige based on individual accomplishments rather than heredity. The military, police, and intelligence services are under civilian control. The courts are independent and vigorously protect individual rights. The two government transfers of power since independence in 1975 have been peaceful and in keeping with the Constitution.

The economic system has three parts: The traditional, rural, subsistence economy which supports about 80 percent of the population; the privately controlled money economy; and enterprises in which the Government has invested. The private sector produces most of the wealth and provides three-fourths of government revenues; most of the remainder is aid from Australia. Papua New Guinea has major mineral, timber, and hydroelectric resources only just beginning to be developed.

In 1985, despite growing pressures generated by rising crime, constitutional protection of individual rights continued to be maintained by the courts. In order to deal with the problem of crime, the Government imposed a state of emergency in June, the main feature of which was a curfew.

A special problem is presented by the around 10,000 people from Irian Jaya who have illegally crossed the border and who are now living in camps near it. The Government would like to repatriate these border crossers but it intends to deal with the problem in a humane way and on a case-by-case basis.

In 1985 as in previous years, no noteworthy human rights violations occurred in Papua New Guinea. The active measures taken to deal with the crime problem were implemented only after lively debate and strong public support and have not significantly compromised individual rights. A network of social and political institutions including vigorous parliamentary democracy, a concerned and growing legal profession, active churches, a lively free press, and an increasingly informed citizenry, are effective in maintaining human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Neither the Government nor any opposition group has resorted to political killing.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution forbids torture and cruel or degrading treatment. The prison population is one of the highest in the region, due to the nation's unusually high crime rate. However, as a general rule, prisoners are treated fairly and humanely. The courts and Ombudsman Commission investigate the small number of complaints and intervene when abuses are discovered. Civil damages have been awarded and offending officials punished in such cases.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Politically motivated arrests do not occur in Papua New Guinea, and the courts vigorously enforce constitutional protections against arbitrary arrest or detention. Exile is not practiced. Warrants are required for arrests. Suspects have free access to a lawyer of their choice, and, in serious cases, counsel is provided at state expense. Suspects and their counsel are informed of charges and have the right to judicial review of detention. A reasonable bail is allowed, except when a judge rules that the risk of flight or further crime warrants detention.

The Constitution forbids slavery and slave trade in all forms including forced or compulsory labor, except when the latter is imposed as a condition of sentence after due process of law.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair, public trial is strictly observed. Defendants are represented by counsel. A high crime rate coupled with a shortage of funds, police, and judicial personnel have caused the time spent awaiting trial for serious offenses to increase in recent years. The right of habeas corpus, however, limits holding persons without trial to a maximum of six months. The courts are free from executive, political, or military interference. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Sanctity of the home and family and privacy of correspondence are observed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, effective constitutional guarantees, and a functioning democratic political system combine to insure freedom of speech and press. State-owned radio gives significant coverage to statements of opposition politicians. Pornography is prohibited. Films are censored for suitability and classification based on sexual explicitness and degree of violence. Academic freedom is respected.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of association, to engage in collective bargaining, to join industrial organizations, and to seek employment is legally guaranteed and protected by the Constitution and freely exercised. Although there is a legal requirement that a permit be obtained before a demonstration, no application has been denied recently.

Labor unions are protected by law and are active and important in the country's economic and political life. Over 50 trade unions exist, among which the most significant are the various public employees' associations, the two mineworkers' unions, and the dockworkers' union. The private sector unions are free to strike and do so regularly. Papua New Guinea is a member of the International Labor Organization and union executives often attend international councils. Employers' associations also flourish.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by law. There are no controls on the practice of religion and no religious discrimination. A wide variety of indigenous and Christian denominations flourish. Missionaries are allowed to work freely in the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement of Papua New Guinea citizens within or into and out of the country is not restricted by law. Naturalization is available to foreign residents who satisfy a residence requirement and are sponsored by a village; it can be revoked only for fraud.

Freedom of movement was temporarily curtailed by the curfew imposed in June 1985 to combat crime. The measure was based on the emergency provisions of the Constitution and has been exceedingly popular, but has, nevertheless, been challenged by legal specialists concerned about human rights. There have been some allegations of abuse of police power in connection with the heightened surveillance which accompanied the emergency, as well as considerable sentiment on the part of many citizens that the police should be tougher. Charges of abuse have been actively investigated.

The Prime Minister announced that the Government would propose laws to control migration of jobless individuals into Port Moresby and other urban areas. It is not clear whether this measure will in fact be implemented.

The Government has indicated continuing concern about the activities of the Irian Jaya Separatist movement, Organisasi Papua Merdeka (Free Papua Movement) or OPM. Adherents of OPM have in some cases used threats and intimidation to maintain control over the populations of border camps. On the other hand, OPM sympathizers have continued to argue that the Government of Papua New Guinea has a moral obligation to give permanent asylum to the border crossers and to support their cause against the Government of Indonesia.

Approximately 10,000 people from Irian Jaya, the neighboring province of Indonesia, who have illegally crossed the Papua New Guinea border, remain in 14 camps where they are maintained by the Government of Papua New Guinea and various aid organizations. Although repatriation of these border crossers is the Government's declared intention, it has also stated it will consider the effects of returning on a case-by-case basis and not forcibly repatriate any border crosser it judges to be a refugee. The Government has negotiated a number of guarantees and procedural safeguards with the Government of Indonesia aimed at insuring the safety and rights of border crossers before their return to Irian Jaya. Current policy is to return those who come for economic reasons; and to find settlement through the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) for those determined to be refugees.

Papua New Guinea has a unicameral legislature composed of representatives from 19 provinces and the national capital. None of the seven organized parties has an absolute parliamentary majority. Politics are marked by keen competition for elected offices and loose party structures. Parliamentarians can and occasionally do cross party lines during votes. Any citizen can run for Parliament, and several members are foreign born. Two peaceful changes of government have taken place since independence. The parliamentary elections since independence have resulted in substantial turnovers of members. An Ombudsman Commission monitors campaign contributions.

Although there have been no allegations by international or nongovernmental agencies of human rights violations in Papua New Guinea, local politicians and some private groups have criticized the Government for not doing more to improve the lot of illegal border crossers from Irian Jaya who live in the temporary camps near the border. The UNHCR has an office in Port Moresby that contributes toward the provision of minimal necessities for border crossers. No domestic human rights monitoring group exists, but several outside groups have been permitted to visit border camps and have reported on them. The Ombudsman Commission and the courts take legal action against abuses when discovered, and the press and concerned politicians have been quick to publicize alleged governmental shortcomings. The 1985 Amnesty International Report does not contain an entry for Papua New Guinea. Freedom House rates it as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Papua New Guinea has a population of 3,326,000, most of whom live at the subsistence level. Many authorities believe that the population growth is now considerably higher than the World Bank figures of 2.1 percent and may, in fact, be as high as 4 percent, thus fueling employment problems. Nevertheless, based on strong economic growth earlier, Papua New Guinea currently has a relatively high per capita gross national product (GNP) of US$820.

Papua New Guinea has land and mineral resources but modern technology has only recently arrived. The economy is marked by vivid contrast between a high technology sector (minerals and forestry) which produces most of the wealth, a cash crop sector (coffee, palm oil, tea, cocoa and copra) which is fairly evenly divided between smallholders and commercial planters, and a large subsistence sector much of which is economically stagnant. Lack of infrastructure--roads, ports, and electric power--is a constraint on economic growth. Communal ownership of land, which discourages individual investment and inhibits the Government's exercise of eminent domain, is another barrier to growth.

Buoyed by high prices for its major exports and continuing massive Australian aid, Papua New Guinea experienced strong economic growth during most of the 1970's. Social services, including health and education, spread rapidly into the vast interior and isolated island provinces alike. However with the decline of copper and gold prices, economic growth has stopped. This, together with an announced gradual cutback in Australian aid, has raised serious questions about the economic future which are being addressed in a new five-year plan.

Provision of basic services has continued to increase, and such indicators as infant mortality (90.6 per 1,000 births, life expectancy at birth (54.23 years in 1985), and literacy (32 percent) have continued to show improvement. In rural areas much of the population still lacks access to safe water. According to 1980 statistics, 30 percent of the urban population but only 19 percent of the rural population had access to safe water. However, in recent years governmental and aid programs have made safe water supply a development priority and safe water is now available in towns and most villages. Estimated caloric intake is still somewhat below requirements with the available caloric supply as a percentage of requirements only 92 percent. Cases of malnutrition in the more remote areas along the border and in parts of the highlands continue to be reported. About three-quarters of the rural population live below the absolute poverty level, according to 1979 statistics. School enrollment is up from 39 percent of primary school-age children in 1970 to 66 percent in 1982.

Population movement to the urban centers, particularly Port Moresby and Lae, in combination with a tradition of violence between the great number of different ethnic groups, has resulted in serious and growing social problems. While traditional tribal warfare in rural areas remains a concern, it has been overshadowed by urban, often ethnic-based crimes. The crime rate in Papua New Guinea is believed to be much higher than that in most developing countries. Enforcement of existing laws is plagued with difficulties both in the provinces and in Port Moresby. Police are overworked and underequipped; individuals refuse to testify against their clansmen, and conviction rates are low.

The recent emergency measures had some success in the Port Moresby area, perhaps in part because some criminals have moved back to provincial areas, but these measures are by nature temporary. Problems associated with in-migration from rural areas to urban areas will remain serious as long as the number of jobs is insufficient to meet the expectations of those attracted by the promise of modern sector wages. In short, the related problems of rural stagnation, unemployment, and crime are likely to remain serious for some time.

The Department of Labor is responsible for the enforcement of safety, health, and working conditions laws and regulations.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

It regularly conducts industrial visits. Working hour limitations, rest periods, holidays, leave, wages, and compensations are regulated by the Employment Act of 1978. Within the Act, minimum wages are established by the Minimum Wages Board. These vary by industry and types of work, and whether or not work is performed in an urban or rural area. Standard hours of work are regulated as well and, although variable for some occupations, may not exceed 42 hours per week in an urban area or 44 hours in a rural environment.

Children under the age of 11 may not be employed outside a family relationship. Children between the ages of 11 and 16 may only be employed with parental permission, a medical clearance, and a work permit from a labor office. Except in agriculture, such employment is very rare according to the Papua New Guinea Department of Labor.

Women have equal rights before the law and their status is gradually improving, but they still face difficulties. Wife-beating is said to be widespread, but it is rarely brought to the attention of the authorities. In urban areas, along with other violent crimes, rape is a problem of increasing severity. In the villages, women are protected by their kin, but attacks on women are a common feature of intertribal conflict. Against the background of traditional male dominance, the achievements of women in Papua New Guinea are significant. Some have become doctors, lawyers, and office directors. The Permanent Secretary for Labor and the head of the Education Commission are women. One woman, a former minister, is a member of the National Parliament and several hold seats in provincial assemblies.

THE PHILIPPINES

The Philippines has a presidential-parliamentary system of government headed by Ferdinand Marcos, President since 1965. Through his personal power, control of the ruling party, and use of emergency decree powers granted by the Constitution, President Marcos has dominated the political arena. The President is elected to a 6-year term and may succeed himself indefinitely. The Government includes a Prime Minister and a unicameral legislature, the National Assembly. National Assembly members are elected to 6-year terms not coinciding with the term of the President. Elections for President and Vice President are set for February 7, 1986.

The Filipino people have a longstanding attachment to democratic principles and institutions, fostered by the legacy of the American colonial period, which began in 1898. From independence in 1946 until 1972 the country was governed under its 1935 Constitution, patterned closely after the United States Constitution. In 1972, President Marcos declared martial law, citing anarchy, lawlessness, urban terrorism, and open rebellion by both Muslim separatists and the New People's Army (NPA), the military wing of the Communist Party (not Moscow-oriented) of the Philippines (CPP). Democratic institutions were suppressed under martial law. The 1935 Constitution was replaced by one ratified in 1973, in a series of controversial "Citizens Assemblies." In 1981, after new constitutional amendments had redefined the presidency, Marcos was reelected to a 6-year term. Although martial law formally ended in 1981, Marcos has continued to exercise broad, discretionary decree-making powers to limit criticism of the regime and opposition activities.

Two insurgent groups are active, the NPA and the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF), a radical Muslim secessionist group. Both employ terrorist tactics. The NPA is under the direct control of the CPP, a Marxist-Leninist party committed to the establishment of a totalitarian Communist regime in the Philippines. The NPA has grown significantly in recent years and is believed by some observers to have as many as 16,000 full-time armed guerrillas, a similar number of part-time fighters, and a large political and logistic support structure. It operates to some degree in most provinces. In some areas it has gained considerable influence, exacting "taxes" and administering its own arbitrary brand of "law and order," including summary killings. The MNLF, active in the south, since 1972 has waged a secessionist struggle originating in inequities and misunderstandings dating from the Spanish era, including competition with Christians over land, past efforts by the Central Government to control and expand Christian settlements, and the desire of the Muslims to preserve cultural identity. The level of fighting in predominantly Muslim areas has diminished considerably in recent years. The Government has mounted political, military, and economic efforts against both insurgent groups. These efforts have been more successful against the MNLF than against the NPA.

The Philippines is a predominantly agricultural country with a growing industrial sector. It ranks economically in the lower middle range of developing countries. Its private sector is subject to both substantial state intervention and favoritism toward individual entrepreneurs with close ties to the Government and the Marcos family. The economy continued to experience considerable difficulty in 1985.

In 1985 there continued to be serious human rights violations throughout the country, although there have been some positive developments as well. Among the latter are the Government's toleration of peaceful expressions of political dissent, including large public rallies and demonstrations, and the trend toward greater press freedom. Philippine newspapers now freely print even very harsh criticism of the Government. However, there were frequent reports, many of them well-founded, of human rights abuses, especially in the countryside, by government security forces. These included summary executions or "salvagings" of civilians; instances of torture; arbitrary arrests, detentions, unlawful searches and seizures; and disappearances. In 1985 the Communist-led insurgents stepped up significantly their use of terror, including summary executions, as a tactic in furtherance of their political objectives.

The accuracy of statistics on human rights abuses in the Philippines, which are collected only by the Government and by Task Force Detainees (TFD), is highly questionable. The TFD is a politically active, antigovernment, Catholic church-related group which investigates and compiles statistics only on alleged government violations of human rights. TFD does not document atrocities and murders committed by the NPA, a policy which reinforces reports that TFD has significant links to leftist elements. Also, TFD ascribes responsibility to the Government for some killings for which the motivation is unclear but probably not political.

Although the number of political detainees reportedly declined in 1985, there was an increase in alleged political killings, and in the number of disappearances. In December the verdict acquitting General Ver, the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces, and his fellow military defendants, after an 8-month trial for the assassination of Benigno Aquino, was not viewed as credible by most Filipinos.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

As noted above, statistics on human rights violations, including political killings, are not reliable. Accurate assessment of violations committed in areas heavily influenced by the NPA is particularly difficult. Furthermore, because the use of violence for both personal and political purposes has been common historically, distinctions between common criminal activity, personal vendettas, unauthorized reprisals by individual military or constabulary units, and legitimate counterinsurgency operations are sometimes blurred. Government forces and insurgents are responsible for killings, as are common criminals, extremist religious sects, private security forces, and vigilante groups. Clashes between insurgents and government forces occur frequently and often result in fatalities.

Military engagements are but one facet of the use by the Communists of violence to further their political goals. The Communists wage an intense campaign for control of local government mechanisms, utilizing intimidation, kidnaping, and assassination directed against government and military officials, businessmen, clergy, teachers, and others who resist. The most obvious sign of Communist influence in any locality of the country is the assassination of local officials. Corrupt or disliked officials are often the first to be murdered. Opponents of the Communist efforts to establish political control, or anyone suspected of being informers for the government, are also in danger of being killed.

Government statistics allege that over 400 civilians were killed by the NPA from the beginning of 1985 to the end of August. Increasingly throughout 1985, there were verified reports of NPA intimidation and even killings of civilians who refused to pay "revolutionary" taxes. For example, in February, a 35-year old housewife was murdered in Davao City, reportedly for refusing to give a contribution to the NPA. In late August, the murder of an elementary school teacher in western Samar received wide coverage. He was stabbed to death by a female member of an insurgent band reportedly because of his outspoken anti-Communism. NPA political assassination teams ("sparrow units") reportedly killed numerous local government officials, policemen, and Philippine military in 1985. Their victims included the Governor of Surigao del Sur province, who was murdered in October. The Australian Government was forced to withdraw its consultants and aid to an integrated development program on Samar in mid-August after a series of NPA incidents and threats.

Numerous reports of summary executions or "salvagings" by government forces occurred throughout the Philippines during 1985. TFD alleged in September 1985 that a total of 238 salvagings had taken place throughout the Philippines by mid-year. (TFD alleged a total of 538 salvagings nationwide for 1984.) According to TFD reports, most of these killings were of farmers in areas of insurgent activity, although some killings did occur in urban settings. As stated above, TFD does not document atrocities and murders committed by NPA insurgents. Additionally, it has a tendency to categorize any murder by persons unknown as a political "salvaging."

Killings of civilians by auxiliary Civilian Home Defense Forces (CHDF) units and other paramilitary forces were numerous throughout 1985. These forces are heavily deployed in insurgency-affected areas, and sometimes operate independently of direct government or military control. The most notorious among them appear to be armed religious cults which operate mostly in Mindanao and other parts of the southern Philippines. Human rights organizations and the Catholic Bishops' Conference of the Philippines have called on the Government to reorganize the CHDF or to dismantle it outright. President Marcos announced in late October that the CHDF program would be overhauled to ensure better screening and training of CHDF personnel.

The Government reported in October that in 1985 it received 91 complaints of salvagings attributed to military personnel, CHDF units, and members of the National Police: It found ten to have no factual basis, 21 to be valid, and 60 were sent under investigation.

In April, an Italian missionary priest, Father Tullio Favali, was murdered in the town of Tulunan, North Cotabato, Mindanao, allegedly by members of a renegade paramilitary group. Public assertions were made in the wake of Father Favali's killing that this group, wanted on previous charges dating back to 1979 and suspected of cannibalistic acts, had been protected by the local military establishment. Nevertheless, at the personal order of President Marcos, the two principal suspects in the killing were eventually captured and are standing trial for the murder of Father Favali.

Another case involving the CHDF which attracted wide publicity was an alleged massacre on September 20 of antigovernment demonstrators in Escalante, Negros Occidental, in the Western Visayas region. Over 20 demonstrators were killed and upwards of 50 seriously wounded when CHDF elements reportedly fired indiscriminately into the ranks of the unarmed protestors. In mid-October Defense Minister Juan Ponce Enrile created a multisectoral factfinding board to inquire into the circumstances surrounding the Escalante killings.

Government officials state that mistakes have been made by security forces fighting in insurgency-affected areas. The Government has carried out investigations and stated that military personnel have been disciplined for abusive behavior. In fact, abusive personnel are seldom seriously punished. Only 5, of a total of 123 military and National Police personnel whom the Government as of October reported as having been charged before courts martial for abusing civilians, were convicted and sentenced.

As of October, according to government reports, a total of 1,153 military personnel had been given administrative disciplinary action, including reprimands, demotions, and discharges for abuse of authority. In late 1984 the Ministry of National Defense formed a social action committee to improve its responsiveness to complaints against military personnel of abuse. In addition, ten retraining centers, or disciplinary barracks, were established throughout the country to rehabilitate soldiers guilty of human rights violations.

For the third year in a row, the Government in May deployed in Metro Manila a controversial "secret marshal" corps of some 350 armed law enforcement officers. The marshals, renamed "special operations teams," or "crimebusters," were assigned to ride as plainclothesmen aboard Metro Manila public transit vehicles in an effort to curb a chronic problem of robberies and assaults on these vehicles. They had summary arrest powers, as well as authority to shoot to kill offenders who refused to submit to arrest. Marshals reportedly killed as many as 25 alleged criminals in May. As in previous years, the program was viewed positively by some Metro Manila residents. In other quarters, however, it drew sharp criticism as a violation of due process. Although the secret marshal program was not officially ended, its activities appeared to have come to a halt in early June.

TFD claimed 117 persons as having disappeared from January to June 1985. (TFD claimed a total of 150 disappearances for all of 1984.) The International Labor Organization (ILO) wrote to the Government about the disappearance of three labor leaders. (See also references to ILO communication in Section 2.b. and Section 4.) The Government maintains that its forces were not responsible for these disappearances. However, the Government as a frequent practice has held persons suspected of national security offenses incommunicado in order to complete interrogation before revealing their capture. On February 4, Tim Olivarez, a correspondent for a Manila daily and editor of a provincial newsweekly, disappeared shortly after publishing an expose on a smuggling syndicate which allegedly enjoyed protection by government and military officials. Both the acting Armed Forces Chief of Staff and President Marcos ordered full-scale investigations, resulting in the arrest in mid-November of nine persons, including the alleged head of the syndicate.

On July 11, Father Rudy Romano, a Redemptorist priest and political activist, was abducted in Cebu City. A witness appearing on behalf of the Redemptorist priest at an August Supreme Court habeas corpus hearing identified a military intelligence agent as among his abductors. Although the military has denied having abducted Father Romano, the acting Armed Forces Chief of Staff ordered the "technical arrest" of the agent identified by the eyewitness. As of late 1985, formal charges of kidnaping were reportedly being prepared against the agents and other military men, subsequently identified. Father Romano's fate remains unknown.

The Aquino assassination trial was tainted in many eyes by the disappearance of key eyewitnesses, including some whose testimony before the factfinding board in 1984 helped to establish the finding of a military conspiracy behind the crime. The common-law wife and two female acquaintances of the man whom the military alleges shot Aquino disappeared in early 1984 and were not located in 1985.

Hostage-taking for ransom has been a common practice by Filipino Muslim rebels of the MNLF. For example, an American and a German taken hostage by an MNLF group in November, 1984, on the island of Jolo, south of Mindanao, were held for more than a year and released only in early December. A Japanese citizen is still being held. There is some evidence as well that the NPA has engaged in abductions.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture is prohibited under the Constitution, a number of persons arrested for alleged national security offenses have reportedly been tortured. TFD alleged that 383 instances of torture took place in the first half of 1985, as compared with 504 for all of 1984. The Ministry of National Defense admits that abuses occur. It also claims that some charges of torture are false and are used as a legal tactic by arrested subversives to gain release. Most complaints of torture or other abuse center on the period immediately after arrest, when suspects are reportedly detained in "safe houses." There are also reports that the NPA engages in torture, particularly against persons suspected of being informers for the government.

In areas of military activity against insurgents, there have been allegations of military abuse ranging from harassment and extortion to rape and murder. These reports have appeared in the press and have also come from numerous human rights organizations which support the widely-held belief that the Government is not doing enough to curb abuses and punish abusive military personnel. Although the Ministry of National Defense has investigated some reported abuses, it states that it frequently fails to find evidence, and few personnel receive serious punishment.

Although physical punishment is not officially part of the Philippine penal system, prison conditions are often harsh, and reports of abuse frequent. While in confinement, national security detainees are usually allowed visits by family members, lawyers, and others, and are also permitted food supplements from outside sources. The use of prolonged solitary confinement for national security detainees appears to be uncommon and limited for the most part to persons whom the Government regards as key figures in the underground Communist movement. Persons held without bail pending completion of their trials for national security offenses are usually segregated from and have better accommodations than those held without bail for common crimes and those already convicted by the courts.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrested persons are generally charged promptly, although this is not always the case, particularly with regard to alleged "national security" offenders. Such persons are sometimes held incommunicado by military intelligence units for days or weeks before the Government presents charges or acknowledges that it is holding them.

The Government asserts that no one is arrested for his political beliefs, but that it arrests "public order violators" who commit specific criminal acts relating to the violent overthrow of the Government. Generally, such persons are charged with subversion and rebellion, possession of firearms and subversive documents, or, occasionally, with crimes such as arson and murder.

Arrests in national security cases are frequently made under "Preventive Detention Actions," (PDA's) which authorize arrests by Presidential Order without court warrant, and which allow persons to be held without bail until the President authorizes their release. The 1983 Presidential Decree which created the Preventive Detention Action system, however, provides for a yearly review of the case of each detainee or accused person held without bail. Despite this provision, President Marcos still retains the power to order anyone's detention for an indefinite period of time. The Supreme Court has ruled that PDA's issued by the President are constitutional.

TFD alleged that a total of 2,371 of what it terms "political arrests" took place in the first half of 1985, compared with 4,168 for all of 1984. This figure includes an unknown number of persons arrested for activities in support of the Communist insurgents. Many of those arrested in 1985 were picked up in mass arrests during rallies and demonstrations and were subsequently released. Two Presidential Decrees promulgated in 1985 eliminated capital punishment for crimes against national security and public order, making defendants accused of such crimes eligible for bail.

A grey area of legal uncertainty exists in cases where a civilian court authorizes the temporary release on bail of defendants held under a PDA. In some instances, as in the case of two Manila student leaders arrested in February, President Marcos has rescinded the PDA, thus allowing the civilian court's release order to prevail. In other instances, however, the military has refused court orders to release defendants where the President has not withdrawn the

PDA against them. For example, the Supreme Court ordered the temporary release in May of three activist lawyers from Davao City because the PDA's issued against them were of questionable validity. The military refused to heed this order in the absence of a presidential directive to do so. The Supreme Court subsequently reversed itself and ruled that the lawyers' detention was legal after subversion charges were filed against them in Davao.

Habeas corpus is generally available, but remains suspended throughout the country for persons charged with subversion or rebellion and for those charged with any crime in the two regions in Mindanao where the MNLF rebellion is active. Defendants in subversion and rebellion cases or their relatives frequently petition the Supreme Court for habeas corpus. In some instances the Court has granted hearings and compelled the Government to present persons specified in petitions before it. In other cases, however, the Supreme Court has been slow to act on such petitions.

Two prominent opposition leaders, Jovito Salonga and Raul Daza, returned voluntarily from self-exile in the United States in 1985. Both have engaged freely in political activities since their return. Subversion charges against Salonga were dropped three days before his return in January. Daza continues to face a subversion charge dating from 1982 but is now free on bail and has been allowed to return to the United States. In July President Marcos lifted a PDA against Cebu City opposition leader Ribomapil Holganza following a bail release granted by the presiding judge in his subversion trial. In a related case, the Government in January filed rebellion charges against national opposition figure Aquilino Pimentel. Pimentel, who is free on bail, resumed his place in the National Assembly in November, when the Supreme Court overturned a decision by the Commission on Elections invalidating his 1984 election.

There is no evidence of the practice of compulsory or forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Persons currently charged with crimes are legally presumed innocent until proven guilty and, if arrested after martial law was lifted in 1981, receive public trials in civilian courts.

The right to counsel is guaranteed by law and in general honored from the time a person is presented in court for the reading of charges. However, there have been instances in which defendants in subversion and rebellion cases have been held incommunicado without access to counsel for significant periods of time. Once their detention was acknowledged, these defendants were normally permitted visits by lawyers and family members.

If a defendant cannot afford counsel, the court will appoint a lawyer. Private and government legal assistance is available to indigents, and there are lawyers' organizations which provide assistance to alleged national security offenders. Because of case backlogs, a shortage of judges, and the practice of hearing cases concurrently, trials in civilian courts often take 2 to 3 years. Subversion and rebellion trials have frequently lasted longer. Trial by jury is not a part of Philippine jurisprudence. Questions of law and fact, including determinations of guilt or innocence, are all resolved by the presiding judge.

Latest available government figures (September 1985) showed 490 persons accused of national security offenses being held without bail. TFD, which compiles statistics on "political detainees," reported as of June that there were 556 "political prisoners," as compared with 851 at the end of 1984.

The Supreme Court continued to show some signs of assertiveness in sensitive areas. In late December 1984 the Court ruled that a 1982 raid by military authorities on the offices of We Forum, an opposition newspaper, was illegal and unconstitutional because the warrants upon which the raid was based were issued without probable cause. In February, the Supreme Court dismissed all outstanding subversion charges against former Senator Jovito Salonga when a prosecutor threatened to reopen his case after previously dropping the charges. The Court asserted that the original indictment against Salonga was filed with undue haste and was based on hearsay testimony.

There remains, however, widespread Philippine cynicism regarding the fairness and independence of the judiciary, and there is frequent criticism that political influence or bribery of individual judges plays a part in judicial decisions. In August, the Supreme Court ruled that previous testimony by armed forces Chief of Staff General Fabian Ver and seven other defendants could not be used against them at the Aquino assassination trial. General Ver and the other military defendants have since been acquitted and General Ver reinstated as Chief of Staff. The 8-month trial included intimidation, disappearances and recantations of prosecution witnesses, charges of judicial favoritism towards the accused, and a lack of prosecution vigor. At the acquittal in December, the Court reaffirmed the Government's contention that Aquino was murdered by a Communist hit man. That conclusion lacks credibility in the Philippines, inasmuch as it is inconsistent with the 1984 finding of an independent investigative board which implicated elements of the military in the assassination.

Charges in subversion and rebellion cases are often vague. There have been some cases with multiple defendants where conspiracy to overthrow the Government was alleged but little detail was provided in the charges. Members of the opposition have sometimes been linked to alleged conspiracies with subversive elements, and some have left the country to avoid lengthy trials, restriction of movement, or possible imprisonment. The line between national security offenses and common crimes is frequently blurred, and lengthy legal proceedings often result.

In practice there have been few convictions for subversion and rebellion. Trials, including those of better known defendants, tend to continue indefinitely. In many instances, defendants held under preventive detention regulations and charged with subversion are given "temporary release" while their trials continue. Others have been released outright after a few weeks or months.

THE PHILIPPINES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

The state intrudes little into the family life of most Filipinos. Parents are free to raise their children as they see fit. Religious practices are a personal matter, as is the decision to join a political party. The Constitution's Bill of Rights specifies that persons shall be secure in their homes and guarantees the privacy of communications and correspondence. These rights are generally respected by the authorities.

A search warrant may be issued by a judge upon a finding of probable cause. The President may also order a search. There have been allegations that the property of some persons accused of subversion or rebellion has sometimes been searched without a warrant, but in most instances the authorities obtain warrants before acting.

Reports persist that in some rural areas in Mindanao forcible resettlement continued throughout 1985, notwithstanding the 1982 government ban on the practice. According to the Government, higher levels of combat between government forces and Communist insurgents have led some people in scattered rural areas to relocate their homes of their own volition, often for limited periods, to avoid danger. There have been reports of such population movements from different parts of the country.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech and press are abridged in practice. Media restrictions are usually political and economic in nature, rather than in the form of direct government censorship. Nevertheless, Philippine media now operate with a degree of freedom greater than at any time since the imposition of martial law in 1972. Overall, the Philippine print media are among the most free in the region.

Newspapers in the Philippines are generally divided into two categories: those considered "government-influenced" and those which assume an "oppositionist/independent" editorial line. Three of the country's largest nationally circulated newspapers are owned or controlled by relatives or close associates of the Marcos family. Direct criticism of the Marcos family in these papers is rare, but they do provide coverage, in news reporting, editorials, and in columns, which is occasionally critical of specific government policies and personalities. The progovernment papers have made it a practice since the 1983 Aquino assassination to provide regular coverage of opposition political activities. Outspoken antiestablishment commentary is a common feature of independent newspapers and magazines.

The Philippine public has access to several major international news publications even though these publications sometimes contain articles and editorials sharply critical of the Government. Foreign journalists regularly travel in the Philippines and file stories without hindrance. The Government announced in October a new policy permitting domestic and foreign reporters to cover operations of the Philippine military against the Communist insurgency. The new guidelines were intended to expand coverage as a means of informing the public of the actual dimensions of the insurgency problem.

The Government maintains a significant degree of influence over the electronic media, particularly television. Manila has one government-owned television station and four privately-owned stations controlled by persons with close links to the Marcos administration. They produce programs for distribution in Manila and other major cities. All television stations appear to accept government guidance on their editorial policy and often ignore or downplay opposition political activities. A group seeking to obtain a license to operate a Catholic lay television station reported that its application remained stalled throughout 1985.

Radio remains an especially important source of news and information in provincial areas. Ownership is dominated by government loyalists, although there are significant exceptions, such as Radio Veritas, a Catholic church-linked station which provides the only "independent" coverage of local and national issues.

Much attention was focused on the reported killings of 12 journalists in the first 9 months of 1985, bringing the total of newsmen killed to 22 since 1979. Human rights organizations allege government involvement in some of the attacks; the military blames the NPA for some of the deaths; and some of the killings apparently involved purely personal motives. In at least three instances in 1985, the murdered journalists had been actively pursuing stories on alleged corruption in Government or abuses by security forces.

Libel suits are frequently filed in the Philippines, sometimes as a pressure tactic against reporters, with varying degrees of success. A conviction for libel can result in up to 3 years' imprisonment. During the course of the Aquino murder trial, contempt of court charges were filed against two organs of the independent press for casting doubt on the impartiality and integrity of the court hearing the case. In one instance, the charges were quickly dropped; the other case is under court review.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

A broad range of private professional, religious, social, charitable, and political organizations flourishes in the Philippines. The right of peaceful assembly is guaranteed by the Constitution, and this right was generally exercised freely by numerous groups protesting government policies or other issues in 1985. An estimated 100,000 persons joined rallies and marches throughout the Philippines on May 1, Labor Day, with upwards of 50,000 marchers participating in Manila alone. On August 21, 1985, about 70,000 persons were involved in two separate antigovernment demonstrations in Manila to commemorate the second anniversary of Benigno Aquino's death. Thousands of others marched in provincial towns and cities. Opposition rallies are frequently held on a nation-wide basis.

Permits from local authorities are required for outdoor demonstrations in public places. The Government usually complied with requests for rally permits, but some were denied on the grounds of alleged involvement by subversive elements. In some instances, local officials later agreed to issue the permits. Rallies and marches are often held without permits. Although the Government advocates a policy of "maximum tolerance" for handling street demonstrations, excessive force was used to disperse otherwise peaceful but permitless demonstrations in some towns and major cities. In addition to the Escalante shootings in September discussed in Section 1.a., police reportedly shot and killed 2 persons and wounded 14 others during a farmers' rally in Manila in October.

A variety of trade unions claim slightly more than 2 million workers out of a total labor force of 20 million. There are also about 2.7 million workers in the National Congress of Farmers Organizations. Union membership in the Philippines tends to be nominal, rather than being composed of active, dues-paying members. However, there are no government restrictions on the right to organize and to affiliate with federations, confederations, or international organizations, or on the right to strike, except for public servants and employees of certain government corporations. National labor organizations are affiliated to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and to the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). The nation has 1,954 registered labor groups; none has been canceled or "deregistered" during the past 2 years. Union certification elections are generally considered to be fairly run.

Unions continue to negotiate collective bargaining agreements and to strike. In October, the Ministry of Labor and Employment (MOLE) reported 2,007 collective bargaining agreements covering 266,000 workers as "active."

Compulsory arbitration was exercised in 12 of 937 strike notice instances in 1984, and in 7 of 275 instances through August 1985. The incidence of strikes in the garment industry, in semi-conductor firms, and at export processing zones increased in 1985. Even some public sectors "exempted" from strikes have experienced stoppages. Although a penalty of 6 months' imprisonment for illegal acts by strikers exists, the Labor Ministry asserts that there have been no convictions. However, a Presidential Letter of Instruction was issued in 1985 allowing police to serve injunctions on the picket line in order to halt strikes which the Ministry has not authorized. The use of violence is endemic in the Philippines among management and labor. There have been numerous assassinations of labor leaders and trade union members. The military charges that some leftist labor leaders have engaged in assassination.

The Trade Union Congress of the Philippines (TUCP), established in 1975, claims 1.3 million non-agricultural workers and is the only officially recognized trade union umbrella organization in the country. As a result of this official status, TUCP officials are appointed as representatives of labor on tripartite boards such as the Social Security Commission and the National Council on Wages. Because of these links, the TUCP is often criticized by non-TUCP union leaders as being government controlled. However, the TUCP frequently criticizes the Government about poor wages and bad working conditions as well as on issues affecting trade union autonomy from government controls.

Most government-owned and controlled organizations (a different category from public servants), are unionized and negotiate collective bargaining agreements. Public service associations, such as public school teachers, cannot legally form recognized unions nor can they legally go on strike. Nonetheless, the Manila Public School Teachers Association struck several times during the past year. The Government is considering a bill to permit public sector employees to organize and bargain but with limitations on their right to strike.

The ILO has communicated with the Government to criticize aspects of the Filipino labor situation, including the requirement of approval by 30 percent of the work force before union recognition is granted; restrictions on the right to establish federations; compulsory arbitration in certain instances; a 1982 law banning strikes in industries that affect the national interest (including export-oriented ones in export processing zones); advance approval of strikes by two-thirds of union members; decrees threatening imprisonment of picketers propagandizing against the Government; and denial of the right to organize unions for teachers, public health personnel, and other public servants. The Government has replied in some detail to ILO criticisms; its reply appeared in the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The ILO has noted that a review of labor legislation is under way and that a draft bill is before the National Assembly incorporating some of the provisions referred to by ILO supervisory bodies.

There is no established state religion in the Philippines, and the right to practice one's religion is fully respected. Over 80 percent of the population is Roman Catholic. There are several Protestant and independent Christian groups, and a sizeable Muslim minority. In the Sulu Archipelago in the southwest portion of the country and in parts of Mindanao, Muslims comprise the majority. The Government is assisting efforts to preserve the Filipino Muslim identity and cultural heritage. It has established an institute to train Filipino, Muslim religious and legal leaders for positions in the Sharia court system, which is based on Muslim personal law. The Government also provides assistance to Islamic schools and centers and facilitates the travel of Muslim pilgrims to Mecca. Foreign clergymen and missionaries of various faiths normally perform their duties without difficulty.

Major political parties and groupings in the Philippines have members and leaders from different religions. Government service is open to all on a nondiscriminatory basis, and several senior civil and military officials belong to minority religious groups.

Throughout 1985, the hierarchy of the Philippine Catholic Church, including Jaime Cardinal Sin, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Manila, continued to criticize the Government on various issues, human rights being prominent among them. Pastoral letters critical of the administration were read from pulpits in Catholic churches throughout the Philippines. Many Catholic priests and nuns are actively involved in calling public attention to cases of human rights abuses. Such criticism has at times evoked a negative reaction from high-level authorities, including the President, who claim that the Church has intruded in politics and violates the constitutional doctrine of separation of church and state.

THE PHILIPPINES

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom to change one's place of residence and employment. Emigration is generally permitted, but former detainees on "temporary release" status need government permission to leave the country, as do persons subject to pending criminal (including national security related) charges. Thousands of Filipinos travel to the United States and elsewhere as temporary visitors each year. Many Filipinos are employed as overseas workers, particularly in the Middle East. Foreign travel for this purpose is encouraged by the Government.

A 1980 Presidential Decree provides that persons convicted of subversion, rebellion, or sedition shall forfeit their rights as citizens, whether such acts are committed inside or outside the country. The decree also provides that judgments may be rendered in absentia. No instance of enforcement of this decree is known.

At the end of October, there were 2,962 Indochinese in a first asylum camp in the Philippines. In addition to providing first asylum to "boat people," the Government, in cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, operates a major refugee processing center in Bataan Province where refugees and displaced persons from camps in the Philippines and other Southeast Asian countries receive English language instruction, cultural orientation, and vocational training before being resettled elsewhere. There were 15,023 refugees and displaced persons in the processing center as of the end of October.

President Ferdinand Marcos, Chief Executive since 1965, wields preeminent power under the country's 1973 Constitution, which provides for a strong president in a presidential-parliamentary system. The President is elected by direct popular vote. President Marcos is currently serving a 6-year term to which he was elected in 1981. In view of questions raised during the year about the Government's mandate, President Marcos, with the concurrence of the opposition, called in November for a presidential election in early 1986, slightly more than 1 year earlier than had been scheduled.

In December, active campaigning began by both President Marcos, the candidate of the ruling KBL Party, and the opposition candidate, Corazon Aquino, widow of the murdered Benigno Aquino. Mrs. Aquino's candidacy was encouraged by broad popular support as indicated, for example, by a petition urging her to run reportedly signed by more than 1.2 million Filipinos. Her "unity ticket" with Vice Presidential candidate Salvador Laurel was created under the banner of his United Nationalist Democratic Organization. Marcos chose as his running mate National Assembly member and former Foreign Minister Arturo Tolentino.

The President possesses extraordinary powers to issue decrees which have the force of law unless overturned by the National Assembly. While described in the Constitution as being subject to exercise only in emergency situations or in instances where the National Assembly is unable to act promptly, these powers, in practice, frequently have been used by the President to legislate widely, particularly in the economic sphere. In combination with his constitutional authority, the President uses his control of the ruling KBL Party (New Society Movement) to dominate the political arena. Within the ruling party, issues are often discussed in caucus, and accommodation on key issues is sometimes reflected in the President's final decisions.

As a result of the 1984 elections to the National Assembly, members of various opposition parties and independents now hold about one-third of the seats in that body, as contrasted to the preceding 190-seat assembly, which had fewer than 10 active opposition members when its term ended in June 1984. The ruling KBL party, by force of numbers, still wields preeminent power in the legislature. This fact, together with the President's independent law-making powers, have made it impossible for opposition members to shape a legislative agenda of their own. Nevertheless, the Assembly was a forum for lively political debate and sharp criticism of the Government throughout 1985 and provided a new degree of public accountability and transparency to the system. Among the issues aired prominently in the Assembly was alleged improper foreign investments ("hidden wealth") of Philippine leaders, including President and Mrs. Marcos.

The Philippines is a signatory of all principal U.N. human rights and refugee conventions and is currently a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission. Representatives of various international human rights groups visited the Philippines in 1985 and traveled throughout the country, meeting both Philippine government officials and private citizens involved in human rights matters.

In its communication with the Government noted in Section 2.b., the ILO also expressed concern about trials of labor leaders, the disappearance of three others, the seizure in August and September 1982 of union property, and restrictions on travel of labor leader Bonifacio Tupaz. (However, Mr. Tupaz traveled to New Delhi, Moscow, and Los Angeles in 1985.) The Government informed the ILO in January that the trials noted by the ILO had been postponed. The unionists involved are under a technical "house arrest" but have resumed normal activities.

Several Catholic and Protestant church groups are active in the human rights field. Task Force Detainees (TFD) of the Philippines was established in 1974 by the Association of Major Religious Superiors of the Catholic Church. Headquartered in Manila and with regional field offices, it investigates allegations only of government human rights abuses and publishes reports on its findings. A politically active organization, reportedly with ties to leftist elements, it is an outspoken critic of the Marcos Government and its human rights practices. TFD operates with relative freedom although a few of its members have been arrested on charges of subversion and rebellion.

THE PHILIPPINES

The Integrated Bar of the Philippines, a national organization to which all practicing lawyers must belong, has an active human rights committee which has investigated specific alleged abuses and issues reports. The Free Legal Assistance Group (FLAG), and the Movement of Attorneys for Brotherhood, Integrity and Nationalism, Inc. (MABINI) also assist detainees in preparing defenses against charges brought against them.

The Ministry of National Defense has a special committee for investigating reported human rights violations involving military personnel. The committee's influence has been limited, but its investigations have on occasion led to legal proceedings against servicemen for abusive behavior. The Ministry reported that it cooperates on human rights cases with civilian groups, including the Catholic Bishops' Conference of the Philippines and the National Council of Churches of the Philippines, as well as international organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern about continuing reports of human rights violations by members of the armed forces and paramilitary units under their command and alleges that the Government rarely initiated impartial investigations into such alleged violations. Freedom House rates the Philippines "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Philippines, with a population of 56.8 million (mid-1985 estimate) and a population growth rate of 2.4 percent, is predominantly an agricultural country ranking in the lower middle range of developing countries.

The economy was seriously affected by the recent worldwide recession, and by domestic mismanagement, including government-created monopolies. This led to a financial crisis in the last quarter of 1983, precipitated by substantial capital flight and reduced credit availability following the Aquino assassination. In 1984, per capita gross national product (GNP) was estimated at $603, a decline of 7 percent, and it is expected to decline again in 1985 by an estimated 5 to 7 percent. The poorest 60 percent of the population received 25 percent of total income in 1971 but only 21.4 percent 10 years later. The upper 10 percent moved from 37.1 percent of national income in 1972 to 42 percent in 1981. In May 1985, unemployment was about 14.7 percent nationally and 23.5 percent in Metro Manila. Real wages have fallen by 27 percent in the last 4 years, and an already difficult economic situation for workers is worsening. With much of the population under the age of 15 and a high population growth rate, the Philippines can expect a continued growth of job entrants in coming years.

In recent years the Government has emphasized rural development with programs aimed at increasing production of foodgrains, meat, poultry, and fish. The thrust of these programs has been dulled by excessive intervention in pricing and marketing, resulting in reduced incentives for agricultural producers. The Philippines has for several years been marginally self-sufficient in rice, the staple food, but some rice was imported in 1984 because of drought in 1983. Land reform in rice and corn holdings has contributed to security of tenure or lowered rents for some of the rural population, but significant land tenure problems still exist in several areas of the country. At present, agriculture provides employment for slightly over half the work force, and generates about one-quarter of the GNP. The Government has formulated a plan to promote export-oriented industries and agribusiness to spur economic growth, increase foreign exchange earnings, and provide employment. Traditionally, the Philippines has depended heavily on coconut products and other commodity exports that are subject to international price fluctuations. The Government has also facilitated overseas employment for Filipinos, with the largest number concentrated in the Middle East.

In 1985, life expectancy at birth was 65.4 years and infant mortality was 52.5 per 1,000 live births. It was estimated that about 50 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water, with 35 percent of residents in highly urbanized areas drawing their daily water needs from unsafe sources. In 1980, 41 percent of Filipinos in rural areas lived below a government-defined absolute poverty level, with 32 percent below that level in urban areas. It was estimated in 1980 that the ratio of calorie supply relative to nutritional requirements reached 118.1 percent for all Filipinos. However, there were frequent reports in 1985 of serious malnutrition in areas of the country heavily dependent on the depressed sugar-export sector.

Free education in the primary grades is available to all Filipinos. However recent government data indicate that of the children who begin primary school, only about 70 percent complete it. The adult literacy rate approaches 90 percent.

Children under 15 may not legally be employed except when working directly under the sole responsibility of parents or guardians. However, with parental assent and under the rules laid down by the Ministry of Labor and Employment (MOLE), apprentice programs are allowed for children 14 years and over. The Labor Code also places responsibility on the Minister of Labor for conditions of employment of all persons aged 15 to 18 but prohibits employment in hazardous occupations of those younger than 18. There are credible reports of many violations of these provisions of the Labor Code.

The 8-hour day, 48-hour week and a rest day after each 6 working days are mandated by law. With exceptions, women are prohibited from working between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. The Labor Ministry plays a key role in the setting of legislated minimum daily wages rates. The minimum daily rate for nonagricultural workers in Metro Manila was $57.08 per day as of November 1, 1984. Outside of Metro Manila the rate was $56.00. In the agricultural sector, and for nonplantation workers, it is $35.67. (The peso in December was valued at 18.6 to $1.00.) The Ministry of Labor conducts inspections to ensure compliance with minimum wage standards and working conditions but admits that it faces a difficult task. It cites a study claiming that of the Manila "sweatshops" it surveyed half paid substandard wages. The Ministry concludes that the 8-hour day requirement is more apt to be respected but notes that firms in the Bataan export processing zone usually report considerable overtime. There are reports of compulsory overtime. All workplace laws apply equally to export zones. Inspections between January-October 1984 of 923 establishments revealed 1,980 violations of wage rules involving cost of living allowances, 13th-month payments, overtime, and related matters.

Philippine occupational health safety standards were codified in 1978. The Labor Ministry has stated that the number of inspections it can perform is still far too low. Of the 5,361 establishments inspected in January-October 1984, 707 (or 13.2 percent) had violations. Violations are most common in small nonunion shops according to a recent survey. The Ministry is trying to upgrade and increase its inspection corps as well as to disseminate more information through academic and other training programs and in the tripartite forums.

Women enjoy full voting privileges and have the right to own and inherit property. They are prominent in Philippine society and represented in large numbers in business and in professions such as law, medicine, education, and journalism. They are also active in politics, being well represented in both national and local governments and within the political opposition. There are 2 women members of the Cabinet and 10 in the current National Assembly, and numerous posts within the judicial and executive branches of the Government are held by women. As mentioned earlier, Corazon Aquino, widow of the murdered Benigno Aquino, is running against President Marcos in the scheduled February 7 presidential election. Imelda Marcos, wife of the President, holds the office of Minister of Human Settlements and exercises considerable influence. Women also occupy posts in local government as governors and mayors.

SINGAPORE

Singapore has a parliamentary system under which the People's Action Party (PAP), headed by Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, has held power since independence in 1965. The PAP continues to dominate Parliament, holding all but 2 of the 79 seats. That the Government enjoys broad public support is indicated by the 62.9 percent share of the popular vote it received in the December 1984 general election. Public criticism of the Government flared somewhat during the 1984 election campaign, but lessened in 1985, with public concerns focused primarily on government management of the economy. The civil service is efficient and corruption is officially and actively discouraged.

Singapore was subject to acts of terrorism by members of the Communist Party of Malaya (CPM) through 1974. While there have been no terrorist incidents in recent years, the CPM considers Singapore within its sphere of operation. Government military and security agencies work to control and, if possible, to eliminate the threat of internal disturbances. They act within what most Singaporeans consider to be the bounds of acceptable legal conduct.

Singapore's strategic location and industrious population give it economic importance in Southeast Asia out of proportion to its small size. Following independence, the economy expanded rapidly, with foreign trade and shipping reaching record levels. In recent years industrialization has been rapid. However, 1985 saw a small downturn in the economy.

No significant changes in the human rights situation took place in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known instances of politically-motivated killing in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence that people were abducted, secretly arrested, or held in clandestine detention by official or quasi-official security forces, other elements of the Government, or opposition forces in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law under Sections 330 and 331 of the Penal Code. In past years individual instances of mistreatment by law enforcement personnel have been alleged by former detainees and by Amnesty International. The Government has acknowledged that its interrogation procedures employ psychological stress, as alleged by ex-detainees, but denies allegations of abuse or torture.

Prison conditions in Singapore are spartan. Singapore's eight prisons confine about 3,000 prisoners, with some 4,000 others held in drug rehabilitation centers. Political detainees are separated from other prisoners. Since 1981 the Government has stepped up efforts to rehabilitate prisoners serving sentences of one year or more. The prison welfare services program which had concentrated on young offenders and adult first-time offenders was extended in 1985 to include habitual offenders and drug abusers.

Singapore's Penal Code mandates minimum prison sentences varying from 6 months to 8 years and caning from 6 to 12 strokes for certain crimes including outrage of modesty, rape, theft, extortion, robbery, housebreaking, and vehicle theft.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Law enforcement authorities in Singapore follow established legal procedures for arrest or detention. Incommunicado detention does not occur. Arrest without a warrant and detention without charge for periods of 1 to 30 days are authorized under some specific provisions of the law. The Ministry of Home Affairs can issue an order under the Internal Security Act (ISA), a British measure used by Singapore extensively during the 1965-74 postindependence period when Communist-led disturbances and communal violence were widespread, or the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act to authorize a longer period of detention of a "suspected person." The Director of the Central Narcotics Bureau in cases of a positive urinalysis can commit suspected drug users to a six-month term in a drug rehabilitation center. Habeas corpus exists in the law, but in ISA cases the Government can extend detention indefinitely. In others, such as those involving the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act, which is used primarily to detain drug traffickers and members of secret societies, the Government can detain people for periods of up to one year. People who are detained are arrested openly. There is a functioning system of bail, and detainees are entitled to legal counsel.

The Misuse of Drugs Act allows Central Narcotics Bureau Officers and Customs Officials to arrest without warrant any person suspected of manufacturing, importing, exporting, possessing, consuming, or trafficking in controlled drugs. Such persons actually arrested are tried in court. A few individuals have maintained that they were not drug users and were improperly detained but, thus far, have failed to substantiate their allegations in court. The Government has maintained that adequate safeguards exist to prevent innocent persons being detained.

One person remains held in detention under terms of the ISA. More than 1,000 persons are held in indefinite detention under the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act, primarily for membership in Chinese triads (mafia-like secret societies) or for drug-trafficking offenses.

Singapore law prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a public trial is observed except for persons detained under the provisions of the ISA and the Criminal Law (Temporary Provisions) Act. The Government defends its policy of detention without trial in these cases on the ground that an open trial could result in the intimidation or death of witnesses and officials.

SINGAPORE

The Criminal Procedures Code provides that a charge against a defendant must be read and explained to him as soon as it is framed by the magistrate. The accused has the right to be defended by an attorney (advocate). Individuals are tried by a magistrate or judge and do not have the right to trial by jury. Defendants may appeal their verdicts in most cases to higher courts. Singapore is a member of the British Commonwealth and allows for further appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London.

Judges are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. Four of the seven High Court judges hold what amount to contract appointments, most frequently for one year. Subordinate court judges (magistrates) and public prosecutors are civil servants and can be transferred by the Ministry of Law.

Citizens can take government agencies to court over such matters as compulsory land acquisitions and compensation. The Government has not lost a case involving a challenge to its major policies. Members of opposition political parties have been taken to court frequently, as have members of the PAP, including government ministers.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government acts arbitrarily through use of its wide discretionary powers when it believes that the security of the nation is threatened. Search warrants are required for intrusion into the home, in most cases. However, law enforcement officers may search a person, home, or property without a warrant if they have reasonable grounds to believe that it is necessary to do so. In most cases, the law does not require later judicial review of such action. Divisions of the Government's law enforcement agencies, including the Internal Security Division (ISD) and the Corrupt Practices Investigation Board (CPIB), have a wide network for gathering information.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are circumscribed. The Government forbids statements which might arouse communal tensions among the various races (approximately 77 percent Chinese, 15 percent Malay, 6 percent Indian, and 2 percent other minorities).

Newspapers operate as independent companies but under close government supervision. While there is no direct censorship of the press, members of the press understand the restraints and guidelines within which they must operate. They did not significantly exceed these guidelines in 1985. In the past, editors and reporters have been reprimanded for articles criticizing the Government too strongly. Some press representatives believe that they may lose their jobs if they criticize the Government too severely. However, the press reports the opposition's views and has frequently published statements critical of the Government's proposals and policies.

The Government-owned Singapore Broadcasting Corporation (SBC) has a monopoly on domestic radio and television. SBC follows government guidelines on its news reporting and obeys censorship regulations on the programs which it broadcasts. The BBC World Service and Malaysian Radio and Television can be received uncensored in Singapore on local broadcast bands.

An official board of film censors approves motion pictures, television, and videotapes. Additional government bodies censor magazines, records, plays, and other media. The Government censors these items primarily to prevent the spread of materials which it feels will undermine the morals of young Singaporeans, advocate excessive permissiveness, or promote drug abuse. A wide range of international magazines and newspapers can be purchased uncensored in Singapore. The country is a regional publishing center for a growing number of international magazines and newspapers.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Assemblies of more than five people in a public place, including political rallies, are authorized only with permission from the police. In practice, the Government does not stop gatherings of groups of more than five people for social purposes.

In order to operate legally in Singapore, associations, societies, clubs, churches, and other organizations with more than 10 members must be registered with the Government under the Societies Act. Registration is denied to societies likely to be used for unlawful purposes or for purposes prejudicial to public peace, welfare, or good order. In the past, arrests have been made at gatherings of unregistered organizations, including some splinter religious groups which the Government viewed as inimical to the public interest.

Unions are legally allowed in Singapore. However, the Trades Union Act places restrictions on workers' rights. Unions are organized under an umbrella organization, the National Trades Union Congress (NTUC), which has a Deputy Prime Minister as its Secretary General and members of Parliament on the board of directors. The NTUC has about 191,000 members in a national work force of about 1.2 million. The NTUC's campaign to encourage the formation of house unions, criticized by traditionalists in the labor sector as a government effort to co-opt the union movement, abated markedly in 1985. A government proposal in 1985 to limit the role of the National Wages Council in establishing wage guidelines could significantly alter the environment for collective bargaining, providing unions a more direct role in negotiating wage agreements with management. Although workers have the legal right to strike, there have been no strikes in Singapore for over seven years. The NTUC remains a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and Singapore continues its membership in the International Labor Organization (ILO).

Freedom of religion is enshrined in the Constitution and in practice. A Presidential Council on Minority Rights exists to insure that legislation does not infringe on the rights of ethnic or religious minorities. There is no state religion, but the Government has provided financial assistance to some religious bodies to allow them to build and maintain places of worship. Missionaries are permitted to work and to publish religious texts in Singapore.

SINGAPORE

All religious groups are subject to government scrutiny and must be legally registered. The Government restricts religious sects holding views it considers inimical to the common good by application of the Societies Act and has banned some splinter groups in the past from practicing their faiths in Singapore. There are no restrictions based on religious affiliation to membership in the ruling People's Action Party.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no limitations on freedom of movement within the country other than those under the ISA. The ISA allows the Minister for Home Affairs to suspend or revoke a detention order or impose restrictions on a person's activities, place of residence, and travel outside of Singapore. All Singapore residents over the age of 13 are required to register with the Government, receive and carry an identification card, and report changes of address within 14 days. An individual may be denied a passport at the Government's discretion, although in practice this applies only to persons convicted of serious crimes. Males approaching the age of 18 (when National Service is generally performed) must obtain an exit permit from the Ministry of Defense. Recipients of government-financed educational benefits are required to sign a bond obligation to serve the Government for a fixed period and may not emigrate without paying the balance of their bond.

The right of voluntary repatriation is extended to holders of Singaporean passports. However, several hundred ethnic Chinese who left Singapore for China during the politically difficult 1940's and 1950's have encountered obstacles to their return.

Refugees are granted first asylum for 90 days in Singapore only if they have a third-country guarantee of resettlement. As of October 1985, more than 25,000 Indochinese refugees had been brought into Singapore in asylum status.

Singapore is a self-described "socialist democracy," although private enterprise has been recognized as a major driving force contributing to the country's economic success. Seventy-seven of 79 members of the unicameral Parliament are members of the ruling People's Action Party (PAP), headed by Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew. General elections in 1984, which netted the PAP its overwhelming majority in the Parliament, gave government candidates nearly two-thirds of the popular vote and served as a reliable barometer of public support for the Lee Government.

Non-Communist parties are legally free to organize, and there are approximately 20 registered political parties in Singapore. These parties are closely monitored by the Government, which justifies its actions on the grounds that Communists might participate in elections and candidates might make libelous statements. The successful prosecution of libel and defamation suits against opposition parties and candidates by members of the PAP bankrupted three opposition politicians from the Barisan Solialis Party in the mid-1970's. One of the two opposition MP's was convicted in September 1985 of financial irregularities as part of a long-running series of legal actions against the top two leaders of the Workers' Party. He has appealed the conviction and remains free to participate in political activity. The charges are sufficiently minor so that, whatever the outcome of the trial, his seat in Parliament is not in jeopardy.

Minorities are constitutionally guaranteed equal rights and actively participate in the political process.

There are no organizations in Singapore which actively and openly monitor human rights violations. Governmental bodies such as the Minority Rights Council monitor certain aspects of human rights in Singapore for domestic purposes. Representatives of Amnesty International and other human rights groups are not allowed to visit Singapore in an official capacity. The Amnesty International 1985 Report expressed concern about the powers of preventive detention exercised by the Government under the ISA. It also criticized the practice of caning, which Amnesty International opposes as being cruel, unusual, and degrading punishment. Freedom House rates Singapore "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Singapore is an urban city-state with a strong and prosperous free enterprise economy. Singapore's population in 1985 stood at 2.55 million, with a growth rate of 1.1 percent. The success of the country's population control program is based on wide-ranging disincentives to having more than two children, including educational, tax, and medical benefits measures. Per capita gross national product reached $6,852 in 1984--one of the highest in Asia after Japan, Brunei, and Nauru. Private ownership of property is a basic feature of Singapore's economy, although the Government has, and exercises, almost unlimited right to acquire land at 1973 prices for extensive development projects.

The standard of living is relatively high, but the real gross domestic product, which grew at a rate of nearly eight percent in 1984, is expected to show a negative growth rate in 1985. While the economic downturn has tempered somewhat the steadily rising level of expectations, Singapore's basic housing, educational, and nutritional standards remain high.

The infant mortality rate was 9.1 per 1,000 live births in 1985. Life expectancy at birth in 1985 was 72.7 years. In 1985 about three-quarters of the population was housed in well-designed, government-subsidized housing. The entire population has access to safe drinking water. Singapore had 11 government and 12 private hospitals in 1985. The quality of health care is very high in both private and government facilities, and the former are subsidized heavily by the Government. Education is not compulsory, but free primary education is provided for children of all Singapore citizens. Secondary and tertiary education is of high quality and provided at modest cost. The enrollment ratio for students aged 6-17 years was 83.9 percent in 1982. The literacy rate rose to 85 percent in 1983.

SINGAPORE

Singapore enforces child labor laws which protect young people from exploitation and hazardous working conditions. Employment below the age of 12 is prohibited, as is employment of young people during the night. Relatively high wage rates and working conditions consistent with accepted international standards are features of the Singapore labor market which, despite the economic downturn, still provided jobs for some 50,000 foreign workers. The unemployment rate in late 1985 stood at 4.1 percent, and the Government has predicted that this will rise to between 5 and 6 percent in 1986. Singapore has no minimum wage legislation.

Singapore enforces comprehensive occupational safety and health laws. Enforcement procedures, coupled with the promotion of educational and training programs, have reduced the frequency rate of job-related accidents from 7.0 accidents per million man hours worked in the early 1970's to 4.7 during a comparable 3-year period in the 1980's. The severity rate of accidents has been reduced commensurately.

Women generally enjoy equal rights, primarily under the 1969 Women's Charter and the Constitution. Muslim women's rights are protected by the provisions of the 1957 Administration of Muslim Law, which permits Muslim women to apply for divorce and provides for women to hold and dispose of property. Women have voting rights and the right of equality of economic opportunity under the law.

There are few women in the top ranks of the civil service or business. As a result of the 1984 election, however, there are now three PAP female members of Parliament. In 1983 the median gross monthly income of female workers was 64 percent of that for male workers. A shortage of workers has led the Government to encourage women to work. Singaporean women do not have equal rights with men in the transmission of citizenship to their children. A Singapore woman married to a foreigner can not pass citizenship to children born outside the country, although a Singaporean man can. Additionally, the wife of a Singaporean male can receive permanent resident status and citizenship based on the marriage while the husband of a Singaporean woman can not.

Social, economic, and cultural facilities are available to all citizens regardless of race, religion, or sex. Disparities exist among the various races, although not as a result of government policies. For example, according to 1980 census data, 0.21 percent of Malays had a university education, while 1.8 percent of the Chinese and 2.44 percent of the Indians attained that level of education.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

Solomon Islands is a developing country composed of 6 large islands and numerous small ones stretching over 840 miles in the southern Pacific Ocean. It has a parliamentary system consisting of a single-chamber legislative assembly of 38 members. This system, adopted when the country became independent in 1978, accords well both with Solomon Islands' experience and with the Melanesian tradition of leadership based upon individual achievement and political consensus. Political legitimacy thus rests on free popular voting. The police are under civilian control; there are no other armed forces. The courts are independent and vigorously protect individual rights. Since independence, two parliamentary elections have been held and one additional change of government was accomplished by vote of Parliament.

Agricultural exports and external aid are the country's primary sources of foreign exchange. The Government recognizes the need for private enterprise for economic development. Its conservative fiscal and monetary policies support a healthy business climate. The country's main exports are timber, fish, copra, and palm oil.

Human rights in Solomon Islands are rigorously protected. No abuses were reported in 1985. Despite some traditional inertia, women's rights are improving.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political killing does not occur in Solomon Islands.

b. Disappearance

There are no reports of political disappearance in Solomon Islands.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is neither practiced nor condoned. All the basic protections of the integrity of the individual are guaranteed by the Constitution, implemented by the authorities, and defended by the courts and the Ombudsman for protection against possible excessive or unlawful treatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no evidence of politically motivated arrests. Exile is not practiced. Forced labor is forbidden, except as part of a sentence or court order.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Accused persons are entitled to counsel. Provision is made for writs of habeas corpus under the law and coerced statements are illegal. Civil rights violations are punishable by fines and jail sentences.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

- f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The traditional culture which governs the daily lives of most Solomon Islanders provides strong protection against these types of abuses.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

- a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional guarantees, an independent press, and a functioning democratic political system combine to insure freedom of speech and press. There are two private weekly newspapers, weekly and monthly national government newsletters, and one provincial government weekly. The state-owned radio gives significant coverage to statements of opposition politicians. In 1984, there had been several instances when foreign reporters were denied accreditation, most notably on the occasion of the Pope's visit. However, since the Government of Sir Peter Kenilorea came to power in late 1984, there have been no restrictions on foreign press activity.

- b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of association is constitutionally guaranteed and freely exercised. Demonstrators, however, must obtain a permit, which is usually granted. A recent exception was denial of a permit to demonstrate before the Pope during his visit in May 1984.

Unions have the right to engage in collective bargaining and in the private sector they have the right to strike. While civil servants are not supposed to strike, in September 1985 civil servants did so, effectively closing the ports and airport to protest alleged corruption in the Government Housing Committee. The strike ended when the Government dissolved the Committee.

The largest trade union, the Solomon Islands National Union of Workers, and other smaller unions freely organize workers. The plantation sector, however, is not widely unionized. Solomon Islands' unions have international ties with several organizations.

- c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by law; there are no controls on the practice of religion and no religious discrimination. Although Christianity is the dominant religion and has a wide variety of denominations, indigenous beliefs also flourish. Missionaries work without restrictions.

- d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no legal or administrative restrictions on the freedom of movement of Solomon Islands' citizens within or out of the country. Natural-born citizens may not be deprived of citizenship on any grounds.

SOLOMON ISLANDS

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since independence, Solomon Islands has had two parliamentary elections and several elections for provincial and local councils. The second of the two parliamentary elections, held in November 1984, resulted in the orderly replacement of former Prime Minister Mamaloni by Sir Peter Kenilorea, who, in secret balloting by the Parliament, received 21 out of a possible 33 votes. Election results were contested in some constituencies and court decisions resulted in new polls in a few instances. The overall results have been widely accepted as fair. Citizens over 18 enjoy universal suffrage. Parliament has the power to form governments.

There have been no allegations by outside organizations of human rights violations in Solomon Islands nor any request for investigations. The Amnesty International 1985 Report does not contain an entry for Solomon Islands. Freedom House rates it as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Solomon Islands in 1985 was 273,000 and growing at 3.5 percent per year. Both subsistence and market economies exist, with 9 out of 10 households being engaged to some extent in subsistence production, which accounts for 40 percent of gross domestic production. The economy depends heavily for its prosperity on international trade, exporting agricultural products while importing manufactured goods. Major fluctuations in world market prices can have a sharp impact on the economy. World prices for Solomon Islands exports rose precipitately in 1983-84 but subsided to lower levels in 1984-85. Per capita gross national product was US$657 in 1982.

The infant mortality rate has declined to 38.8 per 1,000 live births; life expectancy at birth is 58 years (World Bank). According to 1980-1982 World Bank estimates, 27 percent of the rural population had safe water. (Government statistics published in 1984 indicate that 38 percent of the rural population and nearly all urban dwellers, or 58 percent of the entire population, now have access to safe water). For the same period World Bank estimates give the per capita supply of calories as 79 percent of requirements. There appears to be an adequate supply of food. Health, education, and other social services are rudimentary but available on a nondiscriminatory basis. According to government statistics, the adult literacy rate in 1980 was 60 percent.

Solomon Islands has comprehensive laws on workers' rights. Child labor is forbidden for children under the age of 12 except in the company of parents in light agricultural or domestic work. Children under 15 are barred from work in industry or on ships; those under 18 cannot work underground or in mines. The standard workweek is 45 hours and is limited to 6 days. Power to set minimum wages has been devolved to the provincial governments. In Honiara, the capital, the minimum wage is about 30 cents per hour. There are provisions for premium pay for overtime and holiday work. Both a strong labor movement and an independent judiciary ensure widespread enforcement of labor laws in major state and private enterprises. The extent to which the law is enforced in smaller establishments and in the subsistence sector is problematic. No information is available on occupational safety and health legislation.

Women have equal legal rights, but traditional culture has hampered their moving into leadership roles. There are no women in senior governmental positions or in Parliament but women are involved in politics and have run for national office. According to 1981 World Bank statistics, 61.5 percent of girls are enrolled in primary schools and 79.4 percent of boys (for an average of 71 percent).

THAILAND

Thailand's government is a constitutional monarchy with a strong executive branch and a considerably weaker legislature composed of a 324-member elected Lower House and a 243-member appointed Senate. The elected house wields considerably less power than the government administrative organization and the military, which plays a strong and often dominant role in Thai political life. The monarchy exerts strong informal influence. The Prime Minister and his Cabinet are subject to votes of confidence, although they need not be popularly elected themselves. Free national elections for the Lower House were held in 1983, and the current Prime Minister, General (retired) Prem Tinsulanon, who has held office since February 1980, formed a four-party coalition government supported by roughly two-thirds of the Lower House. One of the parties was replaced when its leader was charged with participating in the failed military coup of September 9, 1985. Never colonized, Thailand traditionally has had self-government through an established administrative organization and laws based on majority consent.

Thailand's security apparatus operates within a constitutionally-mandated framework, but numerous police, civilian, and military agencies share responsibility, often with overlapping jurisdictions and ill-defined mandates. Reflecting the strong executive orientation of the Government, the security services have formidable powers. Although these powers are sometimes utilized in a heavy-handed or uneven way, human rights abuses attributable to the security services are not believed to be systematic and have been infrequent in recent years.

Communist insurgents, Muslim separatists, and mafia-type criminal gangs operate in rural areas and use terrorism to advance their respective aims. Communist strength has declined markedly in recent years due to several factors, including an amnesty program for defectors and financial assistance to help them reintegrate into society. The Government is also continuing efforts to integrate Thailand's Muslim community into the mainstream of national life. Sporadic low-level violence in southern Thailand in 1985 continued to call attention both to Communist and Muslim separatist activities in provinces along the Malaysian border.

Thailand is an emerging middle-income developing country with a free enterprise economic system in which individual interests and the right to hold private property are strongly protected. Thailand is one of the developing world's few net food exporters, and its industrial sector, after rapid expansion in recent years, now rivals agriculture in contributing to the gross domestic product.

During 1985 the human rights record remained consistent, without serious violations. Autonomous political parties, gatherings, and associations are allowed, and freedom from arbitrary detention or search is generally safeguarded, notwithstanding some infrequently enforced restrictive laws still on the books. Although it practices some self-censorship, the press is among the freest in Asia. Human rights activists in Thailand are able to bring issues to the attention of the Government and public and to lobby for corrective action.

THAILAND

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no 1985 reports of killings, including of summary executions in which official government involvement was alleged. Allegations of involvement by individual government officials were investigated. In rural areas, Communist insurgents and ethnic separatists have continued to use violence, including murder, to pursue their respective objectives. Their targets have included low-level Government officials, local entrepreneurs, and security officials.

In this and past years, the local press has noted the deaths of a number of journalists in rural areas. Such killings have diminished sharply in recent years, and local human rights activists regard the situation as distinctly improved. The human rights aspect of this problem is difficult to assess. Some of the murdered journalists had published articles on corruption or illegal activity, and very likely suffered for it. At the same time, however, some Thai journalists have only a nominal attachment to the profession, often becoming involved in extortion, blackmail, and similar activities which can lead to murder as a means of retaliation. Such murder is clearly criminal but it does not appear to represent political repression.

Communist insurgents and Muslim separatists have used terrorism as a political weapon, resulting in the disappearance of civilians and government officials. There have been allegations by human rights groups of cases of individual policemen in rural areas having killed habitual criminals, but no evidence to substantiate these allegations has been presented.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Allegations of torture by police have been made in the past by the Coordinating Group for Religion in Society (CGRS), a Thai human rights group, and by others. However, torture is not used as an instrument of government policy.

The Government has stated its opposition to the use of cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment. The CGRS, in its periodic reports, cites alleged cases of brutality and mistreatment by police and military personnel, but with less frequency than in the past. According to human rights activists in Thailand, alleged abuses of authority relating to cruel and inhuman punishment or treatment and arbitrary arrest and imprisonment have declined steadily over the last several years.

Prison conditions in Thailand remain poor because of serious overcrowding, low government expenditures, limited staff, corruption, and use of harmful drugs by prisoners. Prisoners are subject to strict regulations including corporal punishment for infractions. Prison conditions vary with the prisoner's social status as well as with the nature of the offense. However, there is no systematic discrimination save that Westerners generally receive preferential treatment. The United States-Thailand prisoner exchange agreement negotiated in 1982 has not yet entered into force.

On August 4 and 5, 1985, violent demonstrations erupted at the Bang Kwang maximum security prison in Bangkok, as Thai prisoners protested failure of the Government to announce an allegedly promised amnesty. Overcrowding was also cited as a factor in the revolt. Security forces employed maximum force to restore order, resulting in seven Thai prisoners killed and an undetermined number wounded. None of the 140 foreign prisoners in Bang Kwang prison was involved in the demonstrations and none was killed or injured in the suppression operation. Security restrictions and discipline in all prisons have been increased as a result of the riots.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Thailand's criminal and civil codes follow Western European models, and the rights of suspects are similar to those in Western Europe. Arrest warrants are generally required, and specific charges must be brought within a limited time period against those detained.

A small number of Communist insurgents and Muslim separatists have been detained without trial under martial law provisions previously in force, but martial law powers allowing arbitrary arrest and imprisonment were significantly reduced in 1984. Otherwise, the only legal basis for arrest and detention without specific charges for long periods (up to 480 days) is the Anti-Communist Activities Act. According to local human rights groups, persons detained pursuant to this act have not been mistreated.

Summary exile is not practiced. A few Thai have elected to go abroad and remain there for political reasons. This includes one of the leaders of the failed September 1985 coup attempt which was responsible for several deaths.

No cases of the practice of compulsory or forced labor have been reported. Such labor is prohibited under Section 31 of the Constitution except in time of war, during a state of emergency or martial law, or to avert "imminent public calamity."

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees criminal defendants the presumption of innocence as well as access to courts or administrative bodies to seek redress. Suspects can be denied the right to legal counsel during the pretrial or investigative period of their cases but have access to a lawyer of their own choosing before trial. In recent cases with political overtones, such as the arrests in 1984 of persons suspected of violating the Anti-Communist Activities Act, the Government moved quickly to allow rapid access by legal counsel and visitors during the pretrial period of the case. There is a functioning bail system. The leaders of the September 1985 coup attempt thus far have been treated according to prescribed statutes and due process. There have been no summary punishments.

The Thai legal system reaches decisions on the basis of evidence presented by the parties to a judge rather than a jury. Criminal cases are heard on the basis of specific charges by a panel of judges. During the martial law period (October 1976 - August 1984) military courts had jurisdiction over cases involving internal and external national security, Thai relations with other nations, and offenses against the royal family and public peace. Military courts are now used solely in cases involving military personnel. All other cases, including those having mixed military and civilian participants, come under the jurisdiction of civilian courts. The alleged plotters of the 1985 coup attempt will be tried in civilian courts.

Persons tried in both the military and civilian courts enjoy a broad range of legal rights, including the right to counsel both in the trial and appellate stages. Although a civilian court decision can be appealed to a higher court, no such appeal process exists in the case of a military court verdict. Both court systems, however, allow for a royal pardon. Moreover, prisoners sometimes benefit from periodic royal amnesties, which take the form of commutation or abrogation of sentences. The courts are relatively independent of external pressures. There have been allegations, however, of both government and private influence being brought to bear on the courts and prosecutors in certain cases, often those involving narcotics.

There is no evidence of persons having been imprisoned solely for political beliefs in 1985.

A pilot government program to provide free legal advice to the poor continues in operation. Most free legal aid, however, comes from private organizations including the Lawyers' Association and the Women's Lawyers' Association.

The court and investigatory apparatus in the Bangkok area have been overtaxed in recent years. As a consequence, the time required for criminal trials has at times exceeded 3 years in the court of first instance. Defendants acquitted after such lengthy proceedings receive no compensation.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Thai society is generally an open one where membership in political organizations is voluntary, the police function is not abused for security or political purposes, and the unmonitored exchange of ideas is generally permitted, although those espousing leftist or Communist views would probably be subject to surveillance by the security forces. Thai law requires that police possess a search warrant prior to entering a home without the owner's consent. Depending on the nature of the offense, these warrants are issued either by the public prosecutor, the courts, commissioned police officers, district and military officers, or governors. There have been allegations that officers endorse warrants in advance and then allow their subordinate non-commissioned officials to apply them as needed. Sections of the Anti-Communist Activities Act allow officials involved in specifically designated "Communist suppression operations" to conduct searches without warrants, but these powers have been used sparingly.

THAILAND

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution generally affirms the citizens' right to free speech and a free press, but there are laws which impose restrictions on these rights. The principal legal restrictions on these freedoms are statutory prohibitions against insulting or defaming the King, Queen, Heir Apparent or Regent (the offense of lese majeste), advocating a Communist system of government, or publishing materials which threaten national security. Publications deemed to violate Thailand's lese majeste laws are confiscated, while individuals thought to have violated these laws are subject to prosecution. No one was charged with lese majeste in Thailand during 1985. In addition, there are less formal prohibitions against criticism of religious institutions, ethnic groups, or the military.

Thai citizens enjoy substantial freedom of speech, and the Government permits criticism of its policies. International publications circulate freely in Thailand, as does a wide range of political and social commentary presented by the privately-owned Thai press. Technical publications and pamphlets, including those of academics, circulate freely, and present viewpoints ranging from the non-Communist left to the ultra-right. Foreign and domestic books are not censored, except in rare instances where publications are critical of the Royal Family or Thailand's monarchical institution.

Television and radio stations are licensed by the Government and operated by both government and private entities as commercial enterprises. Although in theory all television programs are subject to prior review by the Government's broadcast directing board, but this power is exercised rarely and in practice stations present a range of viewpoints. Radio stations are required to carry the government-produced newscast four times daily but are free to originate other news and commentary. Opinions critical of government positions have been broadcast but, in general, controversial issues are treated very cautiously if at all.

The press continues to operate under the restrictions imposed by the Press Law of 1941 and remnants of past martial law orders. These laws permit the Government to close newspapers and revoke the licenses of editors of newspapers which publish stories deemed to be libelous or contrary to national security interests. In 1985 a new press law remained under discussion in the Parliament. If finally approved, certain restrictions it allows would have uncertain repercussions for press freedom.

The Government's relations with the domestic media remain generally good. The Government infrequently uses its statutory power over the press, although awareness of this power contributes to self-censorship, which is a restraint on local press activities. In 1985, one national publication was closed but was allowed to publish under a different masthead for a few months and then reappear in its original form. As in similar cases which occurred in 1983 and 1984, the authorities judged a number of its articles to be inaccurate and detrimental to the public order, and hence contrary to national security interests. The journalistic community advocates full press freedom but has not regarded these closures as a threat to existing levels of press freedom.

THAILAND

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Organized labor, politicians, and various special interest groups hold meetings, seminars, and rallies without interference from the Government. In several provinces the last vestiges of martial law which could have been used to restrict assembly have been repealed. Private associations are supposed to register with the Ministry of Interior. In practice, however, withholding of registration has not been used to inhibit freedom of association.

Although organized labor was suppressed during the period 1977-79, the right of labor to organize has been unrestricted since then. A minimum of only ten persons can form a labor union. Labor unions exist in both the private and state enterprise sectors. Only about 10 percent of the labor force in non-agrarian occupations is unionized, but this low percentage stems from the newness and fragmentation of the labor movement in Thailand, and from the economic slowdown of the past few years. Labor unions in Thailand maintain unrestricted relations with recognized international labor bodies and with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) Trade Union Congress. The same is true for relations with other national labor bodies, notably those from the United States, West Germany, Japan, and Israel.

The right to strike is recognized and unrestricted in private sector enterprises. State enterprise workers, however, do not have the right to strike. Many of them have struck on occasion anyway, often without penalty to the strikers. On the other hand, the Government has attempted to discourage labor demonstrations which have political connotations. A system of labor courts, to which unions elect one-third of the judges, serves as a frequently-used medium for dispute settlement.

Trade unions in the private sector have the right to bargain about working conditions and wages. In the state enterprise public sector, however, collective bargaining is restricted to bargaining about working conditions. In this sector, the right of the unions to bargain about wages was curtailed a few years ago by a Cabinet decision withdrawing the authority of state enterprise managers to agree to wage increases. This decision was made because of a perception that state enterprise wage levels were becoming higher than those of the civil service and higher than in many private sector enterprises.

Freedom of religion is practiced throughout Thailand and is protected by law and custom of long standing. Theravada Buddhism, the de facto state religion, has had an abiding and profound influence on Thai culture and history, and the majority of Thai practice it. The King is required by the Constitution to profess the Buddhist faith and practice Buddhism. Nonetheless, Thailand is a secular society. State and church are clearly separate. There are no restrictions on religious ceremonies, the teaching of religion, or conversion from one religion to another. Missionaries, under government regulation, have been permitted to live and proselytize in Thailand for more than a century. Foreign clergy may preach freely. There is no legal or organized discrimination against or persecution of those affiliated with minority religions, such as Christianity or Islam. Religious publishing, regardless of faith, is freely allowed. Like private associations, religious institutions are registered by the Government. There is no decisive advantage to being Buddhist in Thailand, though most senior Thai officials and political leaders are at least nominally Buddhist. Muslims living in the four southern provinces, which have majority Muslim populations, have the right to have civil law cases decided by Muslim judges under Koranic law. Efforts are being made to preserve Muslim cultural and religious traditions, including the building of mosques with government funds.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Apart from long-standing restrictions on the travel of Chinese and Vietnamese aliens living in Thailand, including those who have lived in Thailand for a generation, the only limitations on travel are restrictions on entry into certain rural areas believed by the Government to be used as bases by Communist insurgents. The right of citizens to change their residence or workplace is unabridged. There are no government restrictions on foreign travel or emigration, except for government officials, but Thai women and children under age 14 must have their passport applications approved by the Department of Public Welfare. In addition, a recent 1985 statute requires that in connection with passport applications all women under age 36 sit through a series of interviews regarding their employment records and finances. This has been protested by some women's rights advocates according to the press. These provisions of law, designed to prevent the export of children for sale and women for purposes of prostitution, have proved difficult to enforce. The Government has rarely revoked citizenship.

Since 1975, almost 650,000 persons from Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia have fled to Thailand. Thai policy has generally been to allow U.N. assistance to them until such time as they can be repatriated or resettled in third countries. The Thai afford first asylum to bona fide Lao refugees arriving by land and to Vietnamese boat refugees and promote voluntary repatriation along with third country resettlement, particularly of the Khmer and Lao, who comprise 95 percent of Thailand's refugee population. In 1985 the refugee population on Thai territory was about 130,000. In addition, about 50,000 Vietnamese who arrived before 1954 remain in Thailand with limited rights, along with about 10,000 Chinese who were Kuomintang supporters and about 17,000 Karen hill tribe refugees from Burma.

With few exceptions, the Government has not granted long-term asylum to new arrivals from Cambodia since early 1980, but it has provided temporary safe haven to about 245,000 Cambodians at evacuation sites on the Thai side of the border. Thailand has assisted international voluntary agencies to provide food and medical care to Khmer in camps along the border. The Thai Government permitted these displaced Khmer to move temporarily into Thailand in the wake of attacks by forces of Vietnam and the Heng Samrin regime in Cambodia in 1984 and early 1985. Since early 1980, small groups of Khmer caught trying to move illegally from border camps into refugee camps inside Thailand have generally been returned by Thai authorities to the border region, though several thousand have managed to remain in the camps. There have been reports that would-be Lao refugees have been turned back to Laos by Thai officials. The Government has instituted a system of screening of Lao with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) as observer and this has improved the fair treatment of these displaced persons. To date none of those screened out have been returned to Laos.

Vietnamese coming overland via Cambodia after April 1981 have had to remain at the border for lengthy periods until they were allowed to be considered for third country resettlement. About 4,000 overland Vietnamese refugees were on the border at the end of 1985.

The UNHCR and the major resettlement countries have supported the Thai policy of promoting voluntary repatriation. About 2,800 Lao have returned to their homeland under UNHCR supervision following successful bilateral Thai/Lao negotiations in September 1980. UNHCR negotiations with the Heng Samrin regime concerning the repatriation of Khmer refugees remain stalled. The Government of Vietnam has been unwilling to discuss repatriation of Vietnamese refugees in Thailand. Most Indochinese refugees are not willing to return to their home country.

Since 1979, nearly 67,500 Vietnamese refugees have arrived in Thailand after perilous journeys, often in small, unseaworthy boats, across international waters. Although less than in the peak years of 1979-81, the number of arrivals in 1985 showed no significant decrease from the previous two years.

As its contribution to alleviate the problem of criminal attacks by some fishermen against Vietnamese boat people, the Thai Government, with financial and technical assistance from the UNHCR and twelve donor nations, conducts sea, air, and land patrols, and law-enforcement activities designed to detect, deter, and punish crimes against these refugees. Up to now, such efforts have met with limited success. The Thai authorities apply the same asylum, relief, and resettlement policies to boat refugees as to all others.

Since the absolute monarchy ended in 1932, the Thai government traditionally has been a stable civilian administrative organization heavily influenced by the military, and often with a military officer as Prime Minister. Holding key military positions in important units in the immediate Bangkok area has been the most common avenue to the highest national leadership. Governments have often been extra-constitutionally changed by generally bloodless military coups d'etat. The government changes of 1973 and 1976, which occasioned violence in Bangkok, were exceptions.

Since 1978, as Thailand has become a more developed, complex society there has been an evolution toward more democratic changes, including free elections. A coup attempt by a small military group in 1985 which failed due to lack of public or general military support was a reminder, however, that constitutional processes are still shallowly rooted. Government decisions of which the military strongly disapprove are generally not taken. However, civilians hold all Cabinet posts in the Government, and Prime Minister Prem is supported by parties holding somewhat more than half the elected seats in the National Assembly. The 1983 national elections for the Lower House were open and free with four major and a dozen minor parties fielding candidates. As provided in the current (1978) Constitution, the largest non-government party became the formal opposition. Both it and the smaller opposition parties have regularly presented opposing views both within the National Assembly and through the mass media. The Thai National Assembly almost invariably has dissenting votes on legislation and on procedural decisions.

The overwhelming majority of adult Thai have the right to vote. Thai children of an alien father who wish to vote must, however, have lived in Thailand for ten years and completed the equivalent of a sixth grade education. The Government encourages voter turnout but does not use either direct or indirect pressure to compel voters to cast ballots. Actual voter turnout for both national and local elections generally exceeds fifty percent.

The Government has responded in the past to specific inquiries from Amnesty International and the International Commission of Jurists. The Government is generally willing to discuss human rights problems with both domestic and international human rights organizations. It permits human rights organizations of all kinds to visit Thailand, meet with appropriate government officials, and lobby for corrective action.

Local civil rights groups, active on a wide range of issues including prostitution and enforcement of labor laws, have generally devoted most of their efforts to identifying and correcting human rights violations. Thai human rights organizations have had significant success in recent years. They have, for example, successfully encouraged the Government to tighten the discipline of police and paramilitary forces fighting the Communist insurgency. More recently, these groups have brought pressure on the Government to alleviate widespread abuses in child labor practices.

In 1985 the Government did not harass individual human rights activists nor obstruct the investigations conducted by domestic groups interested in human rights.

Thailand has involved itself in international human rights efforts, in particular by taking a leading role in preparing Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) resolutions on Cambodia, including human rights violations, which are considered annually by the United Nations. Thai representatives were among the founding members of the Regional Council on Human Rights in Asia, a forum for the exchange of human rights information established in February 1982. Thai members of the Asian Council helped draft a declaration on human rights to serve as the organization's statement of policy and goals.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern that people were imprisoned for nonviolently expressing opinions deemed to be defamatory or insulting to members of the royal family. It also investigated the reasons for the detention without trial of more than 20 alleged members or supporters of the banned Communist Party. In addition, it expressed concern about what Amnesty International believes to be the use of the charge of lese majeste to imprison prisoners of conscience. Freedom House rates Thailand "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In 1985 the Thai population was 51.5 million, with a growth rate of 1.7 percent. Thailand has a free enterprise economic system with a large agricultural sector. In 1985 the industrial and service sectors were expanding more rapidly than the agricultural. Per capita gross domestic product, which had increased at an average rate of 4.3 percent from 1965 to 1984, is expected to show a decline to about 2.5 percent for 1985.

Overall, the health of the Thai population is excellent. While caloric intake, 103 percent of recommended requirements in 1982, is generally adequate for most Thai, even for those living in the poorest rural areas of the northeastern provinces, ignorance about proper diet has led to isolated incidents of malnutrition which the Thai are making efforts to eliminate. About 64 percent of the population has access to safe water. Life expectancy at birth was 63 years and the average infant mortality rate had dropped from 77 per 1000 in 1967 to 56.8 per 1000 in 1985. Average figures for infant mortality, however, obscure sharp differences between urban areas, where health care is very good, and rural areas, where health care standards are lower. For example, a recent study found infant mortality in rural areas to be half again as high as the average for the country as a whole.

The percentages of the population below the absolute poverty level also show the continued gap in quality of life between urban and rural sectors; 34 percent are below the level in rural areas compared with only 15 percent in urban centers.

Thailand has made steady progress in reducing illiteracy in recent years. The most current figures show a total adult literacy rate of 88 percent (92 percent male and 84 percent female).

Thailand's primary school (compulsory for grades 1-6) enrollment rate is 99.5 percent of primary school ages according to official figures (101.7 percent of males and 97.7 percent of females). Thailand has traditionally allocated a high percentage of central government expenditure (around 20 percent) to education.

Thai law prohibits the employment of children under age 12. Employment of children aged 12 to 15 is permitted for "light work." A recent study sponsored by the Government concludes that the laws governing child labor are inadequate by International Labor Organization (ILO) standards, poorly enforced, and that both children and adults work in substandard conditions. A major part of the problem is that the Thai labor protection law is vague, difficult to enforce, lacks severe punishment for offenders, and does not differentiate between adult and child workers. Although each year the press carries reports of employers tried and punished for violating the law, child labor abuse remains a chronic problem.

The labor movement is represented on a tripartite committee which makes an annual recommendation on minimum wage levels. In Bangkok and surrounding provinces, where most industry is located, the minimum wage is 70 baht ($2.66) per day. This standard has been difficult to enforce, however, and many workers receive less than the minimum, especially in construction and the domestic non-export oriented sectors of the economy. Work conditions vary widely in Thailand. Medium and large factories, which produce most of Thailand's exported goods, work standard 8-hour shifts and have working conditions which are reasonable by international standards. Where there are deficiencies, including child labor abuse and inadequate provision for health and safety, they are confined to the more difficult-to-enforce sectors of small manufacturing enterprises which produce lower quality goods for the local market.

The status and role of women has improved steadily over the past several years. For the most part, women have equal legal rights in Thailand, with specific guarantees of property and divorce rights; and there are no allegations that these rights are denied. Women are not, however, permitted to participate fully in Buddhist religious institutions or to become monks. They are well represented in the labor force and becoming increasingly so in professional positions, particularly those in the commercial sector. In general, women are not legally barred from positions traditionally held by men, except for limitations on serving in the armed forces. In rural areas, sex stereotypes exist with respect to occupational and social roles. These barriers are being modified as mass communications bring modern role models to even the most remote communities. Women vote in numbers equal to men and participate fully in the political process. There are several female members of the national legislature. However, women are underrepresented in national politics and in high government positions.

Hill tribes and other ethnic minorities are not legally excluded from any of the benefits of society, but their isolation and poor land has kept their living standards lower. Language and cultural barriers work against the ethnic Malay Muslim minority in south Thailand, but there is no official policy of discrimination. To promote higher education for the Muslim minority, the Government has reserved a certain number of university seats exclusively for Muslim students and has committed extensive personnel and financial resources to improving education of Muslim youth to make them more competitive in the economic sector. Attention has also been given to the improvement of administration and development in the South. To help coordinate efforts to assist Thailand's Muslim community, the Government established in 1983 a national foundation for Muslim affairs staffed with representatives from various government agencies.

VANUATU

Vanuatu is a Southwest Pacific island nation which became independent in 1980 following more than 70 years of joint British-French rule. It has a parliamentary system of government. Independence was accompanied by temporary political turbulence, including an attempt at secession, which left a legacy of suspicion of outside interference. However, most of the internal strains from the 1980 secessionist rebellion have subsided.

Political legitimacy in Vanuatu is based on majority rule, supported by both Melanesian and Western tradition. The first general election since independence, held in November 1983, was vigorously contested and democratically conducted. The courts are independent and solicitous of individual rights. The police and military are under civilian control.

The Vanuatu economy resembles that of other Pacific island states in its dependence on international trade and its vulnerability to shifts in world market prices. Tourism earns more foreign exchange than all exports combined. Vanuatu has gained some revenue as a tax haven. Until recently, attempts to attract foreign investment have been hampered by uncertainty over land rights. A land law was enacted in 1983 in an effort to resolve this problem.

The favorable human rights situation in Vanuatu remained unchanged in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Due process is strictly observed. Neither the Government nor any organized group resorts to political violence.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of politically motivated disappearances.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Constitutional guarantees against torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment are complied with in practice and enforced by the courts. Prisoners also have recourse to an Ombudsman.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no politically motivated arrests in Vanuatu. Arrest is by warrant. There is no exile. Suspects have free access to a lawyer of their choice. The constitutional guarantee that suspects will be informed of charges and given a speedy hearing before a judge is observed. The use of forced or compulsory labor is not permitted and there have been no reports of either practice.

VANUATU

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The courts uphold constitutional provisions for a fair public trial, presumption of innocence until proof of guilt, prohibition against double jeopardy, the right of habeas corpus, and appeal to the Supreme Court.

The courts are independent of military or executive interference. There were no reports in 1985 of arbitrary or unfair exercise of judicial authority.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Sanctity of the home and family and privacy of correspondence are observed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of expression is guaranteed by the Constitution. The Government, however, publishes and controls the country's only national newspaper and manages the national radio station. There is no independent television or commercial radio.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no restrictions on the formation of political parties or trade unions in Vanuatu. There are two main political parties and a relatively new smaller party. To an extent unusual among Pacific Island states, the ruling Vanua'atu party is the primary policy-making body, whose decisions are then implemented by the Government.

Vanuatu has a small but active trade union movement with the right to organize, strike, and bargain collectively. As of 1984, there were 21 registered trade unions and 6 employer associations. In February 1984, a labor council, called the Vanuatu Trade Union Congress, was formed and became a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Freedom of religion is protected by law and respected in practice. Missionaries of various Christian denominations work without restriction.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

All Vanuatu citizens are free to travel domestically and abroad. There are no bars to returning home from abroad.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Vanuatu is a multiparty democracy. Numerous candidates competed in the parliamentary elections in 1983; both the campaign and voting were considered by outside observers to have been fair. Elections to provincial and local councils have also been contested and fair.

VANUATU

The Government has publicly expressed willingness to permit investigation by qualified and objective outside observers. There were no charges of human rights violations in 1985. The 1985 Amnesty International Report does not have an entry for Vanuatu. Freedom House rates it "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population was estimated to be 132,000 in 1985 and the growth rate 3.2 percent. Per capita gross national product (GNP) was $801 in 1982. Buoyed by tourism, which has expanded steadily since independence, the economy weathered the recent international recession with few problems. Communal land ownership by clans was thought to be a hindrance to economic development but a system of land leasing has been implemented in an attempt to ameliorate that problem.

Government services are provided without discrimination. According to 1985 statistics, infant mortality was 78.2 per 1,000 live births and life expectancy at birth was 55.61 years. For the period 1980-1982, the calorie supply was estimated by the World Bank as being 98 percent of requirements. The Bank estimated that in 1980 around 55 percent of the population had access to safe water (65 percent in urban areas). According to government statistics for 1979, 37.3 percent of the population was literate. The primary school enrollment ratio for 1981 was 108 percent.

In 1985 a minimum wage law was adopted. There is also legislation regulating conditions of work, including hours, and with provisions concerning child labor. No information is available on occupational safety and health legislation.

Women have equal rights under the law, but traditional culture has hampered them from moving into leadership roles. The only female candidate for Parliament in the 1983 election was defeated by a small margin. However, several women hold senior positions in the Government.

VIETNAM

The Socialist Republic of Vietnam is a dictatorship controlled by the Vietnamese Communist Party. The Communist Party took power in the north after a long war against France and non-Communist Vietnamese nationalists, culminating in the 1954 partition of the country. The current elderly leadership is essentially the group which fought the war of independence and subsequently through force of arms took over the southern Republic of Vietnam in 1975, thereby placing the entire country under its political control.

Hanoi has formally denied the normal rights of Vietnamese citizens as well as working papers and ration coupons to many of its citizens deemed politically unacceptable; many former "reeducation camp" inmates and others without official jobs are forced to live precariously in an underground economy. Many in the South depend for their survival on aid from relatives abroad. The Government has continued the trend of closely watching, and in some cases repressing, religious groups. The regime has not accepted the American offer to accept political prisoners in "reeducation camps" for resettlement in the United States. Its security organs continued to crush any hint of opposition to the regime.

Vietnam's continuing occupation of Cambodia contributes to major human rights abuses there and diverts resources from reconstruction in Vietnam. Violations of human rights in Cambodia by Vietnam's client, the puppet government of the so-called People's Republic of Kampuchea (PRK), have included executions, forced labor, denial of legal process, forced relocations, and arbitrary arrest. At the same time, Vietnam's dispute with China, resulting partly from its Cambodian adventure, forces it to maintain a large army on its northern border. Vietnam also maintains significant forces in Laos in order to keep the Lao Government, which it dominates, in power. These policies have left Vietnam with an army of over 1 million men.

Vietnam is a poor, underdeveloped, agricultural country faced with the problem of feeding a large population (60 million), with many of its most talented people having fled overseas. At the same time, it is attempting to impose a Soviet-style Marxist-Leninist political and economic system on a populace in the south with a different value system and questionable loyalty to the current regime. Most citizens live barely above subsistence level, although Vietnam has claimed that it is now able to meet minimum food requirements. Food is rationed or highly priced on the free market.

Thousands of residents of southern Vietnam seek escape from the severe repression imposed upon them by the authorities in Hanoi and from the bleak prospects caused by the Government's effort to impose a Communist economy on a once vigorous free market. The more fortunate are able to leave under the Orderly Departure Program of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHRC). Other thousands, however, have set off in small boats for neighboring countries. Many in this latter group have lost their lives to the hazards of the sea, Vietnamese gunboats, or pirates.

There was no improvement in the dismal human rights situation in Vietnam during 1985, and no amelioration of economic, social, or political conditions.

VIETNAM

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The Government acknowledges that a number of persons whom it considered "war criminals" were executed in the wake of the 1975 takeover. Former inmates of reeducation camps have reported summary executions for escape attempts and resistance to camp authorities. One study of such reports has concluded that since the fall of Saigon such executions number in the tens of thousands. Attacks by minority and ethnic Vietnamese resistance groups against Government authority usually target People's Army of Vietnam units, but they sometimes attack public security or administrative officials. Although accurate figures are not available, the number of deaths caused by these activities appears to be small.

b. Disappearance

Though disappearances, apparently officially authorized, of Vietnamese citizens occurred in the period immediately following the Communist takeover of the South, no reports of such disappearances have been received in recent years.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Reports from refugees are consistent concerning the severity of the conditions for prisoners in reeducation camps. In these camps, provision of food rations below subsistence levels, denial of medical care, and assignment of hard labor to prisoners have been regularly practiced. Prisoners are punished severely for minor infractions of camp rules. For example, a minor infraction could be punished by several months solitary confinement. These practices can result in acute suffering, permanent physical impairment, and death. Inmates have indeterminate sentences and face the prospect of indefinite penal labor. In addition to common criminals, these camps contain former officials and military officers of the Republic of Vietnam, many of them aged, and people arrested for political reasons since the Communist takeover. Included are chaplains and clergy from both Buddhist and Christian groups, intellectuals, and former political leaders. Persons imprisoned for attempting to flee from Vietnam have reported that beatings of inmates during interrogation have resulted in death. A former inmate in a prison for people who have attempted to leave Vietnam illegally has stated that prisoners who refused to obey guards' orders had been executed.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Suspects may be apprehended on a warrant, which stipulates the nature of the crime and which permits detention for 2 months prior to trial. An extension for a further 2-month detention can be obtained upon application to higher authorities. There is no provision for bail, nor access to a defense lawyer prior to trial. When they deem it necessary, public security officials may apprehend and search suspects without a warrant. Such people may be held for an indefinite period, and there is no right to habeas corpus. Refugees report that the authorities sometimes wait several months before notifying relatives of arrests.

VIETNAM

Those suspected of political crimes may be sent to reeducation camps without trial or charge. The Government continues to hold thousands of people without trial in such camps, including both those whom the Government distrusts because of their association with the former Republic of Vietnam, and those whose current political views are suspect. These camps remove dissident elements from society, particularly competent and/or charismatic leaders. The camps attempt to produce conformity through confinement, fear, hard labor, self-criticism, and a minimum amount of indoctrination. While several thousand prisoners have been released, including officers up to the rank of colonel (and a handful of generals, most in the medical services), some have been rearrested. The Government claims that the number of people still detained in its reeducation camps since 1975 is on the order of 7,000. Critics of the regime maintain that the real number is considerably higher.

Forced labor has been used by Vietnamese and local authorities in Cambodia for projects to build barriers along the Thai-Cambodian border and to improve the logistical infrastructure for Vietnamese occupation troops.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

For those Vietnamese who are given a trial, for the most part those charged with nonpolitical crimes or specific prohibited political acts, the judicial process cannot be considered fair to the accused. In general, the entire legal system operates as an agency for the enforcement of regime directives; it has no independence from political intervention.

In addition to those detained without trial in reeducation camps, there are also a number of people who have been charged, tried, and executed for conspiring to overthrow the Government or for other political crimes. In December 1984, 21 persons were put on trial for espionage in Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon). The appointed defense attorney was quoted during the proceedings as saying, "they violated the law and nobody can defend them because they are traitors." Five of the accused were found guilty and sentenced to death. Three of them were executed on January 8, 1985. The other two had their sentences commuted to life imprisonment. One hundred more suspects are reported to be under arrest. There is no reliable estimate of the number of such political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is a pervasive system of population surveillance by party-appointed local wardens, who use informants to keep track of each person's political and economic activities. The system works imperfectly in the South, however, partly because of a shortage of trusted party workers. There have been reports of officials and even unofficial security wardens conducting without warrants midnight searches of homes for draft-age males in order to fill draft quotas. There continue to be reliable reports that the Interior Ministry inspects and sometimes confiscates international mail and packages sent to Vietnam, particularly to politically suspect people or those of Chinese origin. Outgoing mail is also subject to inspection and censorship.

The regime has widely publicized its program to relocate millions of people to "new economic zones" in virgin or unproductive rural areas in order to expand agricultural production. Hundreds of thousands were resettled in these remote zones in the south in the years immediately following the fall of South Vietnam. The resettlement process has involved forms of coercion in most cases. It targeted for resettlement those whose views and background made them politically suspect and often unable to find employment. Conditions in these zones are widely reported to range from poor to life-threatening with inadequate provision of basic services. Many of those so relocated have left the zones, returning to the cities where they are forced to live on an already marginal economy, without the ration or neighborhood registration cards essential to procuring employment, food, and other essential services. Without these documents they can be arrested arbitrarily and returned to the new economic zone.

The Government continues its relocation program, despite its cost in human suffering. The 1981-85 plan calls for the relocation of 1 million people. A Ministry of Labor official claimed in August, 1985, that the 1985 goal of relocating 200,000 workers would be met. The official rationale for this massive dislocation of people is increased economic production, particularly of cash crops such as coffee and rubber. Although the Government speaks of "volunteers" when discussing people resettled in these zones, it is clear that arbitrary resettlement interferes with a person's right to live in a place of his own choosing.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and of the press does not exist in Vietnam. The Ministry of Culture and Information and organs of the party control the distribution of all newspapers, books, and other publications, as well as all cultural exhibitions. The Government controls and censors all public sources of information and promotes "revolutionary culture" in the arts. Many prominent artists and writers have been arrested. Refugees have reported that the Government has implemented electronic jamming against the short-wave radio operated by a Vietnamese resistance group which broadcasts into Vietnam.

Independent criticism of the party and Government is not permitted. Self-censorship by journalists operates without question, given the pervasive control of the party.

The block surveillance system uses informants to monitor the activities of citizens. Public criticism of officials is not permitted and does not occur, except in official news media when criticizing the performance of some officials or groups of officials who do not meet current party objectives.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public or private meetings to criticize or protest government actions or policies are prohibited. Nongovernmental organizations, such as church groups, can meet for narrowly defined objectives, such as church services, but not for other purposes.

In lieu of independent labor unions, government-controlled unions have been set up under the Vietnam Federation of Trade Unions, an organization completely controlled by the Communist party. Claiming 3 million members, the Federation's stated goal is to increase party control and production, rather than to improve workers' welfare or to protect their rights. There is no right to bargain collectively or to strike.

Other "mass organizations," such as the Women's Federations, exist in the various sectors of the population. They perform the same functions of control, propaganda, and policy dissemination within their respective sectors as does the Trade Union Federation among workers. They are grouped into the Vietnam Fatherland Front.

The Government tolerates the existence of religious groups and allows religious services but has consistently attempted to divide and control the Catholic, Buddhist, and Cao Dai religions, the Islamic community, and other religious groups. The Government perceives them as potential seedbeds of subversion and political opposition. It has attempted to prevent their growth and to inhibit proselytizing activities by, among other things, prohibiting publication of religious materials and severely limiting the training and mobility of clergy. The Government has attempted to coopt religious groups by promoting parallel organizations and leaders who are subservient to it.

Refugees have reported constant harassment of the Catholic Church by government authorities. Sermons require government approval. Uncooperative priests are subject to confinement in remote villages or incarceration in "reeducation camps." Many priests have been arrested, or are under house arrest. There are reportedly more than 100 priests detained in "reeducation camps," and most former South Vietnamese military chaplains of all religions have remained in prison since 1975. Catholic priests and nuns are subject to police surveillance, and most of them are required by the authorities to work full time in secular occupations, thus limiting their participation in religious activities. The teaching role of the Church has been severely restricted, and many churches and all but one Catholic seminary in the south have been closed; reportedly, no priest has been ordained since 1980. The Government has restricted communication between rural parishes and their bishops. It also prohibits the printing of Bibles or their importation. Authorities routinely cut lists of parishioners applying to attend services by at least half, and an individual can attend only the church at which he is registered. Catholics are required to register as such with the authorities and are discriminated against in employment although Buddhists are not. "Voluntary" work and other required activities are scheduled by the authorities during times of regular church services. As a result of this harassment, the size of Catholic congregations has shrunk steadily since 1975. In central Vietnam, thousands of Catholics have been forcibly relocated and made to work on government construction projects.

Protestant churches have been similarly restricted. Church buildings have been taken over by the authorities under various pretexts. Churches in the highlands (where most Protestants are located) have all been closed, as was the sole Protestant college and theological seminary. There have been continued reports of harassment among those evangelical churches which have been allowed--albeit within narrow limits--to continue to hold services in urban areas.

VIETNAM

Most of the 30,000 Vietnamese Muslims are members of the Cham minority, which the regime distrusts and harasses. Links between the Cham, Khmer Krom (ethnic Khmer living in Vietnam) and hill tribes (Montagnards) have created the only sizable resistance movement in Vietnam: the United Liberation Front of Oppressed Races, or FULRO. In its repression of the Cham the Government has eliminated the position of Mufti, or Islamic religious leader, within the Muslim communities; disbanded the organized Islamic association; and forced them to sever their links with overseas Islamic organizations. The regime forbids pilgrimage to Mecca and has not given permission for the Islamic community to participate in the Koran reading contest held annually in Malaysia. Many Islamic schools have been closed but most mosques remain open. Importation of Korans is forbidden and the Koran printing house has been closed.

About half of Vietnam's 60 million people are Buddhists, the great majority of them Mahayana. The authorities have tried repeatedly since 1975 to suppress and intimidate the Mahayana Buddhist leadership. They have closed temples and transformed them into public buildings. They have arrested monks intermittently since 1975, and hundreds remain in reeducation camps. Many monks remain under house arrest, and the travel of those not under detention is severely restricted. Some reports allege that local authorities seek to control the community of Buddhist monks by forbidding the donation of food. The majority of pre-1975 monks in the south have been forced to leave the monkhood, and few young men are allowed to join the community. Teaching of seminarians must often be conducted in secret, and pagoda schools have been closed. Monks of the formerly politically active An Quang, Xa Loi, and Vinh Nghiem pagodas are kept under close government surveillance and are rarely allowed visitors. The regime established the Unified Vietnam Buddhist Church as "the only Buddhist organization representing Vietnamese Buddhism in all other relations in the country and with other countries," but this organization reportedly has no appeal to most Buddhists.

Most of Vietnam's Theravada Buddhists are Khmer Krom. This group, which numbers about 800,000 people living in southern and southwestern Vietnam, has provided the Vietnamese army of occupation in Cambodia with interpreters and staff for its military government. Nevertheless, the Khmer Krom remain distrusted by the Vietnamese, partly for historical reasons. A number of former Theravada leaders have been imprisoned.

Other religious groups have also been persecuted by the regime. The Hoa Hao (a Buddhist sect) strongly resisted the Communist takeover. As a result, the Government violently repressed the sect and arrested virtually all of its leaders. The regime maintains tight control over Hoa Hao areas. Similarly, the regime has arrested many of the leaders of the Cao Dai (a uniquely Vietnamese religion comprising elements of Buddhism, Islam and Christianity). Refugees have reported police occupation of the Cao Dai Holy See in Tay Ninh City.

Since the regime views religion as a possible source of political opposition, adherence to a religious group is incompatible with membership in the Communist Party. Party membership is a prerequisite for advancement in society.

VIETNAM

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation.

Government approval is required for all external travel, and an identity card is required for internal travel. No one is allowed to change his residence or work location without permission from the authorities. Since public security cadre periodically check household occupants against the official family register, unauthorized absences also subject families to surveillance and harassment. With few exceptions, only government officials or approved spokesmen for quasi-governmental organizations receive permission to travel abroad.

Many factors, in addition to the generally repressive political situation, have caused a mass exodus from Vietnam since 1975. Among them are ethnic and religious persecution, discrimination with regard to economic and educational opportunities, fear of imprisonment or of forced resettlement in remote areas, and fear of conscription to fight in Cambodia.

Vietnam's program to "facilitate" the departure of ethnic Chinese and others as refugees, which led in the spring of 1979 to an exodus of over 40,000 a month by boat, was apparently suspended in July 1979. Information from refugees who have left Vietnam since then indicates that the authorities are no longer officially assisting such departures. In May 1979 the UNHCR reached agreement with the Government on the legal departure of people from Vietnam under the Orderly Departure Program. This program started slowly but in fiscal year 1984, 28,340 people left Vietnam under the program, and in fiscal year 1985 the number was 28,478. A significant number of these are ethnic Chinese who consistently find it easier than ethnic Vietnamese to obtain official approval for departure. Another significant portion is composed of children fathered by Americans in Vietnam, known as "Amerasians." The Government wants them to leave, and they are often subject to discrimination in Vietnam.

Refugees continued to leave Vietnam clandestinely, although at a reduced rate compared to past years. They leave because of a combination of political, economic, and personal factors. Hanoi radio has broadcast reports of executions or of lengthy jail sentences for organizers of failed escape attempts, as well as of punishments dealt to others implicated. Currently, men can expect sentences ranging from 3 to 15 years at hard labor--depending on their role in the departure attempt--while women receive 1 to 3 months, with childless women often receiving longer sentences. Those released from reeducation camps who attempt flight can expect to be returned to the camps for an indefinite term. Property, often including the means of livelihood, is confiscated from those caught trying to escape. During the past few years there have been credible reports of Vietnamese patrol boats firing upon and sinking helpless refugee boats attempting to flee clandestinely. Hundreds of refugees reportedly have been killed and others captured and imprisoned as a result of these attacks.

In order to be placed on Orderly Departure Program lists, people must often bribe officials. Refugees from the Mekong Delta have reported that some people have paid officials from 4,800 to 6,000 dollars in gold per person to be placed on tentative lists with no guarantee as to when or if they would be permitted to leave. People who have applied for exit permits reportedly are subject to recurring security checks and harassment.

VIETNAM

Few have returned to Vietnam after having fled the country. Those who left in the immediate aftermath of the fall of South Vietnam in 1975 and later returned were incarcerated in reeducation camps. In only a few isolated cases has Hanoi allowed anyone to repatriate in recent years; in effect, those who emigrate lose their citizenship. However, some people who have acquired nationalities and travel documents of other countries have been permitted to return to Vietnam as visitors.

Since the occupation of Cambodia by Vietnam, large numbers of Vietnamese, possibly as many as several hundred thousand, have settled in Cambodia. Although many of these people are former residents expelled by Cambodia's former rulers, a significant number are reportedly first-time settlers.

All authority and political power in Vietnam is vested in the Communist party, and political opposition to or advocacy of change in this system is not tolerated. The Politburo of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Vietnam is the supreme decisionmaking body in the nation, and the party's Secretariat oversees day-to-day implementation of Politburo directives. The party leadership selects candidates for the Central Committee, and the periodic national party Congresses merely ratify the selection without any choice among the candidates. The Congress is made up of delegates from the party apparatus of each province, who are similarly selected by higher levels.

Ostensibly the chief legislative body, the National Assembly in fact approves without dissent the policies set by the Politburo. National Assembly elections are held in Vietnam every 5 years, most recently in 1981. The elections that should have taken place in 1986 have been put off until 1987, however. Local elections will be held at the same time. People must participate in order to have their ration cards validated. Voters do not have a real choice. They may only strike out the names of candidates for whom they do not wish to vote from the single list which is presented to them.

Although southerners are present in the Politburo and Central Committee and in some ministerial and National Assembly positions, the leadership's general distrust of southerners, including some long-time party members, is a significant factor in the assignment of political responsibilities. For the most part, Southerners who played major public roles in the National Liberation Front prior to 1975 have since been shunted aside by the party leadership.

Section 4 Governmental Attitudes Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Vietnam is not a member of any international human rights organizations, nor does it play an active role in attempting to ameliorate the human rights situations in other countries. The Government does not permit the existence of private groups concerned with human rights.

Foreign delegations and journalists who have been allowed to visit reeducation camps have been shown model camps. Former prisoners have described extensive preparations to beautify camps prior to visits, temporary removal of most prisoners during the visit, and careful briefing of the remaining prisoners by Communist party cadre on what to tell delegation members.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed its continued concern about the long-term detention without trial of several thousand people allegedly associated with the Government of the former Republic of Vietnam. It was also concerned about other political prisoners arrested since 1975, many of whom were held without charge or trial. These included leading religious and intellectual figures arrested in 1984. Freedom House rated Vietnam as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Vietnam's population of 60,492,000 was growing at an annual rate of 2.5 percent in 1985.

Ten years after the reunification of the country, Vietnam's economy continues to stagnate. Per capita national income had decreased 2 to 3 percent annually following a precipitous 20 percent drop in 1975. The decline is ascribed to population growth, defense needs, capital construction expenses, and inadequacies in economic management.

Economic stagnation also appears to be due to diversion of resources, particularly trained managers, to the maintenance of a large army, both in Cambodia and on the Chinese frontier. Another factor is Vietnam's inability to service its external debt, thereby severely limiting foreign investment and multilateral developmental assistance. Most countries capable of providing bilateral assistance, investment, or trade opportunities are unwilling to do so in the face of Vietnam's occupation of Cambodia. The flight of technically skilled people abroad and underuse of Western-trained technicians has also handicapped development.

Although industrial production began to increase significantly in 1981 after several years of decline or almost zero growth, the industrial sector remains extremely weak. Increased emphasis on light industry has led to some increase in consumer goods, but per capita consumption is stagnant or even falling.

Production incentives have ameliorated agricultural shortfalls to a degree. According to the Government, grain production reached nearly 17 million metric tons in 1983, and the Government claimed that it had reached grain self-sufficiency. Increase in grain production appears to be barely keeping pace, however, with the rate of population increase. Grain production in 1984 has been estimated at 17.8 million metric tons, though some observers believe it was significantly lower. The Government has reported that grain production in 1985 was 18.2 million tons, well below the planned level of 19 million. The plan figure for 1986 is 20 million tons.

Collectivization of the fishing industry and nationalization of most ocean-going vessels have lowered fishermen's income severely. The fishing industry has been further curtailed by strict government limits on the amount of fuel and water permitted aboard. These measures have been adopted to prevent refugee escapes. Depletion of the fishing fleet through loss of boats to transport refugees has also hurt the industry. As a result, produce from sea fishing declined annually from 1976 until 1984 when the decline ended.

VIETNAM

Inflation in the price of necessities, reported by refugees to be at least 50 percent in 1984, has also led to increased corruption and crime. Corruption continues to be a fact of life for all Vietnamese. The average citizen must bribe officials to obtain public services and official documents. For many families the black market sale of goods received in packages from relatives abroad has become an essential component of their income. However, government measures to restrict the amount of goods and money which families can receive from abroad as well as other official moves against free market activities have curtailed free trading.

The level of health care has declined since 1975. The severe shortages of medical facilities and medicines have been aggravated by the need to divert material and people to the care of soldiers wounded in Cambodia. Only the most minimal facilities are available for the average worker. Ordinary peasants and workers must purchase medical prescriptions on the open market, unlike party cadre who have access to free or government-subsidized prescriptions. Those who are not employed by the State are not eligible for care at government medical facilities. Medicine is in extremely short supply and thus expensive on the free market. Government officials have acknowledged that a major source of medicine for the country is gift packages sent to their relatives by ethnic Vietnamese abroad. The general health condition of people leaving through the Orderly Departure Program has deteriorated noticeably and steadily over the past 3 years, according to the doctors who examine them. In 1985 life expectancy was 65.1 years, and the infant mortality rate was 59 per 1,000 live births.

The adult literacy rate in 1979 was 84 percent. The authorities claim that primary education is universal. Education above the elementary level, particularly at higher levels, is often restricted to those with approved backgrounds. The party committee in each school reportedly makes the final determination of who will graduate. Similarly, study abroad is restricted to politically acceptable people.

Wages and hours of work are regulated by the Government, and wages are at near subsistence levels for most workers. Wage increases for civil servants have not kept pace with inflation, forcing many city dwellers, especially government cadre and workers, to hold two jobs. It is not known whether child labor or occupational safety and health laws exist in Vietnam.

At least 55,000 Vietnamese workers have been sent under contract to work in various occupations in the Soviet Union and other East European countries. A significant portion of their wages is deducted to help pay for Vietnam's debt to these countries. It appears that even with these deductions, however, workers are eager to participate in this program so as to escape the extreme poverty and unemployment of present-day Vietnam.

Despite the promises of the Communist Party to emancipate women and the important administrative and productive roles filled by women in the war to take over the South, women in Vietnam today do not have positions in the leadership of the country which their numbers would warrant. There are no women in the Politburo and only four women in the 116-member Central Committee. There is only one woman member, the Education Minister, in the Council of Ministers. Vietnamese women have retreated from management positions they held during the war.

VIETNAM

This trend is partly due to the proclivities of those involved, but it is also a result of the attitudes of Vietnamese men. Moreover, women in Vietnam are limited to traditional occupational fields. At the primary level, women attend school at almost the same rate as men (89 percent versus 94 percent). Reliable figures are unavailable for higher education attendance ratios, but the disparity between rates of attendance for men and women is believed to be much greater.

Gradual assimilation and appear to be the Government's long-run strategy for most minorities. The Government has created special schools in the Hanoi area to train minority cadres destined to be the "eyes and ears" of the party among their own people. Highland minorities in central Vietnam are subject to repression if suspected of ties with resistance groups. Officially sponsored settlement of ethnic Vietnamese into the highlands is designed to enhance lowlander control and to restrict minorities, some of whom are being forced away from their traditional farming practices and into settled agriculture. Southern minorities such as the Chinese, Indian, and Khmer have been encouraged to leave the country. One effect of Vietnam's history has been on the Vietnamese attitude toward the ethnic Chinese minority, whom the Government perceives as a potential fifth column, to be expelled if possible, and if not, to be watched and closely controlled. Ethnic Chinese are severely discriminated against through denial of officially sanctioned employment and educational opportunities.

Former military officers of the Republic of Vietnam are systematically denied employment. The children of former military and civilian officials are denied university education by a review of family background to culls "undesirable elements." Men released from "reeducation camps" are formally denied their civil rights for an indefinite period and are subject to severe restrictions in employment and travel.

WESTERN SAMOA

Western Samoa lies in the South Pacific Ocean approximately 1,600 miles northeast of New Zealand and looks to that country as a model for its democratic practices and educational system. The culture of Western Samoa is essentially Polynesian but uniquely Samoan. Traditional authority is vested in the matai. Each extended family, or aiga, has at least one matai, who is appointed by consensus of the aiga. Ownership of land is legally vested in the matai. It is the matai's responsibility to direct the economic, social, and political affairs of the aiga. There are 362 villages in Western Samoa with a total of 12,000-plus matai, who can fine or otherwise punish offenders of village rules.

The 1960 Constitution established a parliamentary democracy on the Westminster model but with variances which allowed for "Fa'a Samoa" or the "Samoan Way." The Constitution provides for a Samoan Head of State, a unicameral legislature, an independent judiciary, protection of Samoan land and traditional Samoan titles, and guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms. The present Head of State, Malietoa Tanumafili II, holds the position for life. His successors will be elected by the Legislative Assembly for 5-year terms. The Head of State appoints as Prime Minister, the leader of the Government, an elected member of the Assembly who can command majority support in that body. Members of the Cabinet are appointed by the Head of State with the advice of the Prime Minister. They and the Prime Minister hold office as long as they enjoy the confidence of the Assembly. The 47 Assembly members are elected for 3-year terms. All legislation needs approval by the Head of State before becoming law.

The Western Samoan economy, which is primarily agricultural, is beset by many of the problems of a developing country. It is particularly susceptible to shifts in world prices for its export commodities such as coconut oil. The Government has implemented austerity measures in an attempt to improve the suffering current accounts deficit, but there is no evidence that human rights have been affected by economic conditions.

There were no significant human rights issues in Western Samoa in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for political motives, whether by the Government or by opposition political organizations, does not occur.

b. Disappearance

There are no secret arrests, clandestine detentions, or abductions in Western Samoa.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by law in Western Samoa, and there have been no instances of such practices.

WESTERN SAMOA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are full and effective legal safeguards of internationally recognized rights in this area. The Constitution guarantees freedom from forced labor. Exile, internal or external, is not practiced.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Western Samoan law guarantees the right to a fair public trial, and this right is honored. All charges are stated formally and clearly. Defendants are entitled to counsel. There are no special courts to deal with political or security offenses, and the judiciary is independent of government interference or influence. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government respects the privacy of the people and does not permit arbitrary interference with family, home, or correspondence. Both law and local custom provide for the protection from invasion of the home and from seizure of property without substantive and procedural safeguards, including search warrants.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are fundamental parts of the Constitution. They are respected in law and practice.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right of peaceful assembly and to form associations and unions. There are no significant restrictions.

While trade unions have not emerged in the private sector, the public service has an employees' organization which engages in collective bargaining. The Government has permitted efforts to develop unions, and the courts have upheld the right to strike and to enter into collective bargaining.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution along with the freedom of thought and conscience. Each person is guaranteed the right to change religions or belief and to worship or teach religion alone or with others. There is no government-favored religion. Almost all of the people are Christians.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees the right to travel and move freely throughout Western Samoa and to change residence. Samoans are free to travel abroad, and they can emigrate and return to Samoa without restriction.

WESTERN SAMOA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Western Samoa's Government is based upon the British parliamentary system, with actual power vested in the Prime Minister and the Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly is elected every 3 years. Forty-five of the Assembly members are elected by approximately 12,000 matai in Western Samoa, and the other two seats are filled by universal suffrage of those citizens who are not Samoan by heritage. Although there is some pressure for extending suffrage to all citizens, the concept is seen by many as conflicting with "Fa'a Samoa." The existing system is viewed as being democratic, in that the matai traditionally consult with their extended families before making decisions such as choosing among candidates for the Assembly. In recognition of this practice, candidates campaign among nonmatai in an effort to influence the eventual choices made by the matai. The matai system is conservative but does allow for change. While Samoans must show respect and obedience to their matai in family and communal affairs, the matai have well-defined responsibilities which, if not met, can result in removal.

Western Samoa has only the rudiments of political parties. The Human Rights Protection Party (HRPP) was founded in 1982, and the Christian Democrat Party early in 1985. The current Government, a coalition of HRPP defectors and Christian Democrats, unseated an HRPP government through parliamentary maneuvers in December 1985.

The political process in Samoa still tends to be a function of personality rather than party. In recent experience, elections have occurred more frequently than the prescribed 3-year cycle, primarily as a result of no-confidence votes.

No requests for human rights investigations were made to the Western Samoan Government in 1985, nor have human rights organizations found cause for comment or special reporting on Western Samoa. There are no local nongovernmental organizations which concern themselves with human rights. The Amnesty International 1985 Report does not contain an entry for Western Samoa. Freedom House rates it "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Western Samoa was 161,000 in 1983 and, according to 1981 statistics, growing at the rate of .6 percent. The low growth is due to emigration, the birth rate being considerably higher than that figure. Yearly per capita income was estimated for 1981 as $623. Ninety percent of the work force is in agriculture, cultivating both subsistence and cash crops.

Western Samoa suffers from a critical balance of payments problem. As a result of austerity measures adopted by the Government, the economy is slowly improving. The Government's main development goal is to improve agriculture.

Life expectancy at birth in Western Samoa is 66 years, and the infant mortality rate, according to 1982 World Health Organization figures, is 35 per 1,000 live births. Ninety-five percent of the population has access to safe water.

WESTERN SAMOA

Education is not compulsory or free. The total primary school enrollment is 127.3 percent, with males representing 123.5 percent and females at 131.7 percent. The adult literacy rate is 97.8 percent: 98.7 percent in urban areas and 97.5 in rural.

The Labor and Employment Act of 1972 and 1973 regulations establish a 40-hour workweek for the private sector and a minimum wage, currently about $.25 an hour. It is illegal to employ children under 15 years of age except in "safe and light work." The law also establishes certain rudimentary safety and health provisions, such as a requirement for fencing around dangerous machine parts. Independent observers say, however, that the safety laws are not enforced except when accidents highlight noncompliance and that many agricultural workers, among others, are inadequately protected from pesticides and other health hazards. Part of the problem is low safety consciousness, which government education programs are addressing. The law does not apply to service rendered to the matai, some of whom require children to work at what might be considered "child labor." Government employees are covered under different and more stringent regulations, which are adequately enforced.

Under the Constitution, women are afforded the same rights as men. While women have been active in the Assembly, other public offices, and community affairs, they are generally underrepresented in proportion to their share of the population.

EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA

ALBANIA*

Albania is a one-party State ruled by a Marxist-Leninist dictatorship. Ramiz Alia officially replaced the first Albanian Communist ruler, Enver Hoxha, as Albania's leader on April 13, 1985, two days after Hoxha's death. Like Hoxha, he exercises personal leadership through the 125,000-member Albanian Party of Labor (Communist party).

A large, effective security service, known as the Sigurimi, assists the party in maintaining repressive controls over the Albanian people, who enjoy only very limited civil and political rights.

Albania has a centrally controlled command economy under which the State owns the means of production and the Government directs all significant economic activity. Within a strategy of economic self-reliance, the Government emphasizes a policy of rapid industrialization and development. In recent years, however, the rate of economic growth has declined.

There is no substantial evidence that the human rights situation, which appeared to be exceptionally bad in 1984, improved significantly in 1985. The new leader, Alia, has pledged continuity with Hoxha's policies while calling for greater political "vigilance." Some Western visitors, however, have reported a somewhat more relaxed social atmosphere during 1985.

Albania is a member of the United Nations but has not signed the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In the past, the Communist rulers have indulged in political killing of their opponents, as Enver Hoxha did in disposing of four principal supporters of Mehmet Shehu, his former close associate who reportedly committed suicide under suspicious circumstances in 1981. There is no evidence of political killing since Alia's rise to the top.

b. Disappearance

Persons who have escaped from Albania report that disappearances occur, but specific corroboration is not available.

* The United States has not had diplomatic relations with or official representation in Albania since World War II. It is difficult therefore to comment authoritatively on conditions in Albania.

ALBANIA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Criminal Code prohibits the use of physical or psychological force during investigations. Nevertheless, former political prisoners have often alleged that they were beaten and ill-treated during interrogations to force them to make "confessions." Although some of the worst abuses of the past may have ended, it appears that interrogators still resort to threats and beatings to obtain detainees' "confessions" or collaboration. In the absence of independent investigations of these charges, it is difficult to corroborate such reports, but the pattern of allegations suggests there is at least some truth to them.

Private international humanitarian organizations have reported extremely harsh prison conditions in Albania, including a severe forced-labor regime with inadequate food and clothing, long-term solitary confinement, cramped cells without room to lie down, and unheated, unfurnished cells lacking any sanitary facilities. The Burrel prison and Spac and Ballsh labor camps have been singled out for special mention in this regard.

Eye witnesses have reported the exhibition of bodies of dead prisoners as a means of intimidating the populace. It is impossible to say how widespread this practice may be.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, of Exile

The Constitution provides that no one may be arrested without court or prosecutorial approval or be sentenced to jail without a court verdict or for an act which is not a crime. The Criminal Code, however, is explicitly ideological, and has been officially characterized as a "weapon in the class struggle." The loose formulation of its provisions defining political offenses facilitates their broad interpretation by the courts.

The Criminal Code lists 34 crimes, 12 of which are political offenses, for which the death sentence may be imposed. Among these are such nonviolent political offenses as: unauthorized departure or "flight" from Albania, agitation and propaganda against the State, creation of a counterrevolutionary organization or participation therein, concealment of a person who commits a crime against the State, activity against the revolutionary movement of the working class, and refusal to carry out a duty or coercing others to refuse. The Criminal Code also provides that banishment (generally to a state farm or enterprise) or internment may be administratively imposed, without trial, for up to 5 years on persons whom the authorities consider a threat to the social system and on the families of fugitives. There are numerous reports that families of escapees from Albania have been imprisoned as a deterrent to other potential illegal emigrants. In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International notes a number of such cases in recent years, but another source claims that close relatives of recent escapees are no longer interned.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system in Albania includes the Supreme Court and regional and district courts. Like all organs of government and state authority, it appears to be under the total control of the Albanian Party of Labor. There is virtually no chance a court would render an independent verdict in conflict with the wishes or policies of the political authorities.

Reports of the number of persons in prison range from 4,000 to 40,000, including 300 members of the pre-World War II elite, as well as pro-Soviet, pro-Chinese, and other political prisoners. Many persons are serving sentences for expressing dissatisfaction with conditions in Albania or for trying to flee the country. Amnesty International reports that it has the names of almost 400 political prisoners held in Albania during the 1970's and 1980's, but it believes this is only a fraction of the true figure. Former political prisoners report that about 1,200 political prisoners each were being held in Ballsh and Spac labor camps during the early 1980's. Some 300 more were imprisoned at Burrel, and others were held in Tarovic, Kosove, and Tirana prisons. Although the last amnesty was approved on November 15, 1982 (Albania's national day), there is no independent confirmation of the number of persons amnestied, and there are reports of further political arrests since then.

Amnesty International reports that political detainees lack legal safeguards during both pretrial investigations and trial proceedings. By law, investigations into crimes against the State must be completed within 3 months, but extensions may be easily obtained and no effective maximum period of investigation is enforced. Most investigations into political offenses have been completed within 3 to 4 months, but Amnesty International charges that some investigations have dragged on up to 13 months. Political detainees have been held under harsh conditions for up to 6 months in solitary confinement during pretrial investigations without access to lawyers or relatives. The Criminal Code provides that accused persons must be informed when investigation of their cases is concluded and allowed to examine all the evidence to be brought against them. Usually, however, they are not allowed to examine all the materials and are shown only copies of the indictments. In sum, there do not appear to be any effective controls on the powers of those in charge of investigations in political cases.

Defendants at political trials have usually been denied defense counsel and have had to conduct their own defense. Major political trials of state officials are closed when it suits the purposes of the regime, but most political trials of ordinary citizens are held in open court. Most such trials last no more than 1 day, and there are no known acquittals of political defendants.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution proclaims the inviolability of the home and the privacy of correspondence but at the same time provides that these and other civil rights are subordinate to the "general interest" and may not be exercised in opposition to the Communist system. It is generally accepted that the authorities can and do violate the privacy of the home whenever and to the extent necessary to achieve their ends. The Government uses its pervasive informer network to report on, among other things, the private lives of its citizens. Children are taught to report on their parents' activities in the home, such as whether they practice religion or speak against the Government. Contact with the outside world is carefully monitored. Members of the Greek minority who have escaped report that they had difficulty while in Albania in receiving mail or telephone calls from relatives in Greece. Packages of food, medicine, and clothing sent to them were returned by Albanian authorities to Greece without their knowledge.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Albanian Constitution states that citizens enjoy freedom of speech and press, it provides that these rights may not be exercised in opposition to the Communist system. Consequently, the Government has imposed rigid restrictions on freedom of speech and press. The government-controlled press never criticizes the leadership or its policies, and any citizen who does so publicly is subject to swift and severe reprisals under Article 55. In the past, persons found listening to foreign radio broadcasts or having unauthorized contacts with foreigners have been reprimanded or jailed, although there is some indication that these restrictions may have been relaxed lately. Information from abroad is carefully controlled. Art and literature are deemed to be weapons of revolutionary change and are subject to rigid state control and censorship.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The security apparatus deals severely with group activities that do not have government sanction or that might appear to be in opposition to the leadership. There are no independent associations or organizations.

Nearly all Albanians belong to trade unions that are part of the United Trade Unions of Albania, an arm of the party. The unions have no significant voice in the field of labor relations. Their assigned tasks include raising productivity, indoctrinating and propagandizing the workers, maintaining labor discipline, and organizing periods of so-called "voluntary" manual labor in which all Albanians are expected to take part. In practice, workers have no rights independent of the wishes of the State.

All religious activity in Albania is expressly prohibited by the Constitution and by government policy. Historically about 70 percent of all Albanians were Muslim, nearly 20 percent were Orthodox, and a little more than 10 percent were Roman Catholic. However, in 1967 the Government proclaimed Albania the first atheist State in the world, abrogated all laws dealing with church-state relations, and began an active campaign to eradicate all vestiges of religion. More than 2,100 mosques, churches, monasteries, and other institutions were closed, their fixed assets seized without compensation by the authorities, and many religious leaders persecuted, imprisoned, or even executed for continuing their religious functions. All religious literature was banned, as were any personal manifestation of religious belief or practice.

The authorities continue to suppress religious activity by threatening harsh penalties for believers who practice their faith and by obliging citizens to inform on believers. Nevertheless, there have been some signs, beginning in 1982, that the regime was quietly toning down its shrill antireligious campaign as it tried to improve relations with Italy, Greece, and Turkey. There has been, however, no official assertion that religious practice is once again allowed. Despite years of antireligious pressure, it is reported that some Albanians have continued to practice their faith in the privacy of their own homes, particularly in villages and in more remote mountainous areas. Tourists have also reported seeing Muslim Albanians faithfully kneeling in prayer along roadsides with apparent impunity.

In November 1983, the Vatican publicly condemned religious persecution in Albania and claimed that a number of priests, members of holy orders, and seminarians had died in prison. It also reported that two priests had been executed for baptizing children. The official press denies that believers have been persecuted, and maintains that religious belief is opposed only by argument.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution does not guarantee freedom of movement. Movement within the country and travel abroad are controlled very strictly, and those who violate the laws are severely punished. The Criminal Code states that flight from the State or refusal to return to the fatherland on the part of a person sent abroad on service or allowed to leave the State is considered "treason" and punishable by imprisonment for not less than 10 years or by death. Despite this, Albanians continue to risk their lives to cross the heavily guarded border into Greece and Yugoslavia. Albanians reportedly are allowed to leave the country legally only on official business or, very rarely, for family reasons.

No such right exists in theory or in practice in Albania. The State is ruled by a totalitarian dictatorship, headed by Ramiz Alia in his capacity as First Secretary of the Albanian Party of Labor (APL) and Chairman of the Presidium of the People's Assembly. The Constitution establishes the APL as the sole political entity and Marxism-Leninism as the only political ideology. The APL is governed internally by the principle of "democratic centralism" under which decisionmaking power is concentrated in the hands of a small elite. Any attempt by individual citizens, or even by ordinary party members, to criticize policy or change the form of government or its leaders is dealt with severely.

The Constitution provides that the People's Assembly (unicameral parliament) is the supreme organ of national government in Albania, and similar bodies, people's councils, exist at the local level. Candidates for these assemblies are first indicated by the party and then "elected" without opposition by universal suffrage. During the last quadrennial election for the People's Assembly in 1982, the Government announced that 100 percent of eligible voters had participated and that the official slate of candidates had been elected with only one negative vote from the entire electorate.

ALBANIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government denies any violations of human rights and refuses to cooperate with any investigation of allegations to the contrary, including one by the United Nations Human Rights Commission during 1985. Amnesty International's 1985 report detailed numerous concerns about the human rights situation in Albania: imprisonment of prisoners of conscience; lack of legal safeguards for political detainees; allegations of ill-treatment of detainees; and harsh prison conditions. Freedom House rated Albania as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

With a population of about 2,960,000 and limited natural resources, Albania is the poorest country in Europe. Per capita gross annual income is estimated to be about $850 according to the best available figures. Albania has the least amount of arable land per capita in Europe and the youngest, fastest growing population on the continent, increasing at an annual rate of 2 percent (four times the European average). In view of the country's poor resource base and the Government's self-imposed isolation, including its refusal to accept foreign credits (which are forbidden under the 1976 Constitution) to finance trade transactions, the leadership has achieved significant economic development since World War II.

Albania has a centrally controlled, command economy, under which the State owns the means of production. Despite the Government's policy emphasis on rapid industrialization, the economy remains based largely on agriculture and the production of raw materials, especially minerals.

Food supply is generally adequate, and there are no reports of chronic food shortages or rationing. The population receives more than the minimum daily per capita caloric intake (119 percent of the minimum), but it is one of the lowest in Europe. Life expectancy is estimated at 71.75 years, and the infant mortality rate is about 40 per 1,000 births. Nearly all children are educated, but the overall literacy rate for all ages is estimated at about 75 percent. Housing costs are low, but there is a chronic housing shortage, particularly for young couples.

The Constitution states that women shall enjoy "equal rights with men in work, pay, holidays, social security, education, in all social-political activity, as well as in the family." Information on the extent to which these rights are exercised is not available, but there are indications that the regime has advanced the status of women. Women are said to participate equally in the obligatory labor and military service programs. There are several women in the party and government leadership.

AUSTRIA

Austria is a constitutional parliamentary democracy. The coalition Government (Socialist Party and Freedom Party) formed after the 1983 national election has remained in office, and the (right-of-center) People's Party has remained in opposition.

The 1985 human rights situation in Austria was essentially unchanged from the conditions which prevailed in previous years. Human rights are respected in Austria. Individuals enjoy the right to associate freely, express their views without governmental restrictions, hold private property, and pursue private interests. Elections are free and regularly draw high levels of participation. No charges of human rights violations came to light during 1985.

Since World War II, Austria has served as a country of first asylum for nearly 2 million refugees from Eastern Europe. During periods of crisis and upheaval in Eastern Europe, refugee arrivals rise significantly. In 1981, for instance, more than 29,000 Poles used Austria as their country of first asylum. During "normal" years, Eastern European refugee arrivals average 5,000 to 6,000 (calendar year 1984 saw a slight rise to 6,483). Austria spent approximately $30 million in 1984 on refugee reception, care, and maintenance.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports in 1985 of politically motivated killings either by Government authorities or opposition groups. An Arab terrorist group, however, killed four persons and injured many more in an attack on the Israeli airline passenger ticket counter in Vienna airport in December. Two terrorists were captured.

b. Disappearance

There were no abductions by authorities in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture in Austria is banned by Article II of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which is incorporated into the Austrian Constitution. There is no evidence of any violation of this provision.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary detention or exile. The law provides for investigative detention for 72 hours, by which time an investigative judge must decide on the legality of the detention. Provided the investigative judge agrees, the accused may be held in detention pending completion of an investigation for up to a maximum of 2 years. Grounds for investigative detention are enumerated in the law, as are conditions for release on bail. A law which went into effect on July 1, 1983, reforms the provisions concerning detention by shortening pretrial procedures, restricting the number of detentions, except in the case of persons who have or are alleged to have committed major crimes, and providing better legal protection for detainees. There are no allegations that these provisions for investigative detention have been violated.

Detention for minor infractions of administrative law may be imposed by the administrative authorities but is subject to court appeal. The Government is considering legislation requiring increased judicial control of such proceedings. In 1984, a total of 1,957 persons were held for varying periods of time in investigative detention.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Austrian judiciary is independent from the executive and the legislative branches of government. Trials are public. Judges are appointed for life and cannot, in principle, be removed from office. Jury trials are prescribed for major offenses, and those convicted have the right of appeal. Written charges must be presented to the accused, who have the right of representation by a lawyer. Detention pending investigation is restricted to only certain cases.

Concerned about the possibility of executive interference in the Austrian judicial system, critics argue that the public prosecutors' lack of independence from the Ministry of Justice opens the way for possible governmental meddling. To rectify this possible defect, the Government is considering introducing a law which would require that directives issued by the ministry to the public prosecutors be made public.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A 1978 law provides for the protection of personal data collected, processed, or transmitted by government agencies, public institutions, and private entities. Constitutional provisions also protect the secrecy of the mail and telephone.

The privacy of family life is respected. There is no effort by the Government to monitor or control family life.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Austria has a free, independent, and multifaceted press, ranging from conservative to Communist.

Publications may be removed from circulation if they violate legal provisions concerning morality or public security. As a matter of practice, such cases are extremely rare. Opposition viewpoints are given wide attention in Austrian publications. Austria's well-established democratic political system, its active and independent press, and its effective judiciary combine to assure continued freedom of speech and press.

AUSTRIA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of assembly and association. The Austrian State Treaty of 1955, though, makes an exception to this principle in the case of Nazi organizations and activities. The constitutional law of 1945 also prohibits Nazi organizations. The law on the formation of associations stipulates that permission to form an association may be denied if it is apparent that the organization will pursue the illegal activities of a prohibited organization.

Public demonstrations require a permit by the police authorities. In processing such applications, the police may consider only the public safety aspect of the proposed demonstration and not its political purpose. Permits are routinely issued.

Trade unions have an important voice in the country's political life due to their role in the social partnership, an unofficial system by which Austria's economic policies are determined by labor and management representatives. Labor is organized in 15 national unions, each of which is a member of the Austrian Trade Union Federation. This organization has a strong, centralized leadership structure. Individual unions and the Federation are independent of government or political party control. Unions have the right to organize workers, to negotiate wage agreements, and to strike, although strikes in Austria during the postwar period have been rare. Two members of the present Cabinet are presidents of national unions, and the current president of the lower house of Parliament is also the president of the Federation. Nearly 60 percent of the work force is organized in trade unions. The Federation is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and also provides the worker delegate for Austria's International Labor Organization delegation.

By law, most employees must be members of the Chambers of Labor. This organization, which is unique to Austria, represents workers' interests vis-a-vis the Government whereas the unions represent the workers vis-a-vis the employers. The leadership of the trade unions as well as of the Chambers of Labor is elected through democratic balloting. A large number of trade associations and other professional groupings are further testimony to freedom of association in Austria.

This right is guaranteed by the Constitution, although the Treaty of St. Germain, which also is a constitutional provision, restricts this freedom to the practice of religions which are compatible with public safety and morality. In order to qualify as a recognized religious organization under Austrian law, religious groups register with the Government.

Although 85 percent of the Austrian population is Roman Catholic, most of the world's major religions are represented in Austria. Despite its dominant position in the country, the political influence of the Catholic Church has steadily diminished since 1945 and is no longer considered a major political force. Although anti-Semitism has practically disappeared from public view, several recent surveys suggest it is still latently present among significant numbers of Austrians.

AUSTRIA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions concerning freedom of movement within the country or the right to change residence or workplace. Austrian residents are free to travel or to emigrate. Citizens who have left the country have the right to return. No area of the country is closed to travel.

Austria serves as a country of first asylum for refugees from Eastern Europe, and as a transit point for Soviet-Jewish emigrants on their way to Israel or other third countries. Once in Austria, refugees are not forcibly returned to their country of origin. The Government has drastically limited the issuance of work permits to non-Austrians in an effort to reduce domestic unemployment. Austria's guest worker population, which averaged 226,400 in 1973, stood at 146,871 as of September 1985.

Austria is governed through a democratic parliamentary system. Under the Constitution, elections must be held at least every 4 years. The 1983 national elections resulted in a change of government in Austria. The Socialist Party lost its absolute majority in the Parliament and went into coalition with the Freedom Party. Several small parties also contested the elections, including the Communist Party, but they did not receive sufficient support to elect candidates to the Parliament.

No charges of human rights violations were brought by international or nongovernmental organizations during 1984. Austria recognizes the competence of the Human Rights Commission in Strasbourg for implementing the European Convention. Austria concerns itself extensively with international human rights matters. Representatives of oppressed groups frequently visit Austria and meet with Government officials and political leaders to explain their views. Because of Austria's geographic position, such meetings frequently focus on the human rights situation in Eastern Europe. Austria hosted a Council of Europe conference on human rights in March 1985.

Amnesty International is the major nongovernmental human rights organization active in Austria. Austrians also provide financial support for the "Bruno Kreisky Foundation," which was formed in 1976 to honor distinguished human rights activists. Amnesty International did not mention Austria in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated Austria "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Austria has a population of 7,556,000 with an annual growth rate of minus 0.3 percent. Per capita gross national product in 1984 was $8,502. Austria has a developed economy and enjoys a high standard of living.

AUSTRIA

Austria has an extensive public welfare system, the benefits of which are available to all citizens on a nondiscriminatory basis. These programs provide pensions for the retired, health benefits, and payments during periods of unemployment. Life expectancy at birth was 69 years for men and 76 for women in 1984. The infant mortality rate for 1984 was 11.5 per 1,000 live births. The literacy rate is nearly 100 percent.

There is no minimum wage in Austria, but anyone whose income falls below the official poverty line (approximately $3,500 per year) is eligible to receive social welfare benefits. According to official statistics, 289,600 Austrians were living below the poverty line in 1984.

Since 1975, the legal Austrian workweek has been established at 40 hours, although workers in several key branches have attained reductions below this level recently. The minimum working age in Austria is 15. The Labor Codification Law and the Labor Protection Law are among the more important legal instruments for ensuring workers' rights and decent working conditions. A labor inspectorate attached to the Justice Ministry conducts routine inspections of health and safety conditions at the workplace.

Legal restrictions on women's rights have long been abolished. Women are entering the work force in increasing numbers and have made substantial progress toward economic equality in the postwar era. Nevertheless, significant inequality in practice still exists in political, economic, and social fields despite legislation enacted in 1977 and 1979 to reform family law. In 1984, approximately 40 percent of the work force was composed of women. Men, however, earned 49 percent more than women overall. Among men and women with equal training and education, men earned one-third more than women. Women participate fully in the electoral process and constitute 53 percent of the Austrian electorate. Since 1983, a state secretary, a woman in the Chancellor's office, has been responsible for women's issues within the Government.

The human rights of Austrian minorities are respected, but the Slovene minority in the province of Carinthia is concerned about the future of Slovene-language instruction in local elementary schools. The Slovenes fear that changes in the province's bilingual education system, which some German-speaking groups advocate, would effectively eliminate Slovene from most provincial elementary schools. The three major political parties, however, oppose the proposed changes, and it appears that bilingual education in Carinthia will continue in its present form for the foreseeable future.

BELGIUM

Belgium is a parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarchy. Its Council of Ministers (Cabinet), responsible for governmental decisions, is led by the Prime Minister and holds office as long as it retains the confidence of the Parliament. Direct popular elections for Parliamentary seats (excluding 76 of the 182 Senate seats apportioned by other means) are held at least every 4 years under a system of universal suffrage, obligatory voting, and proportional representation.

Domestic security in Belgium is the responsibility of the National Paramilitary Gendarmerie, the judicial police, and a host of municipal police forces. The armed forces play no role in domestic law enforcement.

Beginning in October 1984, Belgium found itself the target of terrorist attacks from a variety of sources, with groups claiming to be Belgian taking responsibility. Some 20 terrorist actions have occurred since then, claiming 2 lives and causing substantial property damage. Terrorism on their own soil is an unaccustomed phenomenon for Belgians. Added to this was the trauma caused when 38 football fans were crushed in the wake of nonpolitical disturbances at a Brussels football stadium last May. These events have increasingly led Belgians to question their personal security and the effectiveness of the forces that are supposed to insure it.

Respect for human rights in Belgium is guaranteed in the Constitution and laws and was observed in practice throughout 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

Neither the Belgian authorities nor officially sanctioned groups engage in killings for political motives. Two firemen died in May 1985 after a car-bomb exploded in front of the headquarters of the Belgian Employers Federation. The attack was claimed by the Communist Combat Cells (CCC), a group of apparently Belgian membership that first came to public awareness with the bombing of the offices of an American multinational corporation in October 1984. Although the CCC claimed the deaths were accidental--the police had failed to alert the firemen that the vehicle contained a bomb--terrorist attacks have become an anxious topic for Belgians and their Government.

The CCC and as many as four other groups state that they have targeted NATO and police installations, companies doing business with the military, and other political groups or private businesses for attack. After bombing a Brussels gas company on October 8, 1985, the CCC urged voters to void their ballots in the parliamentary elections to follow 5 days later. Security forces, principally the Gendarmerie, have captured evidence that seems to link French terrorists with local groups.

BELGIUM

b. Disappearance

Abductions, secret arrests, or clandestine detentions by official or quasi-official security forces contravene Belgian law and are unknown in practice.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Penal Code's prohibition on the deliberate mistreatment or injury of another is applicable to the actions of both officials and private individuals. Although crowded and aging prisons are an issue in Belgium, torture and other inhuman punishment are unknown in practice. There are no differences in the conditions of confinement based on race, sex, religion, or social class.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Arrested persons must be brought before a judge within 24 hours or released. Belgian law provides for pretrial confinement only under special circumstances: when a person is apprehended in the commission of a criminal act; when there is a risk that the suspect will prove a danger to the community; when there is a risk that he will flee the jurisdiction; and when the case involves one of a number of serious offenses specified by law. The justification for such confinement is subject to periodic review by a panel of judges.

In practice, there is growing concern among local human rights groups and parliamentarians that pretrial detention is sometimes abused. Bail exists in principle under Belgian law but in practice is rarely granted. There is no limit on how long an accused may be held prior to coming to trial. The Belgian Attorney General, in a speech marking the beginning of the 1984-85 session of the Supreme Court, said that in numerous cases judges fail to limit pretrial detention to those cases that truly meet the standards of public safety and the likelihood of flight. He also warned judges that pretrial detention should not be used to punish an accused before trial.

Forced labor is legally prohibited and is unknown in practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A fair public trial, including the right to counsel, is guaranteed by law and honored in practice. A suspect is charged, if the evidence so warrants, when the preliminary judicial investigatory phase is completed. Charges are clearly and formally stated. No one is imprisoned because of his political beliefs.

Belgium was the subject of a 1984 decision by the European Court of Human Rights which condemned legal proceedings against a man whose prosecutor when he was first arrested later became one of his judges. In 1985, the European Commission on Human Rights accepted a similar case for review involving the independence of the judiciary and prosecution.

BELGIUM

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Freedom from arbitrary interference with privacy by the State is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Participation in the political process and enjoyment of civil and personal liberties are not inhibited. The Constitution specifically guarantees the inviolability of the home, except in cases specifically regulated by law. The law forbids searches of private homes at night, except in special circumstances. Warrants issued by a judge are required unless the inhabitants of the domicile agree to the search. The Penal Code provides penalties for all violations of the home by officials as well as by private persons. Monitoring of telephones and interference with mail are strictly prohibited.

Section 2 - Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Varying political, religious, philosophical, and artistic views are permitted free public expression, and there is no political censorship of the media. There are, however, prohibitions on publications and productions held to undermine "public order" (e.g., extreme pornography and incitement to violence). There are laws against libel, provisions for a citizen's right of reply to media criticism, and restrictions on criticism of government policies by civil servants. Belgium has state-owned radio and television programs which are supervised by boards of directors representing the main currents of opinion. The Government has a representative on the boards but no control or veto power. "Free" (not state-owned) radio stations operate openly, although their legal status is ambiguous. Most urban homes also have access to foreign television from neighboring countries via cable.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Subject to regulations to preserve public order, political, civic, religious, artistic, social, and special interest groups are permitted free public assembly. Groups protesting government policies or actions and labor unions are free from harassment and persecution, although permits are required for open-air assemblies.

The right to organize, strike, and bargain collectively is recognized and exercised freely. Government austerity measures sometimes limit or alter the results of collective bargaining. This was the basis of a 1983 complaint to the International Labor Organization by one of Belgium's two major labor confederations. The degree of union organization is one of the highest in the world--approximately 70 percent of the work force. Labor unions are strong and independent of the government but have important informal links with and influence on many of the major political parties. The unions do not allow their leaders to hold political office.

Belgium has a long tradition of religious tolerance. The Christian, Jewish, and Muslim religions are accorded "recognized" status in law, which includes a government subsidy. "Nonrecognized" religions enjoy full freedom to practice and are not subject to harassment or persecution.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Belgian citizens enjoy freedom of travel within the country and internationally, including the right of voluntary repatriation. A law took effect in May 1985 that gives six municipalities in the greater Brussels region the right to refuse to register new foreigners--defined as citizens of non-European Economic Community countries--as residents. Such registration is required of all persons residing in Belgium, with some exceptions. To date all six municipalities have taken advantage of the new law, whose effect is to limit the freedom of foreigners to decide where in Belgium they may reside. On the other hand, anyone arriving in Belgium may claim political asylum, and will be allowed to stay in Belgium long enough to pursue that claim. Belgium automatically grants the right of political asylum to those foreign nationals who are recommended by the local office of the U.N. High Commission for Refugees.

The last elections were held on October 13, 1985 when Prime Minister Martens' center-right coalition emerged with an enhanced majority. Participation in the political system is open to all citizens. Suffrage is universal for all adults (18 and over), secret, and compulsory. Unweighted voting (one person/one vote) has been in effect since 1919 for men and since 1949 for women. There are 13 parties currently represented in the Parliament. Opposition parties are free, under law and in practice, to operate without constraints or repression.

The existence of Dutch- and French-speaking regions poses significant problems for the Belgian State. All major institutions, including political parties, are divided along linguistic lines. There are special provisions for Dutch-, French-, and German-speaking councils at the community level. Regional and linguistic needs are taken into account in national decisions.

The Belgian Government has been active in the United Nations and other international forums concerned with human rights and has promoted independent investigation of alleged human rights violations. No requests have been made for outside investigation of the human rights situation in Belgium. There are several active independent human rights groups in Belgium, and they consider the Government open to discussion of any human rights question.

Amnesty International did not mention Belgium in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated Belgium "free."

BELGIUM

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Belgium's population in 1985 was 9,885,000 and was growing at the rate of only one-tenth of one percent annually. Per capita gross national product was $9,150 in 1983. In 1985 Belgium's economy continued to suffer from slow growth and high unemployment, the latter at slightly less than 14 percent. According to the World Bank, governmental policies to increase employment and an extensive system of unemployment compensation and other social benefits have helped to minimize individual financial hardship.

Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. The literacy rate is 98 percent. In 1985 life expectancy was 73.6 years, with the infant mortality rate 10 per 1,000 live births. In 1982, nearly 99 percent of the children eligible for primary education were enrolled. School attendance is mandatory until age 18 for both sexes.

The minimum age for employment of children is 16, and children can work and study part time from age 16 to 18. Belgian working hours, mandated by law and collective agreement, are the shortest in Europe, averaging 37 hours a week. There are generous legal provisions for minimum wages (currently almost $600 a month for full-time work for those over 21 years of age, with a slightly lower youth minimum), vacations, and unemployment benefits. Adequate health and safety legislation exists, supplemented by collective bargaining agreements, and health and safety committees are mandated by law at enterprises with more than 50 employees.

Belgium is active in the area of women's rights. The Consultative Commission for the Condition of Women, attached to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, advises the Government on international women's issues. Within the country there are several other commissions on women's rights which deal with oversight of women's education and working conditions. There are numerous women members of the Senate and Chamber of Representatives, and there are two women in Cabinet posts.

Belgium is a culturally active, pluralistic society in which individual differences in general are respected, and linguistic rights in particular are protected. Some 57 percent of Belgians are native Dutch speakers living primarily in the northern provinces that constitute Flanders, 42 percent are French speakers living in the capital, Brussels, and the southern provinces called Wallonia, and the rest are German speakers living along the eastern border. These language differences have been the subject of hundreds of laws over the last century, leading to a fairly rigid structure designed to protect each language group from cultural, economic, or political dominance by the others.

Nearly 1 out of every 10 persons living in Belgium is foreign-born. Some 25 percent of the residents of Brussels are foreigners, resulting from a concentration of primarily north African immigrants who have a profound effect on the social and economic mix. The immigrant population tends to be poorer, less skilled, and less educated than the average, and increasingly the focus of public debate.

BULGARIA

Bulgaria is a Marxist-Leninist state ruled by the Bulgarian Communist Party. The Communist leadership holds a monopoly of power and seeks to direct and control all political, economic, social, and cultural activities. A second, much smaller party, the Bulgarian National Agrarian Union, is represented in the Government and the National Assembly (Parliament) but is totally subservient to the Communist Party. No other political parties are tolerated.

An omnipresent network of state security police and militia at all levels of society has succeeded in suppressing most open expressions of opposition to the regime.

The combined effects of economic mismanagement and poor weather brought about a decline in economic growth in 1985. There were shortages of some basic commodities and of energy, and electric power had to be rationed nationwide.

The Bulgarian Constitution provides for certain basic rights, including the right to citizenship, work, rest, access to health care and free education, free speech and press, association and demonstration, and freedom of worship. In practice, these freedoms are abridged or circumscribed to varying degrees, and they may not be exercised in any way detrimental to Communist Party control. All challenges to this control are met quickly, firmly, and harshly.

The human rights situation in Bulgaria deteriorated sharply during 1985. In a departure from past practice, the regime compelled the entire Turkish-speaking minority, some 600,000-900,000 persons, to abandon their Turkish and Muslim names and adopt Bulgarian and Christian ones. Army troops and the paramilitary militia enforced the name change decree, often at gunpoint. A media campaign claimed that minority members were spontaneously, simultaneously, and voluntarily rediscovering their authentic Bulgarian heritage, which had allegedly been repressed hundreds of years earlier during Ottoman times. This contradicted the regime's former recognition of the Turkish minority. Use of the Turkish language was forbidden in 1985 (a ban enforced by fines), Islamic religious observances were derided in the media, some practices were banned outright, and worshipers suffered official harassment.

Beatings and mistreatment of political prisoners continued, as did arbitrary arrest and detention of persons critical of the authorities. The Government maintained its constant, widespread interference in the affairs of its citizens through its system of surveillance, electronic monitoring, mail censorship, and control of information.

Reported acts of terror in 1985 included the bombing, with fatalities, of a train near Bunovo, as well as bombings of a hotel in Sliven and a munitions plant in Plovdiv, among other incidents. The identity of those carrying out such acts and their motivations, however, are not known.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Regime-controlled media deny any violence occurred during the Government's forcible name-change campaign against ethnic

BULGARIA

Turks, but officials privately have admitted "excesses." Numerous sources report deaths and injuries caused by security forces, including the Army, among Turkish-Bulgarians resisting this repression of their cultural identity. The number of deaths is variously estimated to range anywhere between a few dozen and several hundred, with injuries suffered by many more people, but these figures are impossible to confirm. Some Bulgarian police and security personnel were also reported killed or wounded. The casualties were incurred mainly in rural parts of Kurdzhali, Sliven, Ruse, and Razgrad districts from December 1984 to February 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of disappearance during 1985 at the hands of official or quasi-official security forces.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

According to credible reports by human rights advocates and their families, beatings continued to be a feature of imprisonment in Bulgaria. Many persons apprehended while attempting to leave Bulgaria without authorization have reportedly suffered severe abuse at the hands of border guards. Political prisoners, including intellectuals, are held together with common criminals and subjected to brutal treatment by these elements as well as by their guards. These practices are confirmed by veteran inmates from various prisons, including Sofia's Central Prison and forced labor camps at Devnia, Belene Island, and Debelt. A dissident legal scholar, Yanko Yankov, is reported to have been badly beaten by guards at Pazardzhik Prison and to have been denied medical treatment. According to a dissident former graduate student confined at Debelt, the guards there delegate the task of beating political offenders to criminal inmates.

Prison conditions reportedly vary. According to one prisoner, cells at Sofia's central prison went unheated during the early months of 1985, but despite the winter temperatures inmates were not issued any additional clothing. On the other hand, a penal veteran referred to Stara Zagora Prison as a relative "paradise" where a correct regime is followed despite Spartan conditions. At the Razvigor Street Jail in Sofia, prisoners are held two to a cell during pretrial investigations. The cells measure one and a half by two paces and are furnished only with a plank bed or pallet. Each cell is illuminated around the clock by a single naked bulb. The diet is poor. There are no exercise or recreation areas, although detainees may remain at Razvigor for several months. While Razvigor inmates endure lengthy interrogation sessions, there are no known complaints of beating in this jail.

Bulgarians may be detained, tried, and punished for many actions which elsewhere are considered political in nature. For example, there are many credible reports that ethnic Turks were confined in 1985 as actual or merely potential resisters to forced name changes. Similarly, unauthorized demonstrations, public expression critical of the Government, or the mere act of entering a Western embassy by Bulgarians can bring interrogation, detention, or arrest for having committed a "crime" even though such activity is not illegal.

BULGARIA

Although the principle of habeas corpus exists under the Bulgarian Criminal Code, it appears to have been grossly violated during the Government's repression of the Turkish minority. On paper, the law stipulates that preliminary detention is limited to 10 days, and then only when evidence appears to justify later indictment. However, several cases are known of persons being confined for longer periods without charges being lodged. Following arraignment, the law permits detention for up to 6 months before indictment. Under Bulgaria's Criminal Code the accused must be informed of the charges against him.

Through administrative regulation, persons may also be subject to an informal system of control in which they are detained at their place of residence and must appear at the local police station several times daily. Another form of punishment is forced change of domicile or internal exile. A person's right to live in a certain town may be revoked, and he may be required to move to a town far away from family and familiar surroundings. Banished persons are often sent to remote villages to perform agricultural labor. Their identity cards are stamped to note restriction to a particular locality. Should exiles or persons under such administrative control leave despite these prohibitions, they may face actual imprisonment. One such case in 1985 involved a person named Iliya Minev who was sentenced to 5 months' imprisonment for violating the terms of an administrative order restricting his movement.

Political offenders are required to do hard labor. For example, forced labor internees are assigned to the most hazardous jobs at the Devnia chemical plant but at rates of pay considerably below those of their nonprisoner coworkers.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Bulgarian law and common practice provide for public trial in criminal cases. Defendants are entitled to counsel, but only after the preliminary investigation, sometimes lasting many weeks, has been completed and an indictment prepared. When legal counsel is finally available to the accused, it often cooperates with the prosecution. In theory, the accused is informed of the charges against him, but recent practice indicates that detainees are often not told precisely under what statutes they are being held.

Bulgaria releases no figures on the number of political prisoners and detainees. Several thousand such persons is a reasonable estimate for 1985, including those caught while trying to escape across the country's borders, as well as Turkish-Bulgarians rounded up in the early months of the year.

Special court procedures are followed in cases involving state security. Trials with political implications, such as the proceedings against Yanko Yankov and a confederate, Tseko Tsekov, for "defamation of the state," are not open to the public. At Yankov's trial, the court refused to enter a portion of his testimony into the transcript when it became evident that this material could embarrass a close relative of a high government official.

Generally, the Bulgarian judicial system seeks to maintain at least the appearance of observing legal norms. However, although the laws themselves are codified, published, and readily available for reference, numerous procedural and administrative regulations are not. Frequently, such regulations, access to which is restricted, are invoked arbitrarily. The defendant and his counsel have little recourse, since the validity or applicability of the regulation in question cannot be challenged. These procedural regulations play a central role in the judicial system and enable the Government and its prosecutors to manipulate the circumstances and outcome of trials. Despite such restrictions, some defense lawyers enjoy a reputation among defendants for courage and honesty despite pressure on them from the security apparatus.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government interferes in the private lives of its citizens in many ways. An elaborate system of informers directed by the party and security apparatus, represented in virtually all workplaces, residential areas, and social organizations, monitors the daily lives of Bulgarians for signs of dissidence or other unacceptable behavior. Bulgarians assume that security personnel may monitor their telephone conversations and read their mail.

In October 1985 the authorities reimposed a curfew on youths of middle school age and younger. Adolescents no longer may attend evening film or theater performances without adult accompaniment. A decree effective November 1, 1985 also stipulates that boys must wear short hair while girls with long hair must adhere to a particular style. A stricter student dress code has been imposed, and teachers were warned that they are to be judged henceforth by the level of discipline and behavior of their students. The decree also compels unemployed persons aged between 15 and 30 to accept jobs assigned to them or to find jobs on their own.

Sanctity of the home is nominally safeguarded by law, and police may not legally search property without prior permission from a court or prosecutor. However, searches may be undertaken in urgent situations before judicial permission is given. The authorities are required to issue an itemized receipt for property confiscated during a search. In one recent case, a defendant facing trial refused to sign this document, charging that it contained falsehoods. In court, the defendant reported that his signature was forged on the document, but a judge admitted it as evidence over the defense lawyer's protest.

The Government regiment the private lives of its citizens. In May 1985 the National Assembly enacted a revised Family Code incorporating controversial features that made divorce more difficult to obtain. Its intention was to promote family stability and population growth. The Code regularizes a process whereby a couple's employers are brought into mandatory marriage reconciliation efforts even if both parties to the marriage are intent on its dissolution.

Virtually all citizens are members of "mass" political organizations. Children and young adults belong to the Pioneers and Komsomol, while their elders join the Fatherland Front, a mass organization, or, in the case of the elite, the Communist Party. There appears to be strong pressure on all citizens at least to pay dues and become nominal members of these organizations. Those who refuse--an extremely small percentage of the population--are likely to be denied normal promotions and other benefits and to come under official scrutiny.

The Government attempts to insulate the populace from most kinds of contact with non-Communist foreign influence. International mail and telephone conversations are closely monitored, and Western shortwave radio broadcasts have been subjected to periodic jamming. The Voice of America is not jammed, however. Western news publications, except for those of Communist parties, are usually not on sale. Authorities make them available at hotels on a very limited basis when important international meetings convene, e.g. UNESCO's October-November 1985 conference in Sofia. Even then, however, security personnel seek to prevent Bulgarians from buying Western newspapers and magazines.

Some foreign citizens of Bulgarian ancestry have been denied the opportunity of staying in homes of their Bulgarian relatives and friends while visiting the country and have been told to stay in hotels.

The Bulgarian Government's campaign during 1985 of forced cultural assimilation of Bulgarian citizens who are ethnic Turks was a particularly gross example of arbitrary interference into the private lives of individuals. Those who refused to accept new Bulgarian and Christian names were threatened or arrested, and some were reportedly killed by security forces which swept through predominantly Turkish settlements in southern and northeastern Bulgaria. New identity cards were issued, and essential services, even medical care, were denied to persons presenting the old documents with Turkish or Muslim names. The assimilation campaign included a ban on speaking Turkish and wearing Turkish-style clothing. Records, including medical files, were altered to match the new names.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for certain basic rights, including freedom of speech and press. In practice, these freedoms are circumscribed and may not be exercised in any way that might weaken the Communist Party's monopoly of power. Press, radio, and television are under total regime control, with no alternatives tolerated. Laws provide severe punishments for anyone convicted of criticizing the State. The dissemination of "untruthful remarks which might increase mistrust of state power or cause confusion in society" is proscribed. The unauthorized disclosure of certain information, e.g., unpublished economic statistics, is illegal and subject to serious penalties.

Although censorship does not exist officially, the media operate within well-understood party and government guidelines and practices. International news is usually limited to that provided by the government news agency or official Soviet sources. Forbidden topics in the Bulgarian press include unauthorized criticism of party and state leaders, of Communist ideology, and other Communist countries, particularly the U.S.S.R. As for cultural matters within the country, the media promote only ethnic Bulgarian achievements, excluding recognition of minority contributions (e.g., Macedonian, Gypsy, Turkish, or Pomak) to national life. The previously Turkish-language newspaper Yeni Isik became Nova Svetlina, a Bulgarian-language periodical which was used extensively by the authorities in their campaign against Turkish culture and customs.

In addition to the all-pervasive party control of the media, self-censorship is practiced carefully by virtually the entire population. For example, acceptable themes are assigned to authors at annual Writers Union congresses, and those not following the directives are unlikely to have their works published.

There have also been instances of interference with academic inquiry in the social sciences. A revision of history undertaken in 1985 attempted to demonstrate that Bulgarian Turks were really ethnic Bulgars whose ancestors had allegedly been pressured during Ottoman times to adopt the Turkish language and customs and the Islamic faith. References to the minority as "Turks" became taboo. This revision contradicted Communist party publications appearing as late as March 1984, which lauded the contributions of "Bulgarian Turks" in national construction.

A person is able to send criticism, suggestions, and complaints by letter to newspapers and to National Assembly representatives on a broad range of topics such as inadequate service from public agencies and housing shortages. None of the letters published, however, goes beyond criticism of specific economic or service shortfalls or failure of lower-level officials in government administration. On some occasions, an issue of social policy is opened to limited public discussion. For example, some debate on the draft for a new Family Code was permitted, but despite widely expressed dissatisfaction with the Code's restrictive features, it was enacted into law without significant changes.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for freedom of association and demonstration. In practice, the State decides which social and political organizations may exist. Private associations are totally unknown, and the law provides for punishment of anyone "founding an illegal, antistate organization." In Mikhailovgrad, a human rights group of about 16 persons was broken up in 1984, and its members were all arrested. Freedom of assembly is a right granted only to legally constituted organizations and only for approved purposes. Attendance at public demonstrations is a duty assigned by schools and enterprises to their members. In late 1984 and early 1985, unauthorized demonstrations by ethnic Turks to protest forced cultural assimilation occurred in some southern Bulgarian towns. These gatherings were forcibly disrupted.

All Bulgarian labor unions are organized and totally controlled by the Communist Party. According to the unions' official statutes enacted in 1982, their purpose is to educate their members in a spirit of affection and devotion to the party, to instill patriotism and loyalty to the Soviet Union, and to prepare working people for Communist society. Union members are not in a position to negotiate or strike for better pay or working conditions, nor may they organize outside the existing unions. Union leaders represent the interests of management, and there is no mechanism for collective bargaining.

The unions have not defended workers dismissed from jobs because of political transgressions. Such workers are sometimes blacklisted by security authorities, effectively barring them from further employment. Bulgarian trade unions are assigned a role in ensuring the job safety and general social welfare of their members. Bulgarian trade unions maintain ties with Communist-controlled unions and labor confederations abroad, and Bulgaria is a member of the International Labor Organization.

Lawyers, doctors, artists, musicians, writers, and academics are represented by professional associations which also have the party-assigned function of controlling their membership. Professional associations have contacts with their foreign--including Western--counterparts and arrange foreign travel for trusted members to attend conferences and take part in international exchanges.

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of worship, the authorities espouse atheism and discourage religion. Openly expressed religious conviction is incompatible with party membership or the attainment of responsible government position. Nevertheless, a number of faiths are recognized, including Islam, Judaism, and various Christian denominations. Banned, however, are the Ba'hai faith and the Dunovist sect, an indigenous movement which flourished in pre-Communist Bulgaria. Relations between the Government and church organizations are regulated by the Committee for Questions of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church and Religious Cults, which is organized under the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It reviews all clerical appointments, and on occasion, as happened during 1985 to the Evangelicals, will impose a candidate of its own over the opposition of local congregations.

The Bulgarian Orthodox Church, the established religion before the Communists took power, is the largest and most acceptable in the Government's view. This is in recognition of the Orthodox Church's historical and cultural role in Bulgaria's past, as well as of its continuing appeal to ordinary Bulgarians. The Orthodox Church receives substantial government financial support, and in return voices concurrence with Government propoganda on such themes as peace and disarmament.

The Orthodox Church is allowed to print a newspaper, distill and market some alcoholic beverages, and sell religious articles such as candles, small jewelry crosses, etc. A Bulgarian-language Bible was published in 1982 in only 2,000 copies and distributed domestically, but it is now out of print. Although the authorities tend not to interfere with older worshipers, they try to dissuade young churchgoers from entering churches or circulate among them demanding to see their identity cards.

Ethnic Turks make up the majority of Bulgaria's Muslims, the remainder being Gypsies or Slavic Pomaks. Muslim believers have been inhibited from practicing their religion by the closure of many mosques and by prohibitions against religious education of children. Although Sofia's main mosque is being slowly renovated with some government funds, many other mosques throughout the country have fallen into disrepair, or have been converted to other uses, e.g. a barbershop in Pleven. Many Muslim graveyards have been obliterated. Certain architecturally notable mosques, as at Razgrad and Shumen, have been preserved as "cultural monuments" but are closed to actual worship.

Muslims have no access to Korans, which are not printed in Bulgaria. Since the Communist takeover in 1944, only three Bulgarian Muslims have been permitted to undertake the Hajj, or pilgrimage, to Mecca. Muslim rites of circumcision and burial are banned, as is the observance of religious holidays. In 1985, Communist newspapers openly ridiculed the Muslim practices of almsgiving on certain holidays and fasting during the month of Ramadan. Bulgaria permits ritual slaughterers from Arab countries to come and supervise the preparation of mutton for export to their lands, but these meat supplies are not released to domestic Bulgarian Muslim consumers.

Bulgaria's Jewish minority of about 5,000 mainly middle-aged and elderly persons is free to attend worship services. Jews in Bulgaria have not suffered anti-Semitic repression. A number have traveled to Israel and have received family visitors from that country. Sofia's Sephardic Synagogue received some government funds for refurbishing as a national architectural monument, but work is at a standstill. The synagogue's prayer books are old, and no replacements are available. No kosher meat is obtainable. However, Jews are permitted to bake and distribute Passover matzoh bread without hindrance. Sofia's Jewish Cultural Center emphasizes the community's ethnic, not religious, identity. This Center publishes a secular newspaper stressing pro-Communist, anti-Zionist themes.

Roman Catholics are few in number, and divided between followers of the Latin and Uniate rites. Church sermons hew closely to topics of personal piety and avoid social and political issues. In 1985, after years of applying for residence permission, Sofia's Latin-Rite Roman Catholic priest was granted authorization to remain overnight in the capital. He had formerly been required by the militia to commute daily from his home outside the city. The church's candidate for a successor to the Bishop of Plovdiv has been rejected by the Bulgarian Government, and the see remains vacant.

No religious groups may engage in open proselytizing, and foreign missionary activity is banned in Bulgaria. Formal religious education of children is prohibited, but some youngsters do enter churches with family members for services. Several denominations have privately complained about the lack of scriptural materials.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government controls where Bulgarians live, work, and travel. All Bulgarians carry a personal identity card with them at all times stating their legal place of residence and work. Without this card, they cannot purchase domestic airline tickets, register at a hotel, or seek any kind of social service such as medical assistance. To change one's place of residence or work is a complicated process unless the change is at the Government's initiative and convenience. Moves to Sofia and other major cities from smaller settlements are especially difficult because of the official desire to control urban growth. Travel within the country by Bulgarians is generally unrestricted except in border zones. In 1985, however, roadblocks were common in regions where the Turkish minority is concentrated. Foreign travelers often were prohibited from entering these nominally open areas. Truck drivers from Turkey transiting Bulgaria to and from Central Europe were restricted to the main highway and prohibited from stopping.

Foreign travel by Bulgarian citizens is extremely restricted, except to Eastern European Communist countries. Bulgarian citizens must have a passport for foreign travel and an exit visa specifying the destination for each trip. If they go to a country not mentioned in the exit permit, they can face serious complications upon their return home. Applications for exit documents often are refused because the travel is deemed "not in the interest of the state" or "not suitable in view of the present international situation." Frequently no explanation at all is given for the refusal. Applications for purely tourist travel to the West are rarely granted, except to trusted and highly placed persons. Even then, the spouse or minor children almost always must remain in Bulgaria.

Emigration is possible under Bulgarian law, but it is rarely permitted. Despite Turkey's 1985 offer to accept ethnic Turks wishing to emigrate, Bulgarian officials warned that ethnic Turks expressing interest in doing so would be forcibly resettled elsewhere in Bulgaria. However, the Government occasionally permits members of divided families, including spouses, to join immediate relatives in the West in accordance with the Helsinki Final Act. In 1985, the authorities resolved 16 of 18 longstanding divided family cases involving American citizens or permanent residents, but new cases developed as passports for emigration were denied to other persons. The Government imposes an education fee on recent college graduates who seek to emigrate without first fulfilling a mandatory period of public service. This period was recently extended from 3 to 5 years for medical doctors. There were sporadic reports in 1985 of demands by Bulgarian authorities for hard currency payments for permission to emigrate for family reunification in the West.

The Government encourages the repatriation of ethnic Bulgarians residing abroad although the right of repatriation is not guaranteed. A number of Bulgarian-born foreign residents and citizens voluntarily return to Bulgaria each year to live in retirement. It is Bulgarian policy to return to their home countries potential refugees from other Warsaw Pact states who have tried to cross the Bulgarian border into Greece, Turkey, or Yugoslavia.

Bulgaria is governed by a small ruling elite representing the Bulgarian Communist Party. Rank-and-file party members have little, if any, political power or opportunity to change the party's policies. Nonparty members are effectively denied any role in influencing the policies of their Government or in changing its form. Political pluralism and free participation in the political process are essentially nonexistent. Domestic opposition to the State or party is dealt with promptly and severely.

Bulgaria does not have free elections. The regime tries to maintain the appearance of pluralism through the participation of the Bulgarian National Agrarian Union in the Government and the National Assembly. The Communist and Agrarian Parties, together with labor, youth, and other organizations, comprise the Fatherland Front. The Front and its constituent bodies all are ultimately controlled by the Communist Party, to which the Constitution gives clear primacy. The Agrarians run separate candidates in some districts, but they do not compete against Communist candidates or face any other opposition. They hold about one-fourth of the seats in the National Assembly, but all assembly votes are unanimous. The National Assembly, which normally meets for fewer than four brief sessions a year, has no independent role in governing. No debate of alternatives takes place in its chambers, and the Assembly has never failed to endorse regime policy.

With the exception of one representative of the U.S. Helsinki Watch Committee in October, who was not allowed to meet with Bulgarian citizens, Bulgaria has not admitted any independent group to investigate questions of human rights violations and has not responded to or communicated with any nongovernmental human rights groups. It is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission. The Government rejects all criticism of its domestic situation as intervention in internal matters, yet Bulgarian media report in detail on human rights problems in Chile, El Salvador, and South Africa. Following the 1984 arrest of human rights activists in Mikhailovgrad, no private organizations are known to have met in defense of individual liberties.

Amnesty International in its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984) expressed concern about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, allegations of ill-treatment of political prisoners, and the use of the death penalty. Freedom House rated Bulgaria "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

During the past four decades, Bulgaria, with a population of just under 9 million, has changed from an overwhelmingly agricultural country to one with a mix of industry and agriculture. Communist rulers have emphasized state ownership of nearly all means of production, rapid economic growth, central control over the economy, and industrial development. The country remains a large producer of agricultural goods, and Bulgarians may sell produce raised on their own private plots.

In 1985 daily life was disrupted by a nationwide regimen of electric power rationing that resulted from fuel shortages. In some areas, the use of water was restricted. Officially there is no unemployment, but during 1985 the Bulgarian press began openly to criticize traditional policies guaranteeing job security as a disincentive to production efficiency.

BULGARIA

Legislation considered in 1985 would provide for dismissal of enterprise managers who failed to meet their assigned goals. Although Bulgaria has poor people, there do not appear to be overwhelming disparities of poverty and wealth. Success in the party or Government results more in the acquisition of privileges than great personal fortunes.

Bulgaria has achieved success in feeding, educating, and providing for the essential needs of its citizens. A system of government facilities caters to the health needs of citizens. Life expectancy at birth in 1985 averaged 72.71 years, and the infant mortality rate was 16.20 per 1,000 live births. Medical care appears to be adequate. Bulgarian leaders have expressed concern about the country's falling population growth rate (0.3 percent) and have established financial incentives for people to marry and for families to have more children. Despite extensive construction of new public apartment buildings in the past decade, however, an urban housing shortage continues. Students are not charged tuition for education through the university level. A system of merit selection governs university admission, although certain priorities and privileges go to the children of the influential. Adult literacy is high.

Employment practices seem to be in compliance with the legal minimum working age of 16 years. The workweek is set at 42.5 hours, but participation in unpaid supplementary "brigades" can lengthen working hours on various occasions during the year. The State sets wage scales, including minimum wages, and defines minimum pensions. The Labor Code and regulations on pensions are now under review. A national labor safety program exists, but standards of enforcement vary greatly among productive enterprises.

Women are guaranteed equal rights with men, and all citizens are declared to be equal before the law, regardless of national origin, creed, social status, education, or sex. Bulgarian women do not appear to suffer overt discrimination as regards educational and professional opportunities. One-half of the openings for university students available each year are reserved by law for women, who consequently are well represented in some professions such as medicine. However, women continue to be underrepresented in policymaking jobs within the Government, and overrepresented in manual occupations in areas such as farming, light industry, and cleaning and maintenance.

CANADA

Canada is a constitutional monarchy in the British Commonwealth with a federal parliamentary form of government and strong democratic traditions. By universal suffrage, voters elect representatives in the multiparty political system at local, Provincial, and Federal levels. Government responsibilities are defined by a national Constitution subject to interpretation by an independent judiciary. Federal and Provincial election mandates last a maximum of 5 years. Elections are completely free and often result in a changeover of power to opposition parties.

National and local law enforcement are carried out by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and various Provincial and municipal police forces. Canada's armed forces are under the authority of the elected civilian government and have no role in domestic law enforcement except in extreme circumstances under the War Measures Act (last invoked in 1970 during the terrorist kidnappings in Quebec). All such forces are under the strict control of civilian governments.

Canada has an open economic system that encourages private ownership, investment, and entrepreneurship. The Federal and Provincial Governments exercise moderate controls over areas such as communications and energy in order to encourage Canadian cultural identity and ownership.

Respect for fundamental human rights in Canada is based on the well-established principle of the rule of law. It is firmly established in the Constitution and respected in numerous Federal and Provincial laws which relate to Canadian political, cultural, and social practices. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, added to Canada's revised Constitution in 1982, guarantees fundamental rights to everyone. The Parliament or Provincial legislatures may enact limited exceptions to certain Charter provisions for up to 5 years (renewable for another 5).

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There was no politically motivated killing by the Government or its domestic opposition in 1985. However, international terrorist acts did occur in Canada. In March 1985, Armenian terrorists attacked the Turkish Embassy in Ottawa, killing a Canadian security guard. Sikh terrorists are suspected of having planted bombs in June on two commercial planes departing from Canadian airports. The first plane, an Air India flight carrying over 300 (mainly Canadian) passengers and crew, crashed into the ocean near Ireland, killing all aboard. Salvagers are currently working to raise parts of the wreckage to ascertain the cause of the crash. The second incident involved a Canadian Pacific Airlines plane that left from Vancouver. A bomb planted in the plane's luggage exploded while being transferred in Japan's Narita Airport, killing two Japanese baggage handlers and wounding four others. Security officials surmise that the bomb may have been aimed at another Air India flight, due to leave from Japan. Terrorist activities in Canada in 1985 have led to better security arrangements for airports and diplomatic buildings.

b. Disappearance

Secret arrest, clandestine detention, and politically motivated disappearances have not occurred in Canada.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Legal prohibition of these abuses is carefully respected in practice. Prison conditions generally are adequate.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution, subject to override provisions, prohibits arbitrary detention and imprisonment. A person has the right to be informed promptly of reasons for his arrest or detention and to retain counsel without delay. Habeas corpus exists and is honored. Accused persons are generally released on bail pending trial. There are provisions for judicial review at specified intervals in pretrial detention cases.

Acts which may override the Constitution include the War Measures Act of 1914, augmented by a 1981 Federal Cabinet order, which permits a declaration of a state of emergency with suspension of certain basic civil liberties in the event of war or peacetime crisis. In addition, the 1939 Official Secrets Act, which prohibits the private possession, distribution, and publication of information deemed prejudicial to the interests of the state, provides that individuals under suspicion may be arrested without a warrant.

Canada prohibits the use of any form of forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In both civil and criminal matters, the presumption of innocence and the right to a public trial are fundamental features of the Canadian legal system. Defendants have the right to counsel of their choice. Persons charged with criminal offenses under Federal law may generally take advantage of Provincial legal aid programs subsidized by the Federal Government. These rights and protections are respected in practice.

The judiciary is an independent branch of government. Judges are appointed by either the Federal or Provincial Government, depending on the level and jurisdiction of the court. Secure tenure of judges and standards set by Provincial law societies contribute to judicial independence and impartiality.

The Official Secrets Act allows for trials under its provisions to be held in secret and includes presumption in favor of the state. Prosecutions under this statute are extremely rare, and convictions are hard to maintain in the appellate process.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Federal and Provincial Governments do not interfere with the basic rights of individuals except when there is a reasonable presumption that an individual is involved in criminal activity. Police officials face judicial penalties if they abuse a person's privacy (for example, through surreptitious entry or the monitoring of telephones and mail) without first obtaining a search warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to insure freedom of speech and press. The desire to protect collective as well as individual rights has led to special protection for language and cultural rights, particularly in the Province of Quebec.

The new Charter of Rights and Freedoms, although granting all Canadians freedom of thought, belief, opinion, and expression, subjects those freedoms "only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." The "reasonable limits" exception enables Federal and Provincial Governments to legislate against pornography and hate literature and allows the existence of Provincial film boards. In 1985, two persons were convicted on charges stemming from this legislation. One was sentenced to 15 months in prison on charges of knowingly spreading false news likely to cause racial hatred by distributing a pamphlet which proclaimed that the Holocaust was a hoax. The other was fined $5,000 for allegedly having willfully promoted hatred against an identifiable group by teaching his high school students that the Holocaust was a hoax and that an international Jewish conspiracy existed. Both are appealing their convictions.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Associations representing a full range of political opinion may organize and espouse their views freely.

Canadian labor unions represent 40 percent of the nonagricultural work force and enjoy wide freedom of action. Canadian law recognizes the right of labor in both the public and private sectors to organize, associate freely, bargain collectively, and strike. These rights are well established and recognized in practice, although certain groups of public sector employees have limited collective bargaining rights and only a limited right to strike. In November 1985, the Freedom of Association Committee of the International Labor Organization was to review complaints that several Provincial laws which limit the collective bargaining rights of public sector employees violate the principle of freedom of association in Canada.

c. Freedom of Religion

All faiths enjoy freedom of worship and religious expression. The Government gives no official or unofficial preference to any religion.

CANADA

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Canadian citizens and permanent residents can travel in and outside the country, leave, and reenter. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the new Constitution strengthens the right of citizens and permanent residents to establish residence in any province and to take up employment there.

Canada is a principal haven for refugees and has played a major role in focusing international attention on the causes of refugee problems. New arrivals enjoy virtually all rights and privileges of Canadians and, after a period in permanent resident status, may become citizens and thereby obtain the right to vote.

Canada is governed by Federal and Provincial Governments that are genuinely elected by the Canadian people. Overall governing authority at the Federal level is vested in the House of Commons, whose members are elected by secret ballot through universal suffrage of Canadian citizens 18 years and older, and in a Senate appointed by the Governor General, Queen Elizabeth II's representative as Head of State. In practice, power is exercised by the Prime Minister and the Cabinet, who usually are elected members of the Commons. Elections for the 282 single-member constituencies in the Commons must be held at least every 5 years, and voter participation rates are high.

Three politically diverse parties are represented in the House of Commons, and several others function at the provincial level. All Provinces and territories have similar freely elected legislatures. All Canadians have complete freedom to participate actively in the political process, and incumbent governing parties are often defeated in elections.

Canada has vigorously supported efforts to increase the authority of international bodies to investigate and deal with human rights abuses and plays a major role in the U.N. Commission on Human Rights.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission is charged with investigating and resolving complaints of discrimination in government and business activities under Federal jurisdiction and combatting discrimination through information, education, and research. Each Province maintains a similar Human Rights Commission.

In May 1985, Canada hosted the Human Rights Experts Meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. This meeting served to draw international attention to human rights problems.

Amnesty International did not mention Canada in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated Canada "free."

CANADA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Canada's population is approximately 25,399,000 and grows at an annual rate of about 1 percent. Per capita income was approximately $12,310 in 1983. Canada maintains one of the highest standards of living in the world.

Article 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which took effect in April, 1985, guarantees equal benefits and protection of the law regardless of race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all Canadians. Federal and Provincial governments administer extensive social welfare programs, including unemployment assistance, welfare aid, and a national medical and health insurance program covering all Canadians. Education is free through high school. The infant mortality rate is 8.5 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy at birth is 71.88 years for men and 78.98 for women. The federally determined poverty line for a family of three is about $11,977 in urban areas and $9,874 in rural areas. Additional government and social welfare programs are available to those with incomes below the poverty line.

Labor standards vary from province to province, but all guarantee a sufficient minimum wage (the lowest is about $2.60 per hour) and limit the standard work week to 40 or 48 hours. Federal and Provincial legislation ensure that working conditions are not hazardous for employees. Child labor legislation also differs among the provinces. The Federal Government generally prohibits those under 17 years of age from working for the Federal Government while school is in session. Provinces generally prohibit those under age 15 or 16 from working without parental consent, working in any hazardous employment, or working at night.

Generally, women participate fully in Canadian society. The enactment of Article 15 will supplement the protection of women's rights, already overseen by a Federal cabinet minister responsible for the status of women and by the Federal and Provincial human rights commissions.

The Federal Parliament passed legislation in 1985 to allow native women and their families to regain Indian tribal rights lost under old statutes when they married non-Indians. Native groups across Canada continue to hold talks with the Federal Government to determine how Indian rights can be better protected under the revised Constitution.

CYPRUS

Cyprus has been divided since the Turkish military intervention of 1974, an event which followed a coup d'etat directed from Greece. Since that time, the southern part of the country has been under the control of the Government of the Republic of Cyprus, and the northern part under an autonomous Turkish Cypriot administration supported by the presence of Turkish troops. In 1983 this administration proclaimed itself the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus," which has been recognized only by Turkey. It held a constitutional referendum and presidential and legislative elections in 1985.

The political systems of the Republic of Cyprus and the Turkish Cypriot administration are democratic and based on free elections, and they guarantee basic human rights to their populations in theory and practice.

Both Cypriot economies are founded on the free enterprise system with stress on private initiative and the right to own property, although the Turkish Cypriot economy provides a far greater role for state enterprises.

The conflict between the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities during the 1963-74 period, the Turkish intervention in 1974, and the ensuing presence of Turkish troops in the north have led to continuing charges of human rights violations. These events resulted in the uprooting of Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots from the northern and southern parts of the island respectively, and the loss of lives, homes, and livelihoods. Greek Cypriots point to these displacements, the continuing Turkish troop presence, Greek Cypriots missing as a result of the 1974 events, and Turkish Cypriot unwillingness to allow Greek Cypriot resettlement and travel in the north as the fundamental human rights questions in Cyprus today. In contrast, Turkish Cypriots assert the 1974 intervention was legal and necessary to save their community from destruction. They also raise the issue of missing persons, focusing on Turkish Cypriots who disappeared during the 1963-1974 period. The subsequent regrouping of the two communities in separate parts of the island, according to Turkish Cypriots, was necessary for their security.

In August 1984 the U.N. Secretary General launched an initiative to achieve a just and lasting resolution of the Cyprus problem. His efforts are continuing.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political killings instigated by government or opposition groups have not occurred in Cyprus since 1974. However, there was politically motivated violence on Cyprus in 1985 carried out by non-Cypriots and related to Middle Eastern conflicts. A Libyan was killed in Nicosia on April 2, three Israelis were murdered by Palestinian terrorists in Larnaca on September 25, a Syrian was killed in Limassol on September 27, and an Iraqi was killed in Nicosia on November 8. Those arrested for the Larnaca killings have been tried and convicted.

CYPRUS

b. Disappearance

Since 1974, there have been no reports of persons abducted, secretly arrested, or held in clandestine detention. However, the issue of persons missing during the 1963-74 period remains a source of dispute between the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities. A tripartite Committee on Missing Persons was established under the auspices of the U.N. Secretary General in 1981, and its investigations are continuing.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Both the Cyprus Constitution and the basic document governing the Turkish Cypriot community specifically prohibit torture. Freedom from cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice in both communities. Adequate health care is provided in prison and detention facilities, and diet is considered normal. Family members may visit those in detention. After sentencing, prisoners may be visited once a month, or more frequently where humanitarian needs exist. Attorneys may visit prisoners freely.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention is guaranteed by law and respected in practice by the Government of Cyprus and Turkish Cypriot authorities. The right of habeas corpus is observed. Preventive detention does not exist in law, nor has it been reported in practice. No one may be held for more than 3 days for investigation of a crime without referral of the case to the courts for extension of the period of detention. Most periods of investigative detention do not exceed 8 or 10 days before formal charges are filed. No instance of exile was reported. No complaints of forced or compulsory labor were reported. There are no political prisoners on Cyprus.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In both parts of Cyprus, fair public trial is guaranteed by law. The judiciary is independent of executive or military control. In September, for example, the Supreme Court of the Republic of Cyprus ruled the military courts of the Greek Cypriot National Guard unconstitutional on grounds that their judges were appointed by the Council of Ministers, not by the Supreme Council of Judges. Cases are generally tried before a judge or panel of judges, although a request for a jury trial is usually granted. There are no special courts to deal with security or political offenses. Civilians are not tried by military courts.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Both the Cyprus Constitution and the basic document governing the Turkish Cypriot community provide guarantees protecting the individual against arbitrary interference. A judicial warrant is required, for example, for a police official to enter a private residence. Abuses of privacy run counter to the democratic traditions of both communities. However, Turkish Cypriots complain that mail coming through the Republic of Cyprus postal system is often delayed, opened, or not delivered.

CYPRUS

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These rights are guaranteed by law and are widely and freely practiced. The press is free throughout the island and represents the entire political spectrum. Opposition papers frequently criticize the authorities. There is no press censorship.

The authorities control radio and television. Although opposition and minority parties complain that they do not receive sufficient attention from these media, the proliferation of party and independent newspapers in both communities enables ideas and arguments to circulate freely.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right, based on law, to associate, organize, and hold meetings is respected in practice.

Trade unions and confederations, both non-Communist and Communist, are free to organize on both sides of the line which divides the two communities. Labor authorities are required by law to mediate disputes in cases which cannot be solved through normal collective bargaining. All Cypriot workers are permitted to strike, although both the Government of Cyprus and the Turkish Cypriot authorities have the power to curtail strikes in what are deemed to be essential services. Each has used it once in 1985, in both cases in relation to striking electricity authority workers.

Unions in both parts of Cyprus freely take part in international meetings. The Government of Cyprus has taken a particularly active role in the International Labor Organization. Labor unions, more than most other organizations on Cyprus, attempt to maintain contact and cooperation across the dividing line.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is respected on Cyprus. The Greek Orthodox Church in the south has the character of a state institution. Since the law does not accord conscientious objector status to any individual or group, there have been arrests, military trials, and imprisonments of Greek Cypriot Jehovah's Witnesses for their refusal of military service. Since the Supreme Court's finding in September that the National Guard's military courts were unconstitutional, those who were convicted and imprisoned by the military courts, including some Jehovah's Witnesses, have been released. If the Government reconstitutes the military courts along the constitutional lines specified by the Supreme Court, those released could again be subject to trial and imprisonment.

Although members of the Latin, Maronite, and Armenian minorities cannot serve in the Greek Cypriot National Guard, this exemption is based on ethnic rather than religious considerations and is generally welcomed by the minorities themselves.

CYPRUS

Approximately 100 Turkish Cypriots still live in the south of the island, and they are allowed to practice their religion freely. In the north, non-Muslims include members of the Christian Maronite minority, a small number of remaining Greek Cypriots, and foreign residents--all of whom are free to practice their religion. Nevertheless, there have been complaints that the welfare of minorities in the north is impaired by Turkish Cypriot restrictions on housing, water, education, and movement. The United Nations Force in Cyprus monitors the welfare of the Greek Cypriots and Maronites in the north as well as that of the Turkish Cypriots in the south.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriots enjoy general freedom of movement within their respective areas. Turkish Cypriot authorities regulate travel into or out of the Turkish Cypriot area. They bar Greeks and Greek Cypriots from entering the north and Turkish Cypriots from visiting the south, except when traveling for humanitarian, medical, or other special reasons. The applications of Greek Cypriot residents of enclaves to visit the south are usually granted, but the applicants must return within a designated period or risk losing their right to return and their property. Foreigners coming from the south must obtain permission to enter the north. At the same time, the Government of Cyprus bars the entry into the Greek Cypriot area of foreigners who arrive at Turkish Cypriot ports. Those who enter through the south but wish to stay overnight in the north are discouraged from doing so by the Government. Special regulations apply to journalists.

The right to travel abroad and to emigrate is observed, although individuals facing military service or legal action in either part of Cyprus may not be allowed to travel. Turkish Cypriots have difficulty in traveling to some countries because their travel documents, issued by the Turkish Cypriot authorities, are not recognized. Citizens may repatriate freely.

Refugees who come to Cyprus from Eastern Europe are normally sent to third countries as soon as arrangements for their resettlement can be made.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Both the Government of Cyprus and the administration of the Turkish Cypriot community are democratically elected. In their lively multiparty political systems, parties actively and without restriction compete for popular support. Greek Cypriots and Maronites living in the north--the latter having chosen before 1960 to be regarded as members of the Greek Cypriot community--do not participate in Turkish Cypriot elections but elect their own village officials. They are eligible to vote in Greek Cypriot elections but must make their way to the south in order to exercise their right.

Women are less active in politics than men in both north and south, although this is due to custom rather than to any legal impediment. No woman in the north and only one in the south is a member of Parliament, nor are there currently any women of ministerial rank in the north. A woman serves as Attorney General in the Government of Cyprus. Two women currently serve as under secretaries in the Turkish Cypriot administration.

Cyprus participates actively in the work of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights. For several years the question of human rights in Cyprus relating to the events of 1974 has been on the Commission's agenda but has been regularly postponed by agreement of the parties directly concerned. However, the Government of Cyprus has repeatedly raised elsewhere the question of missing persons unaccounted for since 1974. Representatives of international human rights organizations have open access to both the south and the north.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International was concerned about the imprisonment of Jehovah's Witnesses for refusing on grounds of conscience to perform military service. Freedom House rated the Greek Cypriot area "free" and the Turkish Cypriot area "partly free" because of the Turkish troop presence.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The island of Cyprus had a population of 665,000 in 1985, of which about four-fifths were Greek Cypriots and about one-fifth Turkish Cypriots. Per capita gross national product in the south in 1983, according to World Bank figures, was $3,720. Per capita GNP in the north, according to most estimates, is believed to be one-third that in the south.

The relatively prospering economy in the south is based on manufacturing, trade, tourism and services, construction, and agriculture. The economy in the north, which is closely linked to that of Turkey, is heavily based on agriculture and has problems with high inflation, low investment, and significant underemployment.

Food, shelter, education, and health care are available to members of both communities regardless of race, religion, ethnic background, or political opinion. Both societies are essentially middle class, with a small but prominent wealthy segment. Housing is adequate and is available for displaced persons. Most Cypriots, both Greek and Turkish, are covered by a national health service system. Illiteracy is virtually unknown among adult persons below the age of 55.

The minimum age for the employment of children in an "industrial undertaking" is set at the age of 14. The Cyprus Constitution provides that "every person has the right to a decent existence," and there is extensive legislation guaranteeing acceptable conditions for workers with respect to minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health.

Throughout Cyprus, the legal status of women is identical to that of men. However, customs have retarded the full participation of women in all aspects of public life. Politics, for example, has traditionally been a male preserve in Cyprus. Through changing attitudes, however, women are experiencing increasing mobility.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The Czechoslovak Socialist Republic is a centralized Communist state in which the Communist Party leadership decides all important political, economic, and social questions and limits the scope of individual human rights. There has been virtually no change in the state and party leadership during the last 15 years.

Czechoslovakia has a large, well-funded security apparatus, directed by the Ministry of the Interior and the Communist Party hierarchy. It includes the uniformed police force (public security) which is similar to a Western police force, and the secret police (state security), which deals with people it judges to be past, present, or future opponents of the regime. This powerful internal security force--backed by the Czechoslovak Army and the 80,000 Soviet troops stationed in Czechoslovakia since 1968--is the main pillar of the Government's control.

The Czechoslovak centrally planned economy allows little or no private enterprise or ownership in manufacturing, retail operations, agriculture, or services. In the 17 years since the suppression of the Prague Spring, the words "economic reform" have been banished from the official lexicon. When the Communists took power in 1948, Czechoslovakia had one of the most advanced economies in Europe, one that had escaped much of the destruction of World War II. In recent years, however, the economy has stagnated, burdened by excessive central planning, obsolete equipment, and infrastructure, and by a lack of incentives for innovation and initiative.

The human rights situation in Czechoslovakia changed little in 1985. There have been no major trials of well-known figures which would attract unfavorable publicity in the West. The authorities have, however, made free use of more subtle forms of repression, including: frequent house searches, detentions, and interrogations; suspended prison sentences and "protective supervision;" intrusive surveillance and other forms of psychological pressure; discrimination in employment; and denial of education opportunities to the children of "dissidents." As in previous years, the harshest repression has been directed at religious activists and at those individuals and groups who monitor human rights abuses in Czechoslovakia.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Every year a number of Czechoslovak citizens are shot by Czechoslovak border guards while trying to cross the border without official permission. These incidents rarely come to public attention unless the victims reach the West, so it is impossible to estimate the number of fatalities that result.

There have been no reports of political killings by the police in 1985. However, one political activist has reported a "warning" by the police that he was likely to "suffer a car accident" or "fall off a bridge" if he persisted in his activities.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reports of systematic torture in Czechoslovak prisons since the early 1960's. Many former prisoners credit this to the influence of President Husak, who himself suffered long years of imprisonment and mistreatment in the 1950's. However, there have been reports of beatings, threats, and intimidation during interrogation. Reports of mistreatment have been most frequent in political cases.

Prison conditions are poor and sometimes approach a level of cruel and inhuman treatment, especially under the "third category" of imprisonment (harshes regime), which is often applied to political prisoners. In general, cells are small and unheated; family visits are strictly limited; and prisoners report that they receive such punishments as reduction in pay and limitations on free time, bathing, and exercise periods for failing to meet unrealistically high work standards. Diet and medical facilities are reliably reported to be deficient. Former prisoners have reported that prison guards sometimes encourage hardened criminals to prey on prisoners serving sentences for political offenses. Prisoners or former prisoners who complaint publicly of mistreatment have been severely punished.

In its July 1983 meeting, the World Psychiatric Association accused Czechoslovakia of misusing psychiatry for political purposes, causing Czechoslovakia to resign its membership in the organization. Several cases of misuse have been documented in recent years, most notably that of the Korineks, a Christian Adventist family which has been struggling to avoid involuntary incarceration and regain custody of their children for more than a decade. However, this appears to be an isolated instance, and the misuse of psychiatry does not appear to be a widespread practice.

Persons in Czechoslovakia are frequently arrested, detained, or subjected to searches and interrogations for expression of views contrary to those of the regime. Such actions by the police and judicial authorities are often explained in legal terms and performed with warrants, but in many instances they have been carried out without warrants. Under the law a person may be detained for up to 48 hours without being charged, although in practice this limit is often exceeded. It is normal for political activists to be detained repeatedly for 48 hours at a time and then released without being charged. Searches, detentions, and frequent interrogations are among the tactics used by the regime when it has decided to harass rather than prosecute.

According to law, a detainee may be held in investigative detention for 60 days if the authorities decide to press charges. A detainee does not have the right to visits by family members until after the trial is over. Investigative detention may be and often is extended at the request of the prosecution, and detainees are occasionally held for long periods without being brought to trial. Miklos Duray, the best known activist for the Hungarian minority in Czechoslovakia, was arrested in Bratislava on May 10, 1984 and released 12 months later without ever having been brought to trial.

People arrested for expressing views opposed by the regime are generally charged with "subversion," "incitement," "defamation of the republic," or "damaging the interests of the republic abroad." Persons who have unauthorized contacts with foreign diplomats or frequent embassy libraries have on occasion been charged with "espionage." People arrested for religious activities are usually charged with "obstructing state supervision over churches and religious societies." Many of these articles of the Criminal Code are so elastic that they could encompass almost any activity. In certain instances, the authorities have also resorted to trumped-up criminal charges (e.g., "hooliganism," or "stealing socialist property") to punish those whose real offense was to engage in unauthorized political activity.

Internal exile and house arrest have not been imposed formally in Czechoslovakia since the 1950's. In 1984, though, for the first time, the Government introduced a regime of "protective supervision" which combines features of both. Five former political prisoners are currently being subjected to this regime: Ladislav Lis, Jan Litomisky, Jiri Gruntorad, Frantisek Starek, and Ivan Jirous. Protective supervision includes travel restrictions; curfews; frequent searches of their persons, homes, and guests; and the obligation to report to the police on a regular basis. Ladislav Lis, for example, has been obliged to report to the police 10 times a week; has been subjected to lengthy house searches 3 to 5 times a week; and has had many of his visitors detained, taken away for questioning, and otherwise harassed. The imposition of such a regime, intended for habitual violent offenders, against persons who have never committed or advocated an act of violence is clearly aimed at isolating them from contact with the outside world.

The Government has also used forced exile to rid itself of critics. In some cases people who had been working or visiting abroad with official permission were stripped of citizenship and refused the right to return.

Forced exile is often aimed against people who have already served a jail sentence. Upon their release, or while still in prison, they are pressured to emigrate. If they refuse, they and their families are harassed, denied jobs and schooling, and threatened with rearrest. Frequently, after a year or more of this treatment, these ex-prisoners apply to emigrate.

Forced labor is not practiced in Czechoslovakia, but "work education" is required of prisoners. Former prisoners report that convicts face higher norms, lower pay, and poorer working conditions than normal workers.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

According to Czechoslovak law, people charged with criminal offenses are entitled to a fair and open public trial. The law provides that the accused has a right to be informed of the charges against him, to have counsel, and to present a defense. However, the practice is quite different, especially where political offenses are concerned.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

For the most part, friends of the defendant, representatives of the press, and diplomats are barred from attending trials with political content, and the courtroom is filled with "representatives of the public," who work for the security forces.

Defendants are allowed to choose their lawyers, and court-appointed lawyers are provided if necessary. However, lawyers, like judges, are subject to direct and indirect pressure from the political authorities and do not always vigorously represent their clients. Defense attorneys who have defended their clients with vigor have in some cases been disbarred and occasionally prosecuted. Defendants do exercise their right to defend themselves in court and occasionally have the charges dismissed or reduced at the original trial or appeal. But an appeal may also result in an increase in the sentence or in additional charges.

The judiciary is not independent of the Government and Communist Party. In theory, judges can be removed only by the Federal Assembly (Parliament) or by the Czech or Slovak National Council. In practice, they are subject to direct control and supervision by the Communist Party, to which most judges and lawyers must belong.

The number of political prisoners in Czechoslovakia is difficult to estimate. The Czechoslovak Government does not recognize political prisoners as a separate category, and does not release figures on its prison population. The only figures available are from VONS, the Committee in the Defense of the Unjustly Persecuted, which to the best of its ability documents individual cases. Fewer than a dozen of the cases that VONS has been following since 1978 are currently in prison. However, VONS does not document certain categories of political prisoners, such as those sentenced for attempts to leave Czechoslovakia without official permission. The number of such prisoners--most of whom serve terms of 1 to 2 years--has been variously estimated between 300 and 1,000.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government believes it has the right to monitor and control the leisure-time activities of its citizens. As such, it also asserts the right to interfere with privacy of communications.

Those who are considered opponents of the regime bear the brunt of heavily intrusive surveillance. They, their families, and friends are routinely subjected to such measures as electronic surveillance, tapping of telephones, and interceptions and destruction of mail. Discrimination in education and employment is regularly practiced against the families of dissidents and religious activists. Fear that their children will be denied higher education is a major factor in preventing even more open dissent among intellectuals and white-collar workers.

A special problem exists for religious believers who wish to raise their children in their faith. Organization of religious instruction or ceremonies in private homes is forbidden. Parents must seek the permission of local authorities for their children to receive religious education at school. Such requests are discouraged by school authorities who warn parents that participation in religious classes could be damaging to a child's future education and career prospects.

Contacts with individuals and receipt of information from the West are discouraged. Czechoslovaks in many professions are required to file a report each time they have a conversation with a Westerner. Broadcasts of Radio Free Europe in Czech and Slovak are jammed in Prague and other major cities, although they can often be heard in rural areas. Other Western radio broadcasts are not jammed. Many people who live near the country's western or southern borders can receive West German or Austrian television broadcasts.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, it also states that they must be exercised "in accordance with the interests of the working class." In effect, individuals may not voice opinions publicly that differ from party policy or question the legitimacy of party rule, the fundamental principles of the "Socialist" state, or the regime's relationship with the Soviet Union. Likewise, academic freedom is severely limited by political directives.

In order to publish, writers must belong to the state-controlled Union of Writers. All newspapers and magazines are published by political parties or mass organizations (e.g., The Youth League, Revolutionary Trade Union Movement, or Sports Federation) which are controlled by the Communist Party. Legal religious literature and periodicals come under strict censorship and are published in limited editions. Publishing houses and the news media, all state-owned, are self-censored under Communist Party guidelines. In cases where insufficient care is exercised, fines are imposed, or editors may be fired.

Only a limited number of Western non-Communist periodicals are allowed into the country, and they are beyond the reach of ordinary citizens. Since the early 1970's, libraries have restricted access to Western publications of a political character to those individuals who have obtained special permission from their employers, documenting their need for the material for official purposes. Periodicals such as Time and Newsweek are locked in cabinets controlled by special personnel. Books and periodicals published during the 1968-69 period or other publications considered ideologically "harmful" are subject to similar controls.

Printing and photocopying equipment, except typewriters, are controlled by the Ministry of Interior and cannot be legally obtained by individuals. Despite these restrictions, a lively underground "samizdat" (self-published) press publishes a variety of fiction and nonfiction, usually in very small editions. Some of it is sent abroad where it is reprinted in emigre publishing houses and then brought back to Czechoslovakia in larger editions. Those arrested for literary activities in 1985 include Lenka Mareckova, who was sentenced after reading her poetry at a literary evening to a 6-month prison term for "incitement;" Petr Kozanek and Zdenek Kotrly, who were given suspended sentences for trying to take some of Mrs. Kotrly's writings to Austria; and a group of five Catholics in Prague who were believed to have organized an underground printing press for religious materials.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although freedom of assembly is protected in theory by the Constitution, it does not exist in practice. Public meetings may be held only with permission of the police, and this permission is given only when the meeting supports state objectives. When the authorities wish to have a large rally (May Day or "peace" demonstrations), people are often pressured to attend.

Lectures and film showings in private homes may also be subject to dispersal, if the authorities object to their contents or to the participants. In March 1985, 48 people were taken to a police station from a private home where they had gathered to watch some historical films. Most were released after a few hours, but several were detained for 48 hours without charges. Similar disruptions have plagued philosophical seminars organized by Dr. Ladislav Hejdanek, a Charter 77 signatory and former professor of philosophy. Despite the harassment, the seminar series has survived since the late 1970's.

Independent associations are not permitted in Czechoslovakia. All labor unions, professional associations, and even amateur groups are controlled by the Communist Party and subordinated to it. The Government's unwillingness to tolerate independent initiatives by these organizations is evident from its treatment of the Jazz Section of the Musicians Union, a legally constituted association of 6,000 jazz fans throughout Czechoslovakia, which organized jazz festivals and sponsored publications on music and the arts for its members. In March 1985 the Jazz Section was dissolved under a 1968 statute banning "counterrevolutionary activity." Leaders of the section protested and addressed a series of letters and petitions to the authorities. The result was surveillance, interrogations, loss of their jobs, and other forms of harassment. In September the Jazz Section's offices and leaders' apartments were raided by the police, and the section's financial and legal records and membership lists were confiscated. Despite official pressure, the Jazz Section, has thus far, refused to acquiesce in its dissolution. Petr Cibulka, a Jazz Section member and Charter 77 activist, was sentenced on September 27 to 7 months in prison for "insulting the nation" during an alleged incident in a restaurant.

Czechoslovak workers do not have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. An attempt to establish an independent trade union in the early 1980's was suppressed. Membership in the official trade unions or professional associations is virtually obligatory for workers and those seeking to practice a profession. Communist Party membership is an unwritten, but commonly acknowledged, prerequisite for nearly all higher-level jobs.

The Czechoslovak union organization, the "Revolutionary Workers' Movement" (ROH), is a mass organization strictly controlled by the Communist Party. Strikes, independent organizing efforts, and collective bargaining are not permitted under the Czechoslovak system. The ROH is affiliated with the World Federation of Trade Unions whose headquarters are in Prague.

The Constitution guarantees the right and duty to work. In practice, individuals who are considered politically unreliable are barred from professional positions and forced into menial, low-paid jobs such as coal stokers and nightwatchmen. This practice has been condemned by the International Labor Organization.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution but strictly limited in practice. "Scientific atheism" is the official ideology, and the Government actively discourages religious activity, especially among the young. Teachers, policemen, Communist Party officials, and certain other professionals encounter problems in their careers if they are seen in church. Higher education is often denied to active believers and their children.

A church must be officially registered in order to function legally in Czechoslovakia. Proselytizing groups, such as Jehovah's Witnesses and Mormons, are banned outright, and their members suffer frequent harassment and arrest. Jehovah's Witnesses have been reported in several prisons, but there are no reliable estimates of their number.

Organized religious practice is hampered by both written and unwritten restrictions. Clergymen are paid by the State and must receive a state license in order to practice. Such licenses can be--and are--withdrawn without explanation. Estimates of the number of clergymen who have lost their licenses vary, but they are known to include several bishops. Those who continue to practice despite revocation of their licenses are liable to criminal prosecution.

The Roman Catholic Church is the largest of Czechoslovakia's 18 officially registered religious bodies. There are estimated to be 8 to 11 million Roman Catholics in Czechoslovakia, and up to 450,000 members of the affiliated Greek Catholic (Uniate) Church. The Greek Catholic Church was reestablished in 1968 after having been forcibly united with the much smaller Orthodox Church in 1950. However, the Greek Catholics have been unable to reclaim their property which remains in the possession of the Orthodox Church.

Students in Czechoslovakia's two remaining Catholic seminaries (out of a prewar total of 13) need state approval to be admitted and ordained. In addition, the State must approve each priest's assignment to a parish or higher office. As a result of these restrictions, many priests have to cover more than one parish, and only 3 of 13 dioceses have resident bishops.

In 1950 all male religious orders were dissolved. A few female religious orders were allowed to continue functioning, but they were prevented from accepting new members, except during a brief interlude in 1968. Despite these limitations, some Catholic monastic orders have continued to operate clandestinely. In November 1984 seven Catholics were detained and interrogated on suspicion of being affiliated with the Franciscan order. All were released without trial within 2 months, but charges remain pending against them.

"Pacem in Terris," the state-sponsored "peace association" of clergy, has been a major instrument of state control over the Catholic Church since it was founded in 1970. The association has been losing ground since 1982 when the Vatican banned clergy participation in political organizations worldwide. Although Cardinal Tomasek and the overwhelming majority of the clergy in Czechoslovakia have disassociated themselves from "Pacem in Terris," priests associated with the organization have retained control of Katolicke Noviny (Catholic News), the only legally published Catholic newspaper.

The year 1985 witnessed the largest religious gathering in Czechoslovakia's postwar history, when 150,000 Czech and Slovak Catholics gathered in a small Moravian village to celebrate the 1100th anniversary of the death of St. Methodius. Although the authorities did not prevent people from gathering at Velehrad, they refused to allow the Pope and Catholic leaders from Western European countries to attend the ceremonies. The crowds in attendance made their views on government religious policies clear by booing the Czech Minister of Culture and chanting slogans for religious freedom, a papal visit, more priests and bishops, and an end to "Pacem in Terris."

The printing of religious literature is severely restricted, and Bibles are in short supply. There has been some progress in this area of late: the Czech Ecumenical Council of Churches reportedly imported 122,000 Czech Bibles and New Testaments in 1984-85, and the Appeal of Conscience Foundation provided Jewish communities 2,000 copies of the Pentateuch in 1985. Still, the demand for religious literature exceeds the supply, and Bibles are smuggled in from abroad and produced by underground "samizdat" (self-published) methods.

Protestant denominations registered by the Government operate under similar constraints as the Catholic Church. Proselytizing is forbidden; religious education is strictly regulated and may not be organized in private homes; religious ceremonies are restricted for the most part to church premises, and education of clergymen is closely controlled. Clergymen who are popular with young people or associated with Charter 77 soon find themselves barred from preaching.

The Jewish community of several thousand has a central religious organization, financially supported and controlled by the Government. There are synagogues and prayer houses open for worship and two rabbis, one in Prague and one in Kosice. In Prague, there is a Jewish Museum operated by the State. There are no Jewish schools or rabbinical seminaries.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

For most Czechoslovaks freedom of movement within the country is not restricted, except near military installations and the borders with Austria and the Federal Republic of Germany. However, the Government has increasingly restricted the movements of Charter 77 activists and other "suspect" persons by preventing them from leaving their homes or meeting with foreigners. Leading Prague-based dissidents were kept under virtual house arrest for several days or weeks during the spring and summer of 1985, when Western dignitaries were visiting Prague, in an effort to prevent them from meeting with delegation members and the accompanying press. Likewise, several religious activists were picked up by the police and driven back to Prague each time they went to visit friends or colleagues outside the city.

Travel to Western countries is difficult since travelers must obtain permission and, unless visiting close relatives, a hard currency authorization. The number of such authorizations issued each year is far below the demand. Travelers to the West must usually leave some member of the immediate family at home to ensure their return. These restrictions are often relaxed for retired persons.

Travel by citizens of Czechoslovakia to other East European countries has become more difficult in recent years. A special passport is now required for trips to Yugoslavia, and travel to Poland has been restricted since 1981. Travel to Hungary has been made more difficult by limiting the amount of currency which may be exchanged and the number of trips which may be made in 1 year. Citizens deemed politically "unreliable" may find that they are denied permission to travel to either Eastern or Western Europe.

The right to emigrate is extremely limited. It is generally enjoyed only by those wishing to join a foreign citizen spouse, or, in the case of retired persons, foreign citizen children abroad. Those caught while seeking to leave Czechoslovakia without official permission are usually sentenced to 1 or 2 years in prison. The number of such prisoners has been variously estimated between 300 and 1,000.

Czechoslovakia occasionally denies the right of repatriation by stripping the citizenship of those citizens it wishes to keep out. Emigration passports are not valid for return without special endorsement, and in some cases permanent exile is a condition for emigration or study abroad. Many former Czechoslovak citizens who wish to visit their former homeland are denied visas.

There is a moderate outflow of refugees from Czechoslovakia, primarily persons who leave the country legally on vacation to non-Warsaw Pact countries and do not return. This may amount to about 10,000 people annually, but precise statistics are unavailable.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

All significant decisions regarding the Government, the economy, and society are made exclusively by the leadership of the Communist Party. Through its apparatus, the party leadership determines who will be placed in decisionmaking positions not only within its own ranks but also throughout the structures of state authority, the economy, the media, and mass organizations. Real power is enjoyed by only a few top-level officials in the party Presidium and Secretariat.

Ordinary citizens, especially those who are not party members, have no role in selecting their leaders or in making important political or economic decisions. Four minor political parties are permitted to organize and publish their own newspapers but must conform their activities to Communist Party directives. All parties and mass organizations are represented in the National Front which is completely controlled by the Communist Party. Among its tasks is the nomination of a single slate of candidates to stand unopposed at all elections.

The Czechoslovak Government reacts negatively to expressions of concern about human rights violations in Czechoslovakia either by other governments or by nongovernmental institutions. It has delayed or denied visas to members of international human rights organizations such as the Helsinki Watch Committee and Amnesty International.

Two groups within Czechoslovakia concern themselves with human rights. One is Charter 77, a group of individuals who signed a document first issued in January 1977 calling on the Government to honor its commitment to international arrangements on human rights, including the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, as well as human rights guarantees in the Czechoslovak Constitution. The second group, the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Persecuted (known by its Czech initials VONS), uses public records and reports from friends and relatives of the accused to issue communiques in cases where it believes the police, the courts, or the prisons have abused citizens' human rights. These communiques are distributed to the Czechoslovak authorities. Members of both of these groups, are targets of harassment by the regime.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), was concerned about the continued detention of prisoners of conscience and the application of the Law on Protective Surveillance to some prisoners of conscience who had been released. It also noted that many people were sentenced to short prison terms and harassed in various ways for exercising their human rights. Freedom House rated Czechoslovakia "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Czechoslovakia is a highly industrialized country of approximately 15.5 million inhabitants. It has had a rising standard of living since the end of World War II, but recent figures show a slowing down in the rate of growth. The stable, largely urbanized population enjoys an adequate material existence.

The basic needs of food and health care are met. Food supplies are adequate and the average daily caloric intake in 1984 was 3,100 calories. Health care is universally available through a national system administered and financed by the Government and paid for in part by employee deductions. There are reports, however, that prompt treatment is only secured through payment of bribes, and many standard drugs are available only if paid for in hard currency. In 1984 average life expectancy at birth was 66.7 years for men, and 74.0 for women. The infant mortality rate was 14.9 per 1,000 live births.

The retirement age is 57 years for women and 60 years for men. The average pension is 55 percent of the average wage, and many retirees supplement their pension payments by working.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Education is compulsory to 16 years of age. Literacy is nearly universal. Secondary and university education are free of charge, and opportunities exist for evening study at the advanced secondary and technical levels. However, the selection of students for courses and schools, particularly those leading to more desirable careers, is reportedly based on their parents' political standing and reliability. Official policies also deliberately favor children from workers' families in the admissions process. There has been criticism of the insertion of political criteria in admission to higher education.

The minimum age for full-time employment is 16, although part-time employment is permitted at an earlier age. The average workweek is 42.5 hours. Beyond 46 hours workers are paid overtime, and there are additional bonuses for some shift and weekend work. There is a labor shortage, especially for unskilled and semiskilled labor, which is filled in part by workers from other Communist countries. Working conditions appear generally adequate, although less attention is paid to occupational safety and pollution than in the West. When problems do arise, the workers have little recourse, since strikes and independent labor organizations are prohibited, and the major preoccupation of the state-controlled labor union is to ensure that production plans are fulfilled.

Women form 46.5 percent of the work force, but they tend to be concentrated in lower-paying, less skilled jobs. They do, however, receive equal pay to their male colleagues if they hold the same job. There are inconsistencies in the responsibilities women are asked to assume: they are encouraged to join the work force, but they are also offered incentives to have children. According to Czechoslovak figures, the population growth rate was 0.3 percent in 1984.

Women are equal under the law, and there are small numbers of women in the professions and in higher ranking party, government, and managerial positions. There is only one woman in the party Secretariat, and she holds her position by virtue of being Chairman of the Women's League. There are no female ministers or ambassadors.

Czechoslovakia has two major nationalities--Czechs and Slovaks--and two substantial minorities--Hungarians and Gypsies. Interethnic relations are still colored by historic animosities, but the Czechoslovak system provides certain guarantees for minorities.

Hungarians who are concentrated in southern Slovakia form the country's largest minority (555,000 according to official statistics). They are proportionately represented in federal and local legislative bodies but are underrepresented in high-level jobs in industry, government, and the party apparatus. The State provides some primary and secondary education in Hungarian and permits a limited number of ethnic Hungarians to pursue higher education in Hungary. Ethnic Hungarians complain, however, that Hungarian-language instruction at the elementary and secondary levels is being reduced, and that the lack of opportunities for higher education in Hungarian is creating a growing shortage of qualified Hungarian-language teachers. Miklos Duray, a leading Hungarian minority activist, spent a year in prison without trial for addressing these issues in open letters to Czechoslovak officials. He was amnestied in May 1985 and has reportedly been permitted to return to his job as a geologist in Bratislava.

The Gypsies, who number about 250,000, are the only other sizable minority in Czechoslovakia. As elsewhere in Europe, they tend to suffer disproportionately high rates of poverty, crime, and disease. However, their problems appear to result more from traditions and popular prejudice than from government policies.

Approximatley 30,000 Vietnamese laborers are temporarily residing in Czechoslovakia. Reportedly, they are allowed to retain two-thirds of their salary. The remainder is shared by the Czechoslovak and Vietnamese Governments.

DENMARK

Denmark is a constitutional monarchy with a strongly established tradition of democratic parliamentary rule. The reigning monarch is Queen Margrethe II. A Cabinet headed by the Prime Minister and accountable to the unicameral Parliament (Folketing) has responsibility for government decisions. The 179 members of the Folketing are elected in free and open elections under a complex system of proportional representation designed to protect the rights of minority parties and to reflect the popular vote. Since late 1982, Denmark has been governed by a four-party minority coalition led by Prime Minister Schlueter's Conservative Party, which is dependent on support from other parties to maintain a parliamentary majority.

Human rights are highly respected and well protected in Denmark, both in principle and in practice. The Constitution establishes the Folketing's "Ombudsman," to whom any citizen may protest if he or she feels wrongly or unreasonably treated by any Danish national or municipal authority. At the global level, Denmark participates actively in a number of international commissions concerned with the protection and preservation of human rights.

Denmark has displayed high concern for the rights of minorities, particularly the indigenous populations of territories such as Greenland and the Faroe Islands, which now enjoy broad powers of home rule.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Danish authorities do not engage in political killings.

b. Disappearance

Abductions, secret arrests, and clandestine detentions are prohibited by statutes which are respected in practice.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Protection against torture and inhuman treatment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. A rehabilitation and research center for torture victims established in 1983 in Copenhagen treats patients in the refugee community. An estimated 150 foreign torture victims obtain asylum yearly.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No person in Denmark can be deprived of personal liberty without due process of law. Arrested individuals must be taken before a judge within 24 hours of detention. The judge has the authority to determine whether the person should be detained in pretrial custody or released pending trial. The Constitution makes provision for bail. Arrested individuals have access to legal counsel of their choice or court-appointed attorneys. Non-Danish speakers are provided with interpreters at government expense. The occasional use of isolation during the pretrial custody period has been criticized in the media, but police authorities maintain that isolation is necessary to protect the investigation. The system continues to be used, though only in the most serious crimes such as narcotics violations. Forced or compulsory labor is prohibited.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials are fair and public. The trial judge may order exceptions to this principle but only within narrowly drawn parameters, such as paternity and divorce trials. In criminal cases, trials are only closed when it is necessary to protect the privacy of the victim, such as in rape or child molestation cases, or when it is deemed necessary to protect the identity of a witness. Danish courts make extensive efforts to obtain the facts of a case, and the rights of the accused are carefully protected. All indigent defendants have the right to a court-appointed attorney at government expense. The defendant is free to change the court-appointed attorney.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the Danish Constitution, searches of the home, seizure and examination of papers, and breaches of the secrecy of communications are prohibited in the absence of a judicial order, unless a particular exception is provided for by statute. These provisions are respected in practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Denmark has a free and open society. An individual may express an opinion in written or oral form on any matter, subject only to the condition that the person can be held responsible in a court of law. Media representatives and private individuals make full use of the freedom of expression. Criticism of the Government or government policy is not a punishable offense, and censorship is not utilized.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Danish residents are free to assemble and form associations for any lawful purpose. Police are entitled to be present at public meetings or demonstrations which could constitute a danger to the public peace.

Approximately 85 percent of Danish wage earners are members of trade unions. Under the General Agreement of 1960, workers and employers acknowledged each other's right to organize. Labor agreements and legislation protect the rights of workers and employers and regulate the work environment.

c. Freedom of Religion

Under the Constitution, the Evangelical Lutheran Church is recognized as the established church of Denmark. However, religious freedom is guaranteed to all residents of Denmark. No one may be discriminated against because of religious beliefs. These laws are strictly enforced in practice.

DENMARK

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Danes have complete freedom to travel and to reenter Denmark. Denmark is a homogeneous ethnocentric society with historically only a small number of non-northern European residents who have been accorded a high level of acceptance. Refugees and asylum seekers are provided with travel documents, when needed, which permit return to Denmark. Forced repatriation is not utilized. The new Alien Act of 1983 spells out in detail the rights of aliens in Denmark and provides for appeal procedures when residence permission is denied. Measures designed to protect the rights of potential refugees or asylum seekers include the establishment of a refugee board with authority to reverse decisions of the Alien Directorate and guaranteed access to legal counsel and interpreter service.

Since 1983 there has been a massive influx of refugees. From January 1984 to May 1985, 5,000 people have asked for political asylum, 3,500 of them from Iran. This large number of ethnically dissimilar people who require shelter, education, and public assistance has generated additional pressure on the Danish welfare system. The average Dane's tolerance does not extend to what he perceives as a threat to the Danish way of life, and the Queen's New Year's plea for greater kindness to foreigners was subject to unusual criticism. Tension in this area escalated to several violent demonstrations by Danes at Iranian refugee centers. Many Danes were shocked by these xenophobic outbursts. The vast majority of Danish political leaders continue to emphasize the need for Danish tolerance and magnanimity toward the recent arrivals and have begun what they realize is an educational process for Danish society, now more exposed to the outside world than ever before.

Denmark is governed by a Cabinet responsible to the Folketing (Parliament). The Prime Minister is appointed by the Queen after consultation with the political parties represented in the Folketing. The present Government, formed in September 1982, is composed of four parties under the leadership of the Conservatives. Members of the Folketing are selected in open elections in which every Danish citizen 18 years or over may participate. A political party must obtain at least 2 percent of the total vote to obtain representation in the Folketing. Nine political parties with a variety of political beliefs are represented in the current Parliament. The Constitution states that parliamentary elections must be held at least every 4 years. The Government can be changed by calling new elections or, as happened in 1982, by the resignation of the government in power and the formation of a new government composed of parties already represented in the Folketing.

All Danish citizens and subjects are guaranteed equal protection under the law. The territories of Greenland and the Faroe Islands have home rule governments with broad powers encompassing all but foreign and security affairs. Native Greenlanders enjoy all the rights and privileges of other Danish citizens. In addition, Greenland's representation in the national Parliament is disproportionately large, and the island has a special criminal code designed for local customs and conditions. Native Greenlanders freely participate in international ethnic organizations such as the Inuit Circumpolar Conference, based in Greenland, which was recently recognized by the United Nations. Despite periodic disagreements between home rule authorities and the Government, there have been no accusations of human rights violations made against the Government before any international organization.

Denmark is a party to various international human rights conventions designed to promote and protect human rights. The Government's commitment to human rights issues is fully supported by the Danish population. Amnesty International does not mention Denmark in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated Denmark as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Denmark has a population of 5,100,000. Per capita gross national product in 1983 was approximately $9,720.

Over 50 percent of the national budget is devoted to welfare, housing, labor, and education. Austerity measures introduced by the present Government have reduced social benefits modestly. However, this step has not materially altered the extensive welfare protection provided to Danish subjects. Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion.

At birth, Danish men can expect to live to 71.5 years of age, and Danish women to 77.5 years of age. The infant mortality rate is 8.85 for males and 6.57 for females per 1,000 live births. All school-aged children have access to free public education, and the nation is 99 percent literate.

The minimum age for the employment of children is 15, and specific limitations described in detail in the Working Environment Act of 1975 apply to the type of work which may be performed by those between 15 and 18 years of age. This Act also describes acceptable conditions of work, including safety and health; the general duties of employers, supervisors, employees, and suppliers; the performance of work; rest periods and rest days; and medical examinations. The Act also establishes a Labor Inspections Service.

The Equal Rights Council has worked successfully to eliminate laws and regulations which contained sex discrimination provisions. Women hold positions of authority at all levels of society and actively participate at all levels of the political process. They hold positions of authority in political parties, local governments, and in the national Government. Women head five cabinet ministries (Labor, Interior, Culture, Social Affairs, and Ecclesiastical Affairs) and hold about 26 percent of the seats in the Parliament.

The living standards and educational levels of native Greenlanders (Eskimos) are lower than those of other Danish citizens, but they are improving steadily, in part because of heavy spending on housing, health, and education programs by the Government.

ESTONIA*

An independent Baltic state between the two World Wars, Estonia was annexed by the Soviet Union in 1940 as a constituent republic of the U.S.S.R. The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Estonia into the U.S.S.R.

Like the other Baltic states, Estonia is subjected to the same centralized rule, the same Constitution and system of justice, the same restrictions on civil and political liberties, and the same police controls as the republics of the Soviet State. In addition, Soviet policy toward the Estonian nation arouses fear of Russification and of the destruction of Estonian values. Because of a low birthrate and the influx of Slavic settlers in recent years, Estonians now make up only 63 percent of the total population as compared to 92 percent in 1939.

The standard of living in Estonia is higher than the Soviet average. In recent years, however, a decline in food supplies and in some consumer goods has caused popular discontent. The manner of Soviet exploitation of Estonian natural resources has also been criticized.

Serious human rights violations continued in Estonia in 1985. Any manifestation of national rights is harshly repressed by Soviet authorities. Attempts to keep religious faith alive are countered by Soviet harassment of religious leaders. Estonians involved in human rights issues have also been severely punished with prison sentences.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Although Estonian activists have on occasion died in Soviet custody, it is difficult to establish official responsibility for the deaths of persons involved in political dissent. Soviet persecution of those attempting to defend Estonian national rights, however, may lead to their deaths. Activist Johannes Hint died in Soviet custody in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There are no known instances of permanent or prolonged disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In Estonia, as throughout the Soviet system, cruel and inhuman treatment of political prisoners occurs during both interrogation and confinement in labor camp, prison, or psychiatric hospital. Physical and psychological abuse of prisoners is common, as is detention under extremely unhealthy or otherwise onerous conditions.

* Given Soviet control over all aspects of life in Estonia, the systemic human rights abuses described in the report on the U.S.S.R. apply also to Estonia. This report discusses only instances of repression specific to Estonia.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Soviet laws are written and interpreted in so broad a manner that persons may be arrested and sentenced for exercising basic human rights.

On July 19 Estonian human rights activist Robert Vaitmaa was sentenced to 3 years in labor camp on a charge of "resisting the authorities." Vaitmaa had been arrested on May 7 after being forcibly removed from a plane while on his way to visit exiled Estonian activist Tiit Madison.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Despite guarantees of judicial objectivity in both the Estonian and Soviet Constitutions, the State completely controls the judicial process and, in political cases, arbitrarily decides the outcome of all trials to suit its requirements. No rights of a defendant override the self-determined compelling needs of the State.

Lutheran pastor Harri Motsnik was arrested on April 13 following a search of his home and charged with "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." Although reportedly convicted, the exact results of his trial, scheduled for August, had not reached the West by year's end.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government interference in personal life is pervasive through its use of informers, mail censorship, electronic monitoring of telephones, and other devices. Contacts between Estonians and visitors from foreign countries are strongly discouraged, and those who indulge in such contacts are subject to harassment by the authorities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for most internationally accepted political liberties provided that their exercise accords with the strengthening and security of the Socialist system. In practice, the authorities do not tolerate dissident behavior. All legal means of publication are under the complete control of the party and the State. Because of their proximity to Finland, however, Estonians have access to Finnish television and radio broadcasts.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides for the right to associate in public organizations, but the authorities subject all associations and organizations to their strict control.

Beginning in April 1985, a number of prominent Estonian intellectuals were called in for questioning by the security police (KGB). They included Vardo Rumessen, a pianist and musicologist; Arvo Vallikivi, a writer; Rein Einasto, a scientist at the Estonian Academy of Sciences Institute of Geology; Rein Ruutsoo, a philosopher; Haljand Udam, a Persian scholar; and several others. Questioning centered on contacts with former Estonian prisoner of conscience Mati Kiirend, musicologist Helju Tauk, and others.

ESTONIA

Soviet labor law and practice is enforced in Estonia. Although the Constitution guarantees all Soviet citizens the right to form trade unions, any efforts by workers to exercise this right independently of state-sponsored and controlled unions have been brutally repressed. Given Soviet concern that the ideas of the Polish Solidarity trade union movement might spread, this has been especially true in the Baltic states. In Estonia, the party leadership has denounced local efforts to call strikes at state enterprises.

c. Freedom of Religion

In spite of constitutional guarantees of the right to profess or not to profess any religion, religious believers are subject to many restrictions. As part of a Soviet program to reduce the authority and activities of the Lutheran Church, many Lutheran pastors have been called in for questioning in recent years, and the professional licenses of several have been revoked.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is neither guaranteed by law nor respected in practice. The right to leave one's country and return is also not recognized. Worker Enn Veerpalu was reportedly convicted in 1985 for "illegally attempting to leave the Soviet Union."

Soviet authorities in Estonia do not respect the right of emigration. Two Estonian families remain on the U.S. Government Representation List of Divided Families who have been refused permission to join relatives in the United States. Many Estonian Jews have also been repeatedly denied permission to emigrate. One well-known case of Soviet denial of this basic human right concerns two-year-old Kaisa Randpere, daughter of former Estonian Justice Ministry official Valdo Randpere. Randpere and his wife, singer Leila Miller, defected to Sweden in 1984. Soviet authorities have refused to allow Kaisa to join her parents, reportedly informing them "you will never see her again."

Soviet authorities attempt strictly to forbid political activity outside the framework of the Communist Party. In Estonia, ethnic Estonians comprise only 52 percent of the membership as compared to their 63 percent share of the total population.

The Soviet Government rejects any foreign criticism of its human rights record, maintaining that all internationally recognized human rights are fully protected. Its attitude toward investigation of the human rights situation in Estonia is uncompromisingly negative.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

By Soviet standards, Estonia's 1.5 million population enjoys a high standard of living and an advanced industry. In recent years, however, a decline in food supplies and a reduction in some consumer goods have caused discontent. Soviet statistics reveal a poor economic performance by Estonia during the first 6 months of 1985. According to these statistics, Estonia posted industrial growth of only 1.9 percent, well below the 1984 growth rate of 4.5 percent, and an increase in labor productivity of only 2.4 percent, again below the 1984 rate of 4.2 percent. Economic performance in 1985 was subpar even relative to the other Baltic republics and the Soviet Union as a whole.

The exploitation of Estonia's oil shale under central Soviet control has provoked sharp criticism in Estonia. Used for thermal energy production and for the chemical industry, the deposits have been exploited at an accelerating rate, although only about a third of the electrical energy produced from this source can be used in Estonia. In addition to the rapid depletion of a national resource, the enormous amount of pollution and environmental damage caused by shale exploitation has aroused concern.

Estonian-Russian tensions are always close to the surface in Estonia; they appear to be increasing as the proportion of the Russian-speaking population grows. One manifestation of this is the reluctance of Estonians to learn or use the Russian language. In 1979, only 24 percent of Estonians said they spoke Russian well, a decline of 5 percent from 1970. Estonians are under strong pressure to pursue Russian-language programs. At the university level, particularly in the sciences, courses are often taught in Russian, even when Estonians make up the majority of a class. The nationalist demonstrations by thousands of Estonian high school students in October 1980, ruthlessly suppressed by the security forces, have not been forgotten.

FINLAND

Finland is a constitutional republic, a democratic state built upon the principle of the rule of law. Sovereign power in Finland rests with the people as represented by their delegates assembled in Parliament. Legislative power is exercised by Parliament. Supreme executive power is vested in the President. A Cabinet, consisting of a Prime Minister and 16 ministers and responsible to Parliament, works with the President in governing the country. Judicial power is exercised by an independent judiciary headed by the Supreme Court and Supreme Administrative Court. The Finnish people freely choose by direct election a 200-member unicameral Parliament every 4 years. They also choose electors every 6 years who in turn elect the President. At present, there are nine political parties represented in the Parliament, four of which form a center-left coalition government.

The police and security forces are controlled by elected officials and supervised by the courts.

Finland has a mixed economy with state-owned, privately owned, and publicly owned companies. Citizens are free to pursue their legitimate private interests, hold private property, and engage in economic activity without government interference. Aliens in most cases may own real property only with the Government's permission and are prohibited from engaging in political activity.

During 1985, there were no reported violations in Finland of fundamental human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for political motives by the Government or opposition political organizations does not occur.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of disappearances, abduction, or clandestine detention by official or opposition forces in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. By law, prisoners must be treated with respect for their human dignity and without distinction made on the basis of race, color, sex, language, nationality, religious or political conviction, social position, wealth, or any other grounds. The security police are subject by law to judicial scrutiny.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment or exile is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. A suspect may be detained by the police for questioning for 3 days; for special reasons not specified in the law this period may be extended for 14 additional days, though the court must be notified of this fact. During the investigative period, the accused may be denied access to a lawyer. Following formal arrest, the accused is permitted free access to the lawyer of his choice. The state will pay legal fees for indigents. A court hearing must take place within 8 days of notification of the arrest if in a city or within 30 days if in rural areas. The circumstances of an arrest are subject to judicial review when the accused is brought to trial. Should the arrest be shown to have been incorrect, or should the accused be found innocent, he may apply to the same court for civil damages for loss of freedom.

The Government has introduced a bill proposing amendments to the pretrial procedure. The investigative detention period will be shortened considerably, and the accused will have access to a lawyer during that time. The purpose is to achieve uniformity with the practice in other Western countries.

The institutions of habeas corpus and bail do not exist as such in Finland. Those accused of serious crimes must by law remain in custody. Those accused of minor offenses may be released on personal recognizance at the court's discretion.

Preventive detention is authorized only during a declared state of war for narrowly defined offenses such as treason, mutiny, and trafficking in weapons. Supervisory personnel from the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Interior, as well as the parliamentary Ombudsman and the Chancellor of Justice, have authority to enter prisons and order the release of prisoners held without charge. By law, Finnish citizens cannot be exiled.

New legislation on the status of conscientious objectors to Finland's obligatory military service was passed in June 1985. It will take effect at the beginning of 1987 for a trial period of 5 years. Giving the individual the option of serving in the military or becoming a conscientious objector, the law abolishes the investigative board which previously decided whether to confer the status of conscientious objector. The new law also lengthens the alternative civilian service for conscientious objectors to 16 months, twice the minimum length of military service. Jehovah's Witnesses are exempted from military service altogether under the new law. The passage of the bill stemmed from the investigative board's rejection of an increasing number of applications for civilian service in recent years. Under the old law, those, including Jehovah's Witnesses, who refused unarmed service within the defense forces and were not granted alternative civilian service, went to jail.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International named one such person sentenced to 9 months' imprisonment in January 1984 a prisoner of conscience. He accepted alternative service and was released in March 1984. In October 1985 Amnesty International declared two other conscientious objectors to be prisoners of conscience. It indicated that 19 other prospective conscientious objectors whose cases were awaiting trial would be declared prisoners of conscience if convicted and sentenced. It also criticized the longer period of alternative civilian service in the new law as punitive in nature.

FINLAND

Finland has ratified International Labor Organization Convention 105 prohibiting compulsory labor and observes its provisions.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Finnish citizens and aliens legally present in Finland have the right to counsel. Charges must be clearly stated. Local courts may decide to conduct a trial behind closed doors in juvenile, matrimonial, and guardianship cases, or when the publicity would offend morality or endanger the national security. In "national security" cases, the judge may withhold any or all information pertaining to charges against individuals, verdicts, and sentencing. Sanctions may be imposed if such information is made public. Civilians may not be tried by military courts except in time of war. There are no separate "security" courts.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy and the sanctity of the home, including prohibition of eavesdropping and mail tampering, are guaranteed by law and respected in practice.

For the commemorative meeting in Helsinki of the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) in July and August 1985, a special powers act was passed authorizing the police to take measures for the protection of the meeting's participants. On an exceptional basis, it gave the police the right to inspect the person, residence, car, or mail of anyone, without the usual justification. In effect from mid-July until the end of August 1985, it was applied in only a few cases, mainly to order that windows facing the Conference Hall be closed. Several human rights demonstrators in front of the hall were peacefully removed during the meeting in accordance with the law.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

According to law and in actual practice, an effective judiciary, an independent press, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. There have been no instances of abuse or legal decisions restricting freedom of the press. The press occasionally exercises self-restraint in treating issues deemed to be potentially harmful to the national interest but is under no compulsion from the authorities to do so.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is guaranteed by the Constitution. However, if the purpose of the association is to influence political issues, only Finnish citizens may participate. Public demonstrations require notification to the police. An anti-Soviet demonstration by Baltic refugees and their descendants in Helsinki on the eve of the CSCE celebration was permitted in accordance with Finnish law. However, the police peacefully dispersed a later demonstration at the Soviet Embassy of which police had not been notified.

FINLAND

Some of the protesters in the latter demonstration were briefly detained but not charged.

The right of workers to join trade unions is constitutionally guaranteed. Likewise, trade unions are constitutionally guaranteed the right to organize, assemble peacefully, bargain collectively, and strike. They enjoy a protected status and play an important role in political and economic life. The average rate of organization is 85 percent among the labor force in Finland. The central organization of Finnish Trade Unions (SAK), a 1-million-member confederation of blue-collar workers, dominates the trade union movement. Three other central organizations cover white-collar, professional, and technical employees. All trade unions are democratically organized and managed and are independent of both government and political parties. Most trade unions maintain relations with their Nordic counterparts. The four trade union confederations also maintain contact with the Soviet All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions. SAK and one white-collar confederation are members of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. SAK, through two of its affiliates, also has ties to the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions. Finnish trade unions participate in the International Labor Organization.

The Finnish Government encourages voluntary organizations and subsidizes many private groups formed to achieve a public purpose. They are permitted to maintain relations with other international groups in both Communist and Western countries. However, if the membership of an organization is more than one-third foreign, it requires the Government's permission to operate.

c. Freedom of Religion

Finland has two state religions: the Lutheran and the Orthodox. Taxes are collected by the Government from members to support these churches. Other Christians, Muslims, and Jews enjoy unrestricted freedom of worship. Approximately 89.5 percent of the population of Finland belongs to the Lutheran Church.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Finns are free to travel in Finland and abroad. Within the area of the Nordic countries--Finland, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, and Sweden--they may travel without passports. In addition, they do not need exit visas for travel to other countries. Over 200,000 Finns have emigrated to Sweden in the past two decades to seek employment, and over one-half of that number have returned. No restrictions have been placed on emigration or repatriation.

The debate on the criteria which the Finnish Government applies when deciding to grant political asylum continued in 1985. The Government maintains that, "in accordance with the Geneva Agreement, Finland gives asylum to individuals arriving (in Finland) who have the characteristics of refugees determined by the agreement." The Ministry of the Interior categorically denies that any agreement exists with the Soviet Union regarding repatriation of Soviet would-be refugees. In 1985, the Government disclosed that it had given temporary visas to three Estonians who had entered Finland illegally.

FINLAND

Finland does not grant asylum to people wishing to escape economic hardship.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Finland is a multiparty parliamentary democracy in which all citizens over the age of 18 freely elect their representatives from among multiple candidates representing a wide spectrum of political ideologies. The country has the longest tradition of women's suffrage in Europe. Three women are Ministers in the Cabinet, and 62 are representatives in the Parliament.

Finland participates actively in international human rights organizations and was a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in 1985. Finland has not been the subject of an international investigation of alleged human rights violations. Within Finland, several organizations monitor human rights performance, including the Finnish Red Cross, the government-sponsored Equality Council, the Women's Rights Union, and Amnesty International. A Finnish Helsinki Watch Group was established in July 1985 but was not very active during the year. Under the auspices of the Abo Academy, a Swedish-language university in Turku, a Human Rights Institute was founded in the spring of 1985. Its purpose is to conduct human rights research and studies as well as to distribute information.

Amnesty International's 1985 Report, as noted in Section 1.d., included a section on Finland which discussed the status of conscientious objectors. Freedom House rated Finland "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Finland has a population of 4.9 million and its per capita income was $10,740 in 1984. A prosperous industrial market economy, Finland has privately owned, cooperative, and state-owned property enterprises. Private property is protected by law. Between August 1984 and August 1985, the level of unemployment was 6.1 percent, and the rate of inflation dropped to 5.8 percent.

Basic human needs are fully met for the entire population without discrimination. The infant mortality rate is 6.2 per 1,000 live births in the first 12 months, and life expectancy at birth is 73.4 years. According to World Bank statistics, primary school enrollment was 93 percent in 1982, but the Finnish Ministry of Education states the correct figure was over 99 percent, as no one is exempted from compulsory primary school education. Finland enjoys a virtual 100 per cent literacy rate.

The minimum age for full-time employment is 16 years. However, the law permits youths of 14 and 15 years of age to spend up to two-thirds of their school holidays at work up to a maximum of 7 hours per day and 36 hours per week. Workers under 18 years of age also work less than a standard workweek, and night work is prohibited.

FINLAND

The minimum wage varies according to the industry but is roughly $3.57 per hour. This provides a decent living for workers and their families. A 40-hour workweek is standard, although persons working straight shift work have a 36-hour workweek, and those in certain occupations can work longer in a week subject to an 80- or 120-hour maximum in 2 or 3 weeks respectively.

Several laws and regulations protect workers while on the job and in transit to and from their work. Enforcement machinery includes the National Board of Labor Protection and labor protection delegates elected by the workers themselves. Cooperation between labor and management in safety and health has been mandatory by statute since 1974.

To redress existing inequities between the sexes, the government-established Council for Equality coordinates and sponsors legislation to meet the needs of women as workers, mothers, widows, and retirees. During 1985 Parliament passed two bills designed to improve the status of women in Finland. The first, a comprehensive equal rights bill, ensures equal treatment for women in the work place, and the second, a family name bill, permits women to retain their maiden names after marriage as their only surname. The law also makes it possible for the husband to take his wife's name.

Government statistics indicate that in 1985 women's wages and salaries remained, on the average, at 77 percent of those of men. The rate of participation in the labor market for Finnish women in 1985 was 65.7 percent; for men it was 74.3 percent.

FRANCE

France is a democratic republic with constitutional guarantees of human rights, freely functioning political parties, and regular elections. Voter participation (with universal suffrage) is high. Elections at the local as well as national level are occasions for ideological and topical debate.

France has a highly developed industrial economy comprising a mixture of public and private enterprise. The public sector was increased significantly during the first year and a half of the Mitterrand Presidency when, in fulfillment of Socialist Party campaign promises, a number of important private industrial enterprises and most of the remaining private banks were nationalized. Most of the economy is still privately controlled, however, and no firms or banks were nationalized in 1985. The Government is now committed to an austerity program designed to reduce inflation and the costs of the public sector.

The promotion of human rights remains a principal tenet of President Mitterrand's foreign policy. Since Mitterrand took office in 1981, France has signed 13 international conventions on human rights. French leaders speak out frequently on worldwide abuses of human rights and make frequent reference to the protection of these rights within France. Mitterrand and other government officials reaffirmed France's historic commitment to human rights at an international conference on human rights and freedoms organized by Prime Minister Laurent Fabius in May 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Terrorist groups--principally indigenous groups--have taken responsibility for several political murders occurring in France in 1985. In January, the terrorist group Action Directe, in association with the West German Red Army Faction, claimed responsibility for the assassination of General Rene Audran, director of international arms sales in the French Defense Ministry. Five months later, Action Directe tried unsuccessfully to assassinate the Comptroller General of the French Army. The group also committed sporadic bombings against businesses, government offices, and international organizations linked in its analysis to repressive or militaristic activities.

The so-called Antiterrorist Liberation Group continued to claim responsibility for assassinations of alleged Basque terrorists in southwest France in 1985, and its operations became less discriminating as some of the victims had no apparent links to Basque terrorism. The Corsican National Liberation Front took responsibility for the machine-gunning of several police headquarters and police cars, killing a gendarme in December 1984 in addition to numerous bombings in 1984-85. Also responsible for bombings were the French Basque organization Iparretarrak, the Breton Revolutionary Army, and various separatist organizations in the overseas department of Guadeloupe whose attacks resulted in fatalities. In New Caledonia, an overseas territory, violence occurred sporadically during much of 1985, with more than 20 people killed either in confrontations between pro- and anti-independence forces, or in efforts by police to enforce the law.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence that French security services have engaged in abduction or secret arrests.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. There have been no credible allegations of the use of torture.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

French law guarantees freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. There is no direct equivalent of habeas corpus in the French legal system, but a suspect can be held only for up to 2 days--4 for drug cases--before being transferred to a magistrate for investigation. There is no forced or compulsory labor in France.

The French judiciary plays a determining role in the detention process. Government authority to hold a person beyond the prescribed periods is severely restricted and must be ordered by the competent court. As part of continuing reforms in the legal system, the Minister of Justice in 1985 proposed a change in the magistrate system to require that three investigating magistrates rather than one agree before arresting and detaining a suspect for certain crimes.

In an effort to contain violence and in response to Spanish Government requests, the French Government in 1985 continued its policy of "assigned residence," moving Spanish emigre Basques suspected of terrorist connections to towns in northern France. The Government also continued, at a lower rate than in past years, its policy of expelling accused Basque terrorists, mostly to African nations.

The Government ordered banishment of three French citizens of New Caledonia from the island due to their alleged roles in promoting violence and racial hatred. However, authorities have been unable thus far to apprehend them, and they presumably remain in hiding in New Caledonia. The expulsion action was taken under a "state of siege" declared by the French High Commissioner, under provisions of the French Constitution, and was highly exceptional.

In general, the Government sets great store by France's tradition as a refuge for victims of political and religious persecution.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right of fair public trial is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Suspects have the right to legal counsel as soon as their case is transferred from the police to the magistrate. For misdemeanors, pretrial confinement is limited normally to 4 months, with possible extensions in special circumstances not to exceed 8 months. For felonies, pretrial confinement is not limited. French law provides for the right of appeal, except in jury trials of felony cases. An appeal in felony cases is possible to the Cour de Cassation, but this court rules only on procedure. No appeal is possible that involves review of the facts of the case.

Trials in France are normally open and public, though provisions exist for the defense to request a closed proceeding. The press has free access to records of court proceedings, but under French law the prosecutor may not disclose information about cases being tried or investigated. Though the judiciary is independent, the courts are not immune from subtle political or public pressure in certain cases. There is no evidence that the authorities detain any person for political reasons.

Pending completion of legislative reforms, legal proceedings have been suspended against individuals whose requests for conscientious objector status were rejected. There are still some individuals, however, who are now serving prison terms imposed prior to 1983 by the now defunct permanent tribunals of the armed forces because they did not present such a request and refused military service.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

French law guarantees freedom from invasion of privacy, and this freedom is respected in practice. The search of a private residence requires a search warrant and must take place between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m. except in special cases, such as drug offenses, when the search can be undertaken at any time. Telephone conversations may be monitored in conjunction with criminal proceedings with a court order and in national security cases with administrative approval from the agency conducting the investigation. The authorities have occasionally opened correspondence to enforce currency regulations, though this is not a widespread practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Newspapers and magazines are free from government control and carry views ranging across the political spectrum. Major radio and television stations are state-owned, though the Government is not directly involved in their daily operation. These media are subject to the jurisdiction of a "high authority" whose members are appointed by the President, the National Assembly, and the Senate. Since 1983, private "free" radio stations have been in operation, many of which are sympathetic to the current political opposition. The Government has announced plans to allow the establishment of private television channels. Allegations of government pressure on television and radio continue to be heard and denied. In practice, government ownership of the audiovisual media do not seem to represent a limitation of press freedoms.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is constitutionally guaranteed and respected in practice.

FRANCE

Labor unions have the right to organize free from government control. Although only one-fifth of labor is unionized, trade unions exercise significant economic and political influence. They are present and active in numerous tripartite (government, employers, and labor) bodies dealing with social matters, including labor courts and the Economic and Social Council, a constitutionally mandated consultative body. All unions are technically independent of the political parties, but many of the leaders of France's largest union, the General Confederation of Labor, belong to the Communist Party (the General Secretary traditionally is a member of the Communist Party Political Bureau). Leaders of most other unions are members of one or another faction of the governing Socialist Party although members of other parties are also active in the labor movement. Despite this, all unions and employers associations are very active in the International Labor Organization and other international organizations. French workers are free to strike, with a few minor exceptions where strikes are determined to be a threat to public safety.

During the summer of 1985 the General Confederation of Labor undertook a series of increasingly provocative "commando" actions such as blocking rail lines and major city streets and occupying factories. Despite considerable provocation including physical attacks against the police, the Government so far has succeeded in ending these actions with a minimum of force.

The only major abridgment of freedom of assembly in 1985 came in New Caledonia, where widespread disorder and violence led the French High Commissioner to impose a state of siege and a curfew. During the summer the situation became somewhat calmer in anticipation of regional elections, and the state of siege was ended. Regional elections took place without major incident in September.

Roman Catholics comprise by far the largest religious group in France. Separation of church and state is guaranteed by law. All religious groups function freely without persecution or restrictions. Despite strong initial public opposition to proposed legislation regarding private (largely Catholic) schools, the Government in 1984-85 succeeded in passing compromise education reform measures which allow public authorities some say in private school personnel practices.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

French law provides for freedom of internal movement, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. Arriving refugees, intending emigrants, and intending repatriates can undertake foreign travel and, in most instances, return to France. Although new measures to control immigration announced in 1984 could, among other things, sharply restrict the right of some aliens to settle their families there, France has an extensive record of refugee aid and resettlement.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution guarantees the equality of all citizens before the law, without regard to origin, race, or religion.

FRANCE

All French citizens of both sexes who have reached majority may vote. These provisions are fully respected in practice. A wide variety of political parties compete freely in elections. In addition to national, presidential, and legislative elections, there are regularly scheduled local elections. For several years, the Government has been transferring selected powers from the executive branch to the locally elected assemblies. Many special interest groups--business, labor, veterans, consumer advocates, ecologists, and others--organize freely and regularly run candidates for elective office. While isolated incidents of racial, religious, or political discrimination occur, particularly against the large immigrant community, the authorities do not condone them. The Government passed a law in 1985 guaranteeing a vote on self-determination in New Caledonia before the end of 1987.

France has traditionally been a leader in the human rights area and has long been a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission. Human rights organizations operate freely in France, including Amnesty International, the International Federation for Human Rights, and the International Institute for Human Rights.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International expressed continued concern about the imprisonment of conscientious objectors. Freedom House rated France "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

France has an advanced industrial mixed economy accompanied by a system of social assistance to needy members of the population. Its population is 55,041,000, and its per capita gross national product was $10,500 in 1983.

Discrimination based on race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion is not condoned by the authorities. Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants. Life expectancy at birth is 74.9 years, and the infant mortality rate is 8.2 per 1,000 live births. The adult literacy rate is 99 percent.

With a few minor exceptions for those enrolled in recognized apprenticeship programs, children under the age of 16 may not be employed. Certain categories of work considered to be arduous and night work (10 p.m. to 5 a.m.) may not be performed by persons under the age of 18, or by women in manufacturing, mining, the public sector, unions, and nonprofit organizations, with the exception of women with managerial responsibilities. This prohibition does not apply to women in commercial establishments or the health sector where no manual work is involved.

France has a minimum wage of about $3.00 an hour. The standard work week is 39 hours, and overtime is controlled. In general terms, French labor legislation and practice, including that pertaining to occupational safety and health, are fully compatible with those in other industrialized market economy countries. The minimum wage is somewhat less in the overseas departments, and not all social legislation applies in the overseas territories.

Women have equal status under the law, but they remain engaged in continuing efforts to maintain and strengthen their rights. A Cabinet-level ministry is charged with promoting women's rights. The Government has taken steps to close loopholes in French legislation on sex discrimination in the workplace and to eliminate sexist advertising. In 1985 it passed legislation to ensure more equality in marriage rights.

The current Government has made a major effort to recognize the rights of linguistic and ethnic minorities, whether in metropolitan France or overseas. In August it announced measures to foster the study of regional languages such as Breton. It has also shown itself sensitive to the rights of immigrants, emphasizing the need to coexist peacefully without forcing them to assimilate completely into French culture.

In New Caledonia, the Government has worked constantly to reassure the Melanesian sector of the population that its rights and customs will be respected. Deep-rooted antagonisms between ethnic communities still exist, however, leaving a potential for violence. Further exceptional measures by the Government could be required, such as during the previous "state of siege." Similarly, there is a potential for renewed violence in the overseas department of Guadeloupe, where rioting and a general strike paralyzed the island for several days in July.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The German Democratic Republic (GDR or East Germany) was created in 1949 as a Communist state out of the Soviet occupation zone of Germany. There are still approximately 380,000 Soviet troops stationed on its soil. The country is ruled by the Communist party, known as the Socialist Unity Party (SED), which closely resembles the Soviet model. The four other parties have no real power or independence, and the SED leadership makes all important political, economic, and social decisions.

Despite such formidable barriers as the Berlin Wall, deep historical, cultural, linguistic, and family ties remain between the people of the German Democratic Republic and those of the Federal Republic of Germany. Concern that such ties and constant exposure to Western values could undermine support for the Communist system is a central reason for the Government's tight control over its population. For this purpose, the GDR has an efficient security apparatus administered by the Ministries of the Interior and State Security. Together, they employ approximately 300,000 people.

The German Democratic Republic has a centrally planned economy in which the bulk of industrial and agricultural property is state-owned. Although holding private property is permitted, controls are placed on its acquisition, inheritance, and the income derived from it. Private businesses are few and tightly controlled.

The German Democratic Republic continues to restrict, through use of the large secret police apparatus supplemented by informers, the fundamental freedoms of thought, speech, religion, assembly, and travel. The secret police opens mail, installs listening devices, places people under surveillance, subjects them to interrogation and intimidation, and arrests them without due process. During 1985, the rate of emigration increased somewhat over the 1980-83 average. The Government reportedly dismantled all automatic shooting devices along the border with the Federal Republic of Germany and has promised to remove all mines. A slightly more lenient attitude toward some religious groups has recently been apparent.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political killings in the German Democratic Republic appear to take place only in the context of attempts to leave the country by crossing the border without authorization. A 1982 law codified orders to border guards that they should shoot, if necessary, to prevent a person from leaving the country without permission. It is not known how many people have been shot while trying to flee to West Germany or West Berlin. The borders remain nearly impenetrable. Although the East Germans have announced the dismantling of the last automatic shooting devices along the border and the forthcoming removal of minefields, a heavily guarded fence 500 meters behind the frontier has helped reduce unauthorized border crossings from 192 in 1984 to 96 through the end of August 1985. Any who attempt escape still risk death. No exact figure for the number of unsuccessful escape attempts, and possible resulting deaths, can be given since border guards from the Federal Republic of Germany are not necessarily aware of all incidents.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of permanent disappearance during 1985.

c. Torture, and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of systematic torture in 1985. Specific laws state that the life, health, and the ability to work of arrestees and prisoners must not be jeopardized. However, former detainees and prisoners have reported excessively harsh conditions and psychological strain in GDR prisons. Former political prisoners have reported 13-hour workdays without any day of rest. In 1985, an investigatory commission of the European Parliament heard testimony describing beatings and the use of cramped "tiger cages" in GDR prisons. In general, however, the use of repressive psychological measures (such as the denial of family visits, mail, and packages) seems to be more common.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In practice, the police have blanket authority to detain and interrogate East Germans on suspicion alone. East Germans who become particularly active in officially disapproved ways are sometimes subject to repeated harassment, such as regular police interrogations, despite the absence of formal charges. They may be arrested with or without warrants and merely for expressing dissenting views. When held in detention, a person does not have the right to a judicial determination of continued detention.

Although the criminal procedure code sets a limit of 3 months on investigatory proceedings, prosecuting authorities appear to have no difficulty in extending this period. In most political cases it takes longer than 24 hours--often many weeks--before interested parties are notified of the arrest. Furthermore, the code does not specify a maximum time period which may elapse before a detained person may see a lawyer. Although the code guarantees access to a defense attorney, the prosecutor may monitor or restrict contacts between the defense attorney and his client as he sees fit.

Charges filed in clearly political cases are often based on laws which are written in vague and general language. The Penal Code provides, for instance, that the transmission of information "detrimental to the interests of the German Democratic Republic," even if it is not secret, may be considered treason. Laws against "anti-state agitation" and "asocial behavior (parasitism)" are often applied selectively against citizens who become politically active. Their broad and vague wording severely restricts the possibility for defense. Amnesty International states that it has yet to learn of an acquittal when a prisoner has been brought to trial under these laws.

Forced labor as a means of political coercion or education is not practiced in the German Democratic Republic.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

GDR law provides for a fair public trial for defendants in civil and criminal cases. In cases involving security and political issues, however, judges may bar individuals or groups from "open trials." Prisoners are allowed to choose a lawyer from a list of those available in their area. However, all attorneys are state employees, and only a handful are willing to take on political cases. Until investigatory proceedings are completed, prisoners may see their lawyers only in the presence of the secret police and may discuss only matters not relating to the case. Discussion of a case itself usually takes place in a brief interview shortly before a trial. Attorneys are not allowed to make photocopies or tape recordings of their clients' files; files may be reviewed only in court and notes must be taken in longhand.

Trials tend to be short and perfunctory. Constitutionally, the courts are under the control of the Council of State; in reality, they are controlled by the SED, which appoints the judges. Military courts try civilians only in military espionage cases.

The German Democratic Republic does not admit to having political prisoners, nor does it publish statistics which would assist in determining the number of political prisoners held. The West German-based International Society for Human Rights estimates that there are 6,000 political prisoners in the German Democratic Republic. The August 13 Working Group, a West Berlin human rights organization, presently places the number at 8,500, a decline from its earlier estimates.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

By law, the police need authorization to enter and search a house, but they may authorize entry themselves, and the courts will retroactively give approval. It is routine and legal for the state security organs, solely on their own authority, to tap telephones and open mail. Evidence thus obtained can be used in court. The Government has achieved its goal of instilling a widespread belief that state security informants are ubiquitous and discovery of opposition to the state is certain.

All printed materials require an official permit. Only magazines and newspapers bearing a postal license may be legally imported and distributed. West German television can be viewed by 80 percent of East Germans, and Western radio broadcasts can be heard throughout the country. There are no government attempts to jam or otherwise hinder these broadcasts.

Young people are not forced to join the SED's youth movement, the Free German Youth, but school and government authorities make it clear that failure to join this group will limit educational and job opportunities.

East Germans must obtain government permission to marry foreigners. The authorities appear to be following faithfully the letter of an October 1983 law which specifies that applications for binational marriage should be decided within 6 months of completing an application, though the process of assembling documents can be time-consuming.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

East German citizens in positions deemed "sensitive" by their Government may not be visited by or even maintain contacts with close relatives who live in the West. Emigrants from the German Democratic Republic must generally wait 5 years before they may return to visit relatives.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

All media are controlled and censored by the Government, and all publications must be licensed before distribution. Western newspapers and magazines, other than politically acceptable publications such as those of Western Communist parties, are generally unavailable to the general public. Small quantities of Western journals are for sale for hard currency in international hotels upon request. Some libraries, university departments, and official institutes also receive Western journals, but circulation is highly restricted. East Germans and Western travelers may be interrogated or arrested simply for possessing unlicensed printed material. Contact with Western journalists is severely limited by law; for the average East German, such contact is illegal.

The SED conceives of art and literature as a means of promoting political goals. Works are judged on the basis of their conformity to "socialist realism", i.e., whether they convey a clear, optimistic view of Communist society and goals. Contrary views or perceptions are discouraged or censored. Professional associations for writers and artists are headed by party members and controlled by the state. Dissidents and critics have been expelled and deprived of important professional privileges. Publishing houses practice self-censorship, and works must receive official clearance before they are published, performed, or exhibited. Some works are banned completely; others may be published only outside the country under contracts negotiated by the state-run agencies; others are permitted to be published, performed, or exhibited in the German Democratic Republic only in edited form. East German cultural figures continue to emigrate to the Federal Republic to escape these government restrictions.

Individual academic freedom is severely limited. The State views education as an instrument for "building socialism." All areas of academic inquiry are strictly controlled. Teachers who allow open classroom discussion of unapproved themes or topics or who deviate from the party line are disciplined. Many books are prohibited totally; others are permitted only in university libraries to which only carefully screened and authorized personnel are allowed access.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of assembly, only government-organized demonstrations are allowed. The formation of private organizations or clubs also requires state permission. Environmentalist Udo Zeitz applied for permission to emigrate after his request to form an association for environmental protection was denied. His continued protest against GDR environmental policies and denial of his right to emigrate led to his arrest and conviction to 3-1/2 years of imprisonment on charges of "defamation of the German Democratic Republic."

GDR workers do not have the right to establish and join unions of their own choosing. The Free German Trade Union is an appendage of the SED. It is made up of 16 unions covering all workers and professionals. Its role is to enforce and promote official government and party policies rather than to promote members' interests which might conflict with those policies. The right to strike does not exist in the German Democratic Republic.

The Constitution guarantees freedom of religious belief and worship, but the State officially promotes atheism. In practice, the State tolerates but does not encourage, religious activity. Overt adherence to religious beliefs may result in disqualification for preferred jobs and educational opportunities, although the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the largest in the German Democratic Republic, has had some success in pleading the cases of its members who have suffered such discrimination.

Clergy and lay members of Western churches have been permitted to attend church synods and conferences at a national ecumenical level, and some GDR religious leaders have been allowed to attend similar meetings in the West. However, the Evangelical Lutheran Church complained at its regional synod in Dresden in 1985 that GDR authorities are increasingly refusing West German church members permission to visit affiliated congregations in the German Democratic Republic. The authorities prohibit official relations between East and West German congregations and does not permit personal visits by West German clergy when they suspect church business will be discussed.

New churches continue to be built in limited numbers with government approval. However, the Evangelical Lutheran Church Synod also complained that government assistance in restoration and upkeep of existing churches was insufficient owing mainly to the lack of building materials.

Under continuing government pressure to watch its words and deeds, the Evangelical Lutheran Church showed more caution in 1985. Secret police continue to monitor church-sponsored events closely. Nevertheless, the church remains the only institutional forum where divergent opinions can be expressed with relative freedom.

The Government has demonstrated some flexibility in its treatment of minority religions. A Mormon Temple was dedicated in Freiberg near Dresden, and Christian Scientists have begun receiving church literature promised to them during a meeting with government officials in December 1984. However they, like the Jehovah's Witnesses, are still under court orders restricting their religious practice. An American Jewish organization has received official encouragement in its efforts to arrange for a rabbi to be sent to reside in East Berlin, where for years there has been no rabbi to serve the tiny Jewish community.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation.

Most East Germans can travel freely within the country, except near borders or military installations. They are not allowed to change their place of residence without government permission. All citizens must carry identification cards which the police have the right to check at will. Because of their criminal or political activities, including the filing of emigration applications, approximately 60,000 East Germans carry a special identification card, called PM-12, which in many but not all cases restricts their domestic as well as foreign travel.

Foreign travel is tightly controlled, except to Czechoslovakia, which East Germans can visit using only a normal identification card. Travel to other Communist countries is restricted, and travel to Poland strictly controlled. With few exceptions, travel to non-Communist countries is not allowed until East Germans reach retirement age (60 for women, 65 for men).

In 1985, a total of 24,912 East Germans legally emigrated to the Federal Republic of Germany. The 1985 monthly rate of emigration visas issued was higher than the average of 900-1,000 visas in recent years, except 1984 when the authorities allowed about 40,000 people to emigrate. Nonetheless, only a fraction of those wishing to leave have been allowed to do so. Some Western authorities estimate that as many as 300,000 to 500,000 applications are still pending.

A law effective October 15, 1983 narrowly restricts cases of family reunification to first-degree relatives (parents or children) and spouses. Though some East Germans other than those with first-degree relatives have been allowed to leave, the narrow definition of eligibility for emigration has created difficulties for the large majority of applicants. Many successful applicants wait from 1 to 5 years for permission to leave, often in the meantime suffering loss of employment and even imprisonment.

Those who left the country illegally before January 1, 1981 are eligible to apply for permission to visit, but reportedly only half of those who have applied have obtained visas. Those who fled after 1980 face criminal prosecution if they return to the German Democratic Republic. Those who emigrate legally must generally wait 5 years before they are permitted to return again.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

The Government is completely dominated by the Socialist Unity Party. Although four other parties are represented in the Government, they are not permitted to challenge Communist doctrine or control. All decisions are made by the SED leadership; lower-level representatives are expected only to approve and to carry out these decisions. The unicameral legislature, the Volkskammer (People's Chamber), never rejects government proposals. The SED also determines who will fill executive positions in the Government and ensures that its members fill a majority of the positions.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

All parties and mass organizations (such as the trade unions) are represented in the National Front, which is controlled by the SED. For election purposes, the National Front prepares lists of approved candidates according to a formula which ensures the SED's complete domination. The list of candidates on a ballot exceeds the number of available seats, and a candidate high on the list may be rejected if more than 50 percent of voters cross his name off the ballot. In such a case, a candidate lower on the list may be elected.

The German Democratic Republic is a signatory of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. However, it has generally taken the position that inquiries into its human rights policies constitute interference in its internal affairs. Requests by private human rights groups in the West for information on human rights conditions go unanswered, and the Government does not permit visits by such groups. No unofficial human rights groups are known to exist in the German Democratic Republic. The government-sponsored Committee for the Protection of Human Rights does not attempt to safeguard the human rights of East Germans but to criticize human rights conditions in other countries while claiming there are no problems in the German Democratic Republic.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International expressed continuing concern about the large number of prisoners of conscience, most of them imprisoned for attempting to leave the country without permission or for trying to obtain permission to do so. Other prisoners of conscience included peace campaigners, dissenting Marxists, and conscientious objectors to military service. Amnesty International was also concerned that political prisoners were tried in secret and therefore denied the right to a fair public trial. Freedom House rated the German Democratic Republic "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The German Democratic Republic, which claims a population of over 15,500,000 plus almost 1.2 million in East Berlin, has a highly industrialized, centrally planned economy. It is generally an importer of raw materials and an exporter of manufactured goods. All large industrial, retail, and agricultural properties are state-owned, but small private businesses with fewer than 10 employees are permitted. Over 90 percent of the farmland is collectivized or state-owned, and only 2 percent of the labor force is still privately employed.

An extensive social welfare system provides free medical care to the population. According to the World Bank in 1984, life expectancy at birth was 73.1 years, and the infant mortality rate was 11 per 1,000 live births. However, serious shortages of hospital beds and medicines are reported. East Germans may now receive medicines from the Federal Republic against their local prescriptions. Even seriously ill patients must wait several months or years for hospitalization or surgery, unless they can pay for admission to "hard currency wards" which have been established in several hospitals.

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

The supply and safety of drinking water is of growing concern to the Government and the local population. At present the use of water--15 billion cubic meters per year--is extremely close to the total amount available for use. Reports from provincial areas indicate that drinking water is increasingly contaminated through the overuse of pesticides and fertilizers, chiefly nitrates, and illnesses and birth defects from drinking unsafe water are increasing.

Housing remains the most serious shortage. Single residents in East Berlin usually wait more than 18 months for housing and married couples often wait more than 1 year. The Government is committed to a major housing construction program lasting until 1999. The authorities also encourage private initiative in repairing or building homes by providing low interest loans, but building materials are often in short supply.

Literacy is almost universal. Free and universal education is provided through the 12th year. Almost all school-aged children attend school. The number of students in institutions of higher learning is a function of projected needs. Competition is keen, and admission is usually as much a matter of the student's political acceptability as academic promise.

Children may work part-time during vacations and to further their education from age 14 onwards, and full-time with permission of their parents between the ages of 14 and 18. Children under the age of 18 may not work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m.. The workweek averages 43-1/2 hours a week, and a 2-day weekend is common. Minimum paid holidays total 18 workdays a year, and certain persons, such as mothers with small children, have the right to additional days of paid holidays.

In general, health and safety standards are adequate, but occasional reports persist of poorly maintained or overtaxed industrial plants and machinery. Railway workers have complained repeatedly that the freight transport capacity of the railway system is overextended and leading to safety problems.

Men and women are treated equally in most respects. The retirement age for women is 60, for men 65. As one of the many incentives to increase the birth rate, women are given extensive maternity leave with pay. Eighty-seven percent of women of working age are employed, and there is a comprehensive child care system for working parents. Women are given one day a month off to do household shopping, as are single or divorced fathers with custody of children. Women can be found in all professions except the military, from which they are exempt except in times of war. There are few women in high positions in the party and Government and in most professions, although they are well represented in the medical profession.

The Sorbs, a Slavic group located around Cottbus and Dresden and numbering about 45,000, constitute the only remaining significant ethnic minority in the German Democratic Republic. The Sorbs are well integrated into the general population, and there is no apparent discrimination.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

The Federal Republic of Germany (FRG) is a modern and stable parliamentary democracy. On the national level, there is separation of power between executive, legislative, and judicial branches. There is also division of governmental authority between national and state governments. The latter retain significant autonomy, especially in matters relating to police and judiciary, culture and education, the environment, and social assistance. The head of government, the Chancellor, is elected by the Bundestag, the lower house of Parliament. The powers of the Chancellor and of the Parliament, which are substantial, are set down in the Constitution (Basic Law) adopted in 1949. The Bundestag is elected through a mixture of direct constituency candidates and party lists. Members of the second house of Parliament, or Bundesrat, are appointed by the state governments.

The Federal Republic has been ruled since its creation by a number of governments headed by one of the two major parties, the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) or the Social Democratic Party (SPD). The current Government is led by a coalition of the Christian Democratic Union, joined by its Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union, and the Free Democratic Party. The SPD is the leading opposition party.

Organized essentially at the state (Land) level and operating under the direction of state governments, the police are highly disciplined and scrupulously respect human rights. In dealing with hostile elements, including terrorists, special care is taken to respect the rights of the accused.

The economy of the country is highly industrialized. The population is highly educated and enjoys one of the highest standards of living in the world. The Government of the Federal Republic scrupulously protects human rights. It does not subordinate women or any other social group.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including:
Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Politically motivated killing by the Government or by constitutional political organizations is unknown. However, terrorist groups on the far left (Baader-Meinhof and its successor groups, including the Red Army Faction - RAF) and the far right (neo-Nazi groups) have in the past engaged in political violence. There were four politically motivated assassinations in the FRG during 1985: German industrialist Dr. Ernst Zimmermann by RAF terrorists in Munich on February 1; Libyan opposition politician Gebril Denali by unknown terrorists in Bonn on April 6; Moroccan citizen Mustafa Talmine by a Libyan national in Aachen on April 13; and U.S. soldier Edward F. Pimental by RAF terrorists in Wiesbaden, on August 8.

Other politically motivated actions ending in deaths included the bomb attacks at the Frankfurt airport on June 19, resulting in 4 deaths and 46 injured, and at the U.S. Rhein-Main airbase in Frankfurt by RAF terrorists, resulting in 2 deaths and 17 injured.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

In two attempted bomb attacks, the bombs exploded prematurely, killing the persons planting the bombs, on January 20 in Stuttgart-Vaihingen and on June 1 in Hannover.

b. Disappearance

Governmental or police authorities have not abducted or secretly arrested persons. There have been no kidnappings by political terrorist groups for several years.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Police authorities do not physically or mentally torture prisoners, nor do they engage in cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment. Prison conditions are not substandard.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No person may be arrested in the Federal Republic except on the basis of an arrest warrant issued by a competent judicial authority. Any person arrested by the police must be brought before a judge and charged no later than the end of the day following the day of apprehension. There is no preventive detention except that a prisoner may be detained no longer than 24 hours while awaiting a formal charge if there is evidence that he might seek to flee the country to avoid prosecution. The right of free access to legal counsel has been restricted only in the cases of some terrorists who have used contacts with lawyers to promote and continue terrorist activity even while in prison. Only judges may decide on the admissibility or continuation of any deprivation of liberty. Bail bond exists in the Federal Republic but is seldom employed. The Basic Law prohibits forced labor, and there have been no complaints of violations in 1985.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials are public. The Basic Law assures due process and prohibits double jeopardy. The judiciary is free of both government interference and intimidation by terrorists. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home is guaranteed by the Basic Law and fully respected in practice. Prior to forcible entry by police into a home, a warrant must be issued by a judge or, in an emergency, by a public prosecutor. Electronic surveillance may be undertaken only after authorization by a court order. Mail is not monitored.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The provisions of the Basic Law, an independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. Criticism of the Government is unrestricted. The media and artistic works are not censored. Academic freedom is also unrestricted. There is no censorship of foreign or domestic books. In April, the Bundestag amended the law on defamation to make illegal any denial of the fact of Nazi crimes or the crimes of other tyrannies. Newspapers and magazines are privately owned. Radio and television networks and stations exist, for the most part, as corporations. They are governed by independent boards made up of representatives of churches, political parties, and other organizations. A few experimental private cable television stations and local cable television networks have been set up. Legislation is under consideration in some German states to facilitate and encourage private television stations using cable, satellites, and other "new" media.

*Censorship in Germany of certain books + articles.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The rights of assembly and association are fully respected, as is the right to demonstrate. Organizers of street demonstrations are required to obtain police permits beforehand and may be asked to pay a deposit to cover the repair of any damage to public facilities. When demonstrators have not obtained the required permits, police have exercised considerable restraint, showing concern ultimately only for the continued functioning of public facilities and for the safety of the general public.

Membership in nongovernmental organizations of all types, including political parties, is completely free. Parties found to be "fundamentally antidemocratic" may be outlawed. Under this constitutionally based provision, the Constitutional Court, in the 1950's, declared both a neo-Nazi and a Communist party to be illegal.

The right to organize, strike, and bargain collectively is recognized and exercised freely in the Federal Republic. The country has a long-established and highly organized labor movement, with about 40 percent of the eligible work force unionized. The German Trade Union Federation represents over 80 percent of organized workers. Reborn in the wake of World War II, the unions are particularly conscious of their historic role as the protector of workers' rights and a bulwark of the democratic system. They actively participate in the International Labor Organization and in international trade union organizations.

The Moscow-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions, claiming that the FRG practice of excluding alleged political extremists from employment in the FRG civil service violates International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 111, has lodged a complaint with the international body. An ILO-appointed Commission of Inquiry is expected to conduct an investigation in 1986. The German practice is based on the special oath of allegiance of civil servants to defend actively the State, its institutions, and laws, and stems from a 1972 joint resolution by the Federal and state governments.

c. Freedom of Religion

The practice of religion is completely free. Major religious groups benefit from a state-administered church tax system. The Government subsidizes church-affiliated schools. Personal religious affiliation today plays an insignificant role in politics and commercial life. Members of all religions can be found in all political parties.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

German citizens are free to move anywhere within the country and to leave and return at any time. Germans who arrive in the Federal Republic from the German Democratic Republic are treated as German citizens and therefore may take up residence without restrictions. The number of resettlers from the German Democratic Republic in 1985 was less than in 1984 (40,974) but still about double the level of 1983 (11,343). The Federal Republic regards itself as the homeland of all ethnic Germans and actively encourages the immigration of ethnic Germans from Eastern Europe.

The Federal Republic remains a favorite destination for both political and other refugees. Since 1982 the Government has sought to restrict illegal immigration and abuse of political asylum status. Nevertheless, after a drop in political asylum applications between 1980 and 1983, the number increased substantially and is estimated to reach 70,000-80,000 in 1985. Meanwhile, the Government continues the measures introduced in 1981, such as denial of work permits and some social services, to make emigration to the Federal Republic less attractive for so-called economic refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Under the stable and liberal parliamentary democracy established by the Basic Law, the Federal Republic is ruled by a government chosen by the people through orderly elections based on universal suffrage. Election participation is usually in the range of 90 percent of eligible voters. Candidates for public office are normally members of political parties but are not required to be. Because of the negative experience with splinter parties under the Weimar Republic, the Basic Law and the state constitutions contain provisions that only parties achieving at least 5 percent of the vote can be represented in the Federal and state Parliaments. New political parties are free to form and enter the political process. The Greens, a party concerned about the environment and present in the Bundestag since the elections of 1983, is the most recent party to exceed the 5 percent threshold.

The International Society for Human Rights, Amnesty International, and other smaller human rights organizations freely conduct their activities in the Federal Republic. Amnesty International's organization in the Federal Republic continues to express concern about several cases in which conscientious objectors were sentenced to jail and about instances in which convicted terrorists have been placed under special restrictions in prison.

Amnesty International's 1985 Report did not mention the FRG. Freedom House rated the Federal Republic "free."

The Government considers the international promotion of human rights one of its highest priorities.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of the Federal Republic, now just over 61 million, decreased marginally in 1984. Per capita gross national product was 11,430 in 1983. The Federal Republic has an advanced industrial mixed economy. The Government seeks to promote economic growth and minimize unemployment through monetary and fiscal policies designed to promote favorable business conditions.

The social welfare system in the Federal Republic is of long standing and provides relatively generous benefits. The budgetary austerity of the past few years has resulted in some marginal reduction of basic social welfare benefits, which include old age and disability pensions, unemployment compensation, and medical care. Life expectancy at birth is 73.7 years, and the infant mortality rate is 9.3 per 1,000 live births (1984). There is no discrimination in the extent to which shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants, regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, political opinion, or citizenship.

Federal law generally prohibits the employment of children under age 15 with a few specific exceptions: children aged 13 and 14 may engage in farm work for up to 3 hours per day or may deliver newspapers for up to 2 hours per day; children aged 3 through 14 may take part in cultural performances under stringent conditions with regard to number of hours, time of day, and form of activity.

In the absence of minimum wage legislation, wages generally conform to the pattern set in collective bargaining. There is federal legislation setting occupational safety and health standards.

Since the passage of an equal employment rights law in 1982, women are guaranteed equal employment at the workplace. They play significant roles in all political parties and are increasingly rising to management and leadership positions in the private and public sectors. In organized labor, about 20 percent of union members are women, and a woman has served as president of the second largest trade union since 1982.

The majority of women, however, do not work outside the home. The rate of participation of women in the labor force, about 38 percent, is below the average in the European Economic Community, and most working women are employed in traditional fields. Moreover, protective legislation bars women from certain heavy industrial occupations and also generally bans night work. Young women experience difficulties in gaining access to training in some traditionally male-dominated fields. Recent court rulings and government pilot programs have helped break down some of these attitudinal and institutional barriers.

The Government has pursued a three-pronged policy with regard to foreign workers: integration of longtime residents, limitation of further entries, and repatriation aid for those willing to return to their home countries. A 9-month special program of repatriation aid to unemployed foreign workers, in the form of repatriation bonuses and reimbursement of social security contributions, stimulated the departure of about 300,000 persons, reducing the foreign population to 4.4 million in 1984. A national debate has been under way over whether the rights of guest workers should be broadened to permit unlimited residence and the right to vote or reduced by limiting the right of entry for dependent children.

GREECE

Greece is a republic with a democratically elected parliament. Several political parties participate in periodic legislative elections, the most recent of which was in June 1985, and the leader of the party with the largest vote becomes Prime Minister. Elections for the Presidency of the Republic are by popular vote. All elections are vigorously and freely contested.

The judiciary is independent of both the executive branch of government and Parliament and operates within a civil law framework with precedents from Roman law and French and German sources. Police practices respect detainees' rights.

A member of the European Economic Community, Greece is classified as a developed country by United Nations standards. Nevertheless, it has some attributes of a developing country and a tradition of state intervention in the economy.

The full range of universally acknowledged human rights is guaranteed by the Constitution, which includes many of the provisions of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Government, many of whose members suffered abuses during the junta period (1967-74), is sensitive to the protection of individual freedoms. Allegations of abuses fall in the area of religious expression, guaranteed within certain limits by the Constitution.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In general, the individual is secure in Greece. Nevertheless, the "November 17" revolutionary organization, whose earlier victims included U.S. officials, claimed responsibility for the February 21 murder of newspaper publisher Nikos Momferatos. The "Anti-Military Struggle" took responsibility for gunning down prosecutor George Theofanopoulos on April 1. On September 18, a resident Arab magazine editor was shot dead outside his office, for which Black September claimed responsibility. The Government has strongly condemned terrorist acts and implemented measures to prevent their recurrence.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abduction, secret arrest, or clandestine detention during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. In November 1984, the Parliament passed legislation making the use of torture an offense punishable by sentences of from 3 years to life imprisonment. There were no reported allegations of torture in 1985. However, in its 1985 Report, Amnesty International states that in October 1984 in discussions with Greek officials it had raised "allegations that some criminal suspects had been ill-treated."

GREECE

Prison and detention facilities provide adequate health care and diet. No distinction according to social class, race, sex, religion, or type of conviction is made in the treatment of prisoners. Cases requiring medical treatment receive special attention. Once sentenced, prisoners may be visited by family members 3 times per week.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest or imprisonment is guaranteed by the Constitution, and this provision is respected in practice.

Preventive detention does not exist in Greece. A person arrested on warrant or while committing a crime must be brought before an examining magistrate within 24 hours and charged. This magistrate must issue a warrant of imprisonment or order the release of the detainee within 3 days of the examination unless special circumstances require a 2-day extension of this time limit. The Constitution further states that the maximum duration of detention pending trial may not exceed a period of 1 year in the case of felonies or 6 months in the case of misdemeanors. A decision of a judicial council is required to effect extensions of these maximum durations (by 6 or 3 months, respectively) in exceptional cases. In practice, trials generally take place within 4 months of the submission of charges. Exile as a judicial remedy or government practice does not occur in Greece.

The Constitution expressly prohibits forced labor, and no violations are known to have occurred in practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Fair and public trials are guaranteed by the Constitution and provided in practice. Defense lawyers are available to all accused. Court sessions are public unless, as provided in the Constitution, the court decides that privacy is required for the protection of victims, when juveniles or morals offenses are involved, or in matters of national security. This latter provision is not abused. There is also a legal provision permitting a closed hearing for the sensitive portion of cases dealing with public order. In such instances, none of which is known to have occurred during 1985, the court by law must publicly pronounce its "reasoned decision" on the matters heard privately. A defendant may appeal a court verdict to an appeals court. Military courts have no jurisdiction over civilians. A 1983 case involving the trial and sentencing of a U.S. serviceman in a manner which did not meet standards of due process set forth in the applicable status of forces agreement is still under review by Greek authorities.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The inviolability of the home as well as of an individual's personal and family life are guaranteed by the Constitution. No house search may be made except when and as specified by law and always in the presence of representatives of the judicial power. Warrants, issued by a district attorney (who is considered a judicial officer in Greece), are required for an official to enter a private home. These constitutional guarantees are respected in practice. A constitutional provision requires punishment and "liability for full damages to the sufferer" for violations of the sanctuary of the home and for the abuse of power. The Constitution further guarantees privacy of correspondence and communication, and this guarantee was respected in practice in 1985.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice.

The Constitution guarantees freedom of the press and prohibits censorship. Opposition viewpoints are constantly ventilated in the active Greek press, and criticism of the Government is unhampered. Greece's television and radio stations are government-owned and operated. The political opposition states that news and information programming reflects the political perspective of the governing party while its own views are given short shrift. The government response is that it has opened television to the opposition. During elections, television time is given to all major political parties according to their electoral strength. The Constitution allows for seizure, by order of the public prosecutor, of publications which insult the President, offend religious beliefs, contain obscene articles, advocate a violent overthrow of the political system, or disclose military and defense information. No periodicals or newspapers were seized in 1985. Greece has strict libel laws. Violations of these laws are prosecuted under established legal procedures with the safeguards of due process.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the Constitution. Limits on outdoor public meetings exist, however, if police authorities determine that a serious disturbance of social and economic life is threatened. In 1985 no public assemblies were prohibited.

The right of association is guaranteed by the Constitution and observed in practice. Workers and employers are free to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without prior authorization, to draw up their own constitutions and rules, elect their representatives, and formulate their programs. They are also free to join in confederations and affiliate with international organizations. Both employer and trade union organizations maintain relations with the International Labor Organization. Trade union and employer organizations are protected against dissolution by administrative authority.

The right to organize and bargain collectively is guaranteed by law. An estimated 35 percent of Greek wage and salary earners are organized in some 4,000 trade unions. As provided by a 1982 law, the purpose of trade unions is to safeguard and promote the occupational, economic, social, and trade union interests of their members. In practice, Greek unions vigorously represent their members in pursuit of those aims. There is one current potential constraint on collective bargaining. As part of its austerity program, the Government on October 18, 1985 issued a legislative act which prohibits through 1987 increases of any kind of compensation which exceed the increases provided by the Government's wage indexation policy.

GREECE

The right to strike is guaranteed by the Constitution and by statute to both public and private sector workers with the exception of judiciary functionaries and those serving in the security services, who are prohibited from striking. Other employees of the State or public corporations whose operation is of vital importance in serving the needs of the society may strike only after 4 days' prior notice to their employer, the respective ministry, and the Ministry of Labor. Striking trade unions in such categories are required to supply the necessary staff to meet the essential requirements of the population during the strike.

The main political parties in Greece maintain trade union affiliates, and most Greek trade unionists belong to or support one of those affiliates. In general, the trade union affiliates follow the guidance of their respective political parties. All Greek wage earners by law contribute 0.25 percent of their basic wage to a Ministry of Labor organ known as the Workers' Hearth (Ergatiki Estia). Employers make a matching contribution. The Workers' Hearth uses that fund to finance trade union activities, apportioning funds to the unions in accordance with membership figures. The Minister of Labor has discretionary control over 8 percent of those funds.

The prevailing religion is Eastern Orthodox. The Constitution guarantees freedom of religion and prohibits discriminatory practices against religious minorities, which in Greece include small communities of Muslims, Jews, and non-Orthodox Christians. Proselytizing is forbidden by the Constitution.

Greece's small community of Jehovah's Witnesses was affected by the provision in the Constitution which states that "no person shall be exempt from discharging his obligations to the state or may refuse to comply with laws by reason of his religious convictions." In deference to Jehovah's Witnesses, the Government in 1979 modified the compulsory military service law to provide for alternative, noncombat service. Although courts of first instance have, on occasion, handed down lengthy sentences to conscientious objectors who refused military or alternative service altogether, prison terms are sharply reduced in the appellate process. Under the law, a conscientious objector may work in conjunction with his prison sentence so that, in practice, he does not serve a sentence longer than his period of military obligation and could serve a shorter period. In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International stated that it knew of some 300 Jehovah's Witnesses imprisoned for conscientious objection to military service.

Amnesty International also noted 285 instances of the arrest of Jehovah's Witnesses for "proselytism," an activity prohibited by the Constitution. Of the 81 cases brought to trial, 14 were given suspended sentences with parole, 58 were acquitted, and 9 were deferred to 1985 and are still pending. The December 1984 conviction of three Protestant missionaries sentenced on charges of proselytizing and causing involuntary abandonment of home by a minor is still pending appeal.

The Muslim minority of approximately 120,000, made up largely of ethnic Turks, is principally located in Thrace in northeastern Greece. The Treaty of Lausanne (1923) includes provisions relating to the educational and political rights of the Muslim minority, all of whom are Greek citizens. Three Muslim members serve in the national Parliament, many villages in Thrace regularly elect Muslim mayors, and there are over 250 mosques in Greece. Members of the Muslim community and Turkish-Muslim organizations located outside Greece have complained that Turkish-language teaching materials imported from Turkey are vetted by Greek officials, as are Turkish teachers assigned to Muslim schools. The Greek Government states that educational materials and teachers are examined to assure they meet Greek standards. Some Muslim leaders have complained that they are not allowed to purchase land from non-Muslims. Greek officials maintain that there is no impediment to the Muslim right to purchase land. There is no evidence that these difficulties reflect a deliberate government policy of political, religious, or cultural repression of the Muslim community. Tensions between Greece and Turkey have made each country's perception of the treatment of its coreligionists in the other country a highly emotional issue, and both countries have viewed human rights questions in light of historical and political differences. There does not, however, appear to be either a generalized pattern of abuses or a policy of official discrimination by the Greek Government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees freedom of movement within the country, foreign travel, and emigration. This right is generally respected in practice. Persons intending to emigrate and those returning to Greece experience no discrimination. The Greek citizenship code authorizes expatriation of a citizen of non-Greek ethnic origin who is residing abroad; some Greek citizens of ethnic Turkish background have alleged that their Greek citizenship was revoked while they were studying in Turkey. The Government states that the provision has been used very sparingly, and only after it has been determined that the citizen in question has severed material ties with Greece and established a permanent existence elsewhere. Refugees are not forced to return to homelands from which they have fled.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Greece is a multiparty democracy in which all citizens enjoy full political rights, without regard to race, sex, religion, or political persuasion. Greek citizens freely choose the laws and officials governing them. The opposition parties function freely, have access to the media, and hold public meetings.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has not objected to visits and investigations by human rights organizations. Amnesty International in its 1985 Report expressed concern about cases of conscientious objectors who had been imprisoned, and of Jehovah's Witnesses who had been detained and prosecuted for "proselytism." Freedom House rated Greece "free."

GREECE

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

A country of just under 10 million people, Greece has a relatively high standard of living. Per capita gross national product (GNP) in 1985 was estimated at $3,400.

The economy is experiencing problems of budget and current account deficits, and high inflation persists. The rate of inflation, as measured by the consumer price index, is expected to be about 20 percent for 1985, up from 18.5 percent in 1984. Greece has a tradition of state economic activities, and the public sector accounts for over 50 percent of GNP. The Government has established a wide range of controls on retail and wholesale prices, placed strict limitations on the transfer of private capital abroad, rationed credit, and restricted the ability of companies to lay off workers.

Greeks are well-fed: the ratio of calorie supply relative to nutritional requirements is 139 percent. Life expectancy at birth is about 74 years. The adult literacy rate is 91 percent for the population over 10 years old but almost 100 percent for adults below 55 years of age. The infant mortality rate is 14 per 1,000 live births. The Government has a program for upgrading health services, but the quality and availability of medical care, particularly outside the major cities, is often substandard.

The minimum age for work in industry is 15. However, legislation and regulations provide higher minimum ages for work in specified areas or specific jobs. For example, those performing loading or unloading work must be at least 18, while workers for the ports of Piraeus and Thessaloniki must be 21.

The minimum daily wage in Greece as of September 1, 1985, is approximately $10. The work week is 40 hours in the private sector and 37.5 hours in the public sector. Minimum standards of occupational health and safety are provided for by legislation.

Women are guaranteed by the Constitution the same individual, political, and social rights as men. Women play an active yet still minority role in the political life of the country. At present there are 11 women in the 300-member Parliament. One woman minister and 2 deputy ministers in the cabinet and 5 of the 44 regional governors are women. The position of women in Greek society has undergone rapid change in conjunction with the process of industrialization and modernization. The Government has given concerted attention to the role of women and instituted significant reforms in marriage, divorce, and property laws. Women comprise over one-third of the industrial labor force, and the percentage is increasing.

HUNGARY

Hungary is ruled by the leadership of the Hungarian Socialist Workers (Communist) Party which maintains a complete monopoly on political power. Although most civil rights are prescribed by the Constitution, in practice the exercise of such rights is often arbitrarily restricted. Since the early 1960's, the party has gradually eased internal controls and fostered a greater degree of economic well-being. Political expression is still tightly controlled, and participation in the political process is not possible outside the limits set by the party.

The Soviet Union has maintained military forces in Hungary since the end of World War II. In excess of 60,000 Soviet soldiers are currently stationed there.

During the first half of 1985, Hungary held its first local council and parliamentary elections in which multiple nominees were compulsory. Members of the democratic opposition, environmentalists, and reform economists attempted to gain nominations but were unsuccessful.

The secret police and other coercive institutions exist but have become somewhat more circumspect. On the legal side, a recent Hungarian decree reinforced the terms of the police surveillance law. Other decrees in recent years have strengthened the power of the police to search citizens without cause and tightened state control over duplicating machines and over persons without regular employment.

Economic reform is still the key to Hungary's relatively tolerant domestic policies. Although the country has survived 3 years of belt-tightening without too much domestic complaint, the Government is trying to cope with growing popular unhappiness about rising prices and a stationary standard of living by allowing modest wage increases. Hungarians as a whole are significantly freer of the type of economic restrictions and interference with private life which characterize other Warsaw Pact states.

Hungary's human rights record showed some improvement in 1985. As of early October, some dissidents who previously had been unable to receive passports suddenly found themselves free to travel. At the same time, a police surveillance order imposed for political purposes on a dissident economist and writer was removed. Also in October, members of a rock band who had received prison sentences for singing anti-Socialist songs and a stage director sentenced to 7 months in prison on charges of "pornography and Fascism" were released. Purveyors of "samizdat" (self-published) materials continued their activities with the usual harassment by the authorities in the form of fines and the confiscation of those materials. The possibilities of emigration and, especially, visits abroad, including to Western countries, continued as before.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing'

There is no evidence that killing for political motives occurred in Hungary in 1985.

HUNGARY

b. Disappearance

There have been no reported disappearances in Hungary during 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

No known instances of torture have occurred in Hungary in recent years. Citizens, in principle, may bring complaints against the police.

There are three levels of punitive incarceration in Hungary: "workhouse," which allows some privileges of visiting, outside work, and leaving; "jail," which is more punitive; and "prison," which means a maximum-security penitentiary. Confinement conditions vary in relation to the category of incarceration, but all levels are believed to provide adequate diet and health care. Hardened criminals are confined separately from those convicted of petty crimes. With varying degrees of frequency, depending on levels of imprisonment, prisoners have rights to visitation by family members, other relatives, and friends. There does not appear to be deliberate, willful, or systematic mistreatment of prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Citizens seem generally free from arbitrary arrest. Upon arrest, a detainee must be informed in writing of what offense he or she is suspected of having committed and may be held at a police station for a maximum of 72 hours before charges must be filed. There is no right of bail or provisional pretrial liberty. In cases of suspicion for major crimes, a person can be held in jail 30 days before trial, renewable twice for a maximum of 3 months.

The penal code contains an article on incitement which permits officials to prosecute for a wide range of utterances or statements. Some individuals have reportedly been sentenced for denouncing the Communist Party or the Soviet occupation of Hungary. It is not clear how many cases of incitement involve political matters. According to the office of the Chief Public Prosecutor, in 1984 crimes against the state decreased by 50 percent.

A penal code provision concerning "espionage" provides for punishing "a person who obtains, collects, or gives out data which can be used against the Hungarian People's Republic with the purpose of forwarding them to a foreign government or organization...." Neither the nature of the data transmitted nor the nature of the recipient organization is clearly defined, thus allowing a broad interpretation by the authorities of the kind of "data" considered to be proscribed.

Under an amendment to the criminal code which went into effect in 1985, a person "who is capable of working but follows a way of life of vagrancy" may be punished by loss of liberty for up to 2 years or by reformatory and educative labor or by a fine. During the first half of 1985, Hungarian courts sentenced 80 persons to corrective training work. Many Gypsies have been sentenced under this law. There is no evidence that the law has been used against political dissidents.

HUNGARY

The police surveillance law was strengthened in 1985 to permit the police to place under surveillance or in internal exile any citizen or resident of Hungary above the age of 16 (rather than 18) for a period of 2 years (rather than 1 year), renewable for an additional year, if that person's attitude represents a permanent danger to the internal order or public security of the country.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution stipulates that all court proceedings are open, except for cases specifically exempted by law (those involving morals or state secrets). There are few closed trials in Hungary. Those which are closed usually involve "national security," not otherwise defined. In general, judicial procedures are investigatory rather than adversarial in nature. There is no trial by jury. Defendants have the right to choose their own counsel. Courts normally seek to apply the law in a methodical fashion. Nonpolitical trials are more likely to be handled in an impartial manner than are trials involving offenses considered to be political. Some 10-15 young men are serving jail sentences of up to 3 years for having refused conscription on the grounds of conscientious objection to military service.

An undetermined number of citizens, including some who opt to flee instead of serving in the military, may be incarcerated for attempting to leave Hungary without government permission.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution guarantees citizens' personal freedom and inviolability, as well as the secrecy of correspondence and privacy of the home, but these are violated when the authorities determine such violation to be in the State's interest. However, search warrants are generally obtained. House searches are conducted by a court order and must be carried out in the presence of two witnesses. A written inventory of items removed from the premises must be prepared. These procedures are generally adhered to.

Since the 1960's, Hungarian practice has become more tolerant than previously with respect to a person's private activities. Formal systems for gathering information on people, such as the widespread use of informers and block wardens and overt intrusions of the police into the daily life of persons, have been substantially curtailed. It is widely assumed, however, that private telephone lines are tapped and correspondence opened when the authorities have an interest in doing so.

Though it is expensive by Hungarian standards to do so, Hungarians may subscribe to nonpolitical Western publications. Subscribers to National Geographic magazine did not receive the June 1985 edition, however, which was made unavailable in Hungary because of a cover story on Afghanistan.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees free speech and free press, but these rights are qualified by the need to conform to the "interests of socialism and the people."

HUNGARY

According to Hungarian press law, a Hungarian citizen may not speak publicly against the Communist form of government or Hungary's alliance with the Soviet Union. A citizen who opposes basic tenets publicly may be subjected to varying measures of admonition, harassment, and punishment.

Pervasive self-censorship in cultural and media circles determines the boundaries of free expression. The authorities have banned the circulation of certain books, magazines, and articles considered not to conform with accepted positions. The right to publish is restricted for political reasons. In 1985, poet Gaspar Nagy was forced to resign from the official Writers Association under government pressure due to a poem he had published in a regional literary journal addressing the fate of former Premier Imre Nagy, who was executed following the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. In November Sandor Lezsak, the director of a provincial cultural center, was dismissed after organizing an exhibition illustrating the works of poets, including dissidents and emigres.

Party and government authorities closely supervise the press, radio, and television, which are government-owned and must adhere to the party's ideological guidelines. Although some carefully nuanced differing views occasionally appear in the press, they are usually well within the general constraints imposed by the party. The public medium which enjoys the greatest degree of freedom of political expression is film, although the more politically controversial examples are typically withheld from public distribution until the authorities deem fit.

Infrequently, Western viewpoints can be heard on Hungarian radio and television. These may be the views of a Western spokesman, broadcast together with those of other participants in a panel discussion, or straight reporting of a Western official's comments on a topical international issue, such as U.S.-Soviet relations. Hungary does not normally jam Western radio broadcasts. However, some broadcasts carrying interviews with former Hungarian Prime Minister Andras Hegedus may have been jammed. Austrian and Yugoslav radio and television broadcasts reach much of the country.

Hungary permits some access to Western literature, films, television programs, and nonpolitical publications. In October 1985 Western periodicals including the International Herald Tribune, Le Monde, The Sunday Times of London, and Die Presse were made available for local currency at centrally located kiosks and transportation centers.

Dissident activity in Hungary remains largely confined to several hundred intellectuals who live primarily in Budapest, although numbers of working-class youths have also been arrested for expressing dissatisfaction with the system. Hungarian dissidents meet irregularly for private discussion of political and other topics. Hungary's economic progress during the last decade, its emphasis on consumerism, and its willingness to permit more frequent travel to the West than do other Warsaw Pact nations, have served to undercut the appeal of dissidents to a broader public. However, the governmental decision to go ahead with a highly controversial dam on the Hungarian-Czechoslovakian border has increased the public appeal of those dissidents most concerned with the environment.

HUNGARY

The Government has shown a general willingness to tolerate some expressions of dissent without explicit reply or rejoinder. It is prepared, however, to harass political dissidents to keep them in check and has occasionally expelled them or encouraged their emigration to the West.

One group of dissidents is active in the preparation and distribution of prohibited articles and books in "samizdat" (self-published) form. Since 1982 the authorities have engaged in a campaign of harassment against these activists. Occasional press articles have attacked the dissidents and their alleged Western supporters. A high level of activity, however, continues.

No arrests for dissident activity are known to have occurred in 1985. The police in Budapest have the power to impose fines on persons involved in unauthorized publishing by administrative means without the need to resort to court trial. They exercise this power regularly. The authorities also seek to discourage, or at least moderate, dissident activities by influencing job possibilities, both positively and negatively, and by treating travel requests by dissidents arbitrarily.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of assembly and the right to form associations, government approval or tacit acceptance is required for the exercise of these rights. At the outset of the 1985 Budapest Cultural Forum of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the authorities refused to allow the International Helsinki Federation to meet with local and foreign writers in a Budapest hotel. The symposium was transferred to private apartments and was not disrupted by the police. Some dissidents meet frequently at an informal "free university" in Budapest, where academicians and dissidents lecture on topics which are not discussed in formal university institutions.

The Hungarian National Trade Union Council, one of the party's mass organizations, is controlled and directed by the party. It serves the purpose of indoctrinating workers in party policy as well as representing worker interests within certain bounds. The Chairman of the council is a member of the party Politburo. He represents the council in meetings with the party leadership and with the Government over labor policy, economic planning, prices, wages, and other economic issues. On the local and enterprise level, the council has a veto right over state nominations of managers and administers a system of shop distribution of bonus money, profit sharing, enterprise-controlled housing, health care, union vacation plans, and other benefits. Stewards can veto management decisions on personnel actions, plant safety, and other work-related issues which do not comply with collective agreements and labor regulations. Disputed questions are referred to higher authorities for arbitration. The National Trade Union Council is currently holding elections for the majority of union offices and has incorporated some of the electoral reforms employed in the 1985 parliamentary and local council elections.

The Constitution does not provide for the right to strike. Although work stoppages have taken place in local industries in recent years, there has not been a major strike affecting an entire industrial sector in almost a quarter of a century.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although freedom of conscience and freedom of religious practice are guaranteed in the Constitution, they are subject to restrictions. Steadfastly committed to atheism, the authorities for tactical reasons profess the acceptability of believers and nonbelievers working together in the interest of "socialist society." The Government has generally maintained good relations with the hierarchies of the major religious denominations, many of which have representatives in the National Assembly. Professed religious beliefs, however, may limit the citizen's advancement in government, industry, and the professions.

There are some 19 significant religious denominations in Hungary which are recognized by law, plus several small sects, such as Jehovah's Witnesses which are not. Sizable religious groups in Hungary include Roman Catholics (5.25 million), Reformed Calvinists (2 million), Evangelical Lutherans (0.5 million), and Jews (100,000). The total number of persons manifesting some religious belief is estimated at 8.5 million out of a population of 10.7 million.

In church-state relations, progress toward the establishment of a new religious order of nuns dedicated to the care of elderly and infirm citizens was halted by government officials in 1985, who backed away from an earlier understanding authorizing the order. The successful visit of American evangelist Billy Graham generated positive publicity for church-state relations and demonstrated the continuing close connections Hungarians maintain with their religious counterparts in other countries.

Religious denominations in Hungary have generally good access to religious materials, including Bibles and prayer books. In many cases, they print their own. They also publish periodicals and newspapers which, however, are subject to the same state control as all other publications.

During 1985, party and state officials expressed continued interest in cooperating with religious denominations on social matters of mutual concern, such as the provision of adequate health care, the high divorce and alcohol rates, and juvenile delinquency.

The churches do not act as organizing centers for dissent. Specialized dissension has grown up within the Catholic Church centering around the "basic community" movement, which has accused the hierarchy of being dogmatic and "collaborationist." The Hungarian authorities have not detained or arrested any clergy, but approximately 10-15 young men have been sentenced to prison terms ranging up to 3 years for refusing military service. The right of conscientious objection is recognized for only two small denominations, the Nazarenes and the Jehovah's Witnesses.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

All adult citizens are issued an identity booklet and must carry it with them at all times. They must register with local police when moving from one locality to another. Although it is possible to transfer permanently from rural areas to Budapest, this is not encouraged because of overcrowding and a scarcity of housing in the capital. The gainfully employed also carry a "work book" which is their lifetime record of employment locations and positions.

Since 1982, Hungary has followed a cautiously liberal practice in permitting visits to the West. More than 500,000 Hungarians currently visit the West annually, while more than 5 million visits are made annually to Warsaw Pact countries. Hungarian citizens now legally have the opportunity to visit the West at least once a year--instead of every third year as before--if relatives or friends abroad pay the costs. The modest hard currency allotment private travelers can receive once every 3 years to defray hard currency expenses was increased, and a new supplemental amount is now available to travelers to the West using their own private cars.

Exit permission for both Hungarian tourists and emigrants can be and occasionally is denied for vague "reasons of state." There are indications that such permission in certain instances has been denied to dissidents in order to influence their activities. Although the pertinent law states that all Hungarians have the right to travel, it is also so qualified as clearly to leave the decision to the State.

Hungarian emigration law is restrictive. A person can normally apply to emigrate only if joining a parent, spouse, or child abroad. However, the law provides for exceptions in individual cases, and approximately 90 percent of Hungarians who are eligible to apply to emigrate for purposes of family reunification receive permission. Persons who are refused permission to emigrate may appeal and reapply. Reapplications are sometimes successful, particularly if there are special humanitarian considerations. There are no systematic official sanctions, such as loss of employment or housing, imposed on persons who seek to emigrate, and emigrants may take a modest amount of personal property with them.

Persons who have emigrated legally from Hungary have a legal right to return upon application. They must establish that there is housing and employment or an income available to them. Persons who leave Hungary as visitors with permission to stay abroad only temporarily and who then fail to return are subject to prosecution and sentencing under the civil code. Hungary appears to follow, however, a discretionary practice of treating such persons leniently, if they return. Prosecution may not occur or, when it does, may lead to a suspended sentence. Assiduous prosecution and other sanctions, such as deprivation of former employment, are possible.

Regulations introduced in recent years liberalized and simplified procedures for Hungarians to obtain permission to work abroad for up to 5 years. Permission is not always granted. The regulations envisage that a person may take his or her family. The worker must agree to remit 20 percent of hard currency earnings to the Hungarian national bank, which will convert them into a Hungarian currency account that may be utilized by the worker within Hungary. The worker will be able to retain the remainder of the salary in hard currency.

HUNGARY

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Hungary is ruled by the leadership of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party. Political participation is not possible outside the party or party-sanctioned organizations. The Constitution states that the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party represents the "working class" and the "interests of the whole of the society." The party uses mass organizations such as the Patriotic People's Front, trade unions, and the Communist Youth League to elicit public support. To a growing extent, the party invites the opinions and recommendations of nonparty organizations (for example, cooperatives' associations) on policy proposals in which they have an interest, but implementation is at the discretion of the party.

In the 1985 elections, 90 percent of the seats in the National Assembly and all seats in local councils were contested by at least two candidates. Although candidates did not necessarily have to be members of the Communist Party, all had to announce that they accepted the platform of the party-controlled Patriotic People's Front and had been deemed acceptable by that body. No other political parties were allowed. Several members of the democratic opposition who attempted to establish candidacies were barred from participation in the nominating process.

The Government refuses to accept outside charges or investigations of alleged human rights violations on the grounds that this is "interference in internal affairs." Hungary has shown, however, a willingness to engage in discussions with other countries on all aspects of the Helsinki Final Act, including its human rights provisions. This tolerance did not extend to allowing the privately-organized International Helsinki Federation to hold a cultural symposium in a hotel during the opening of the 1985 Cultural Forum. The symposium was, however, held in private apartments.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International was concerned about the imprisonment of conscientious objectors to military service. It was also concerned about short-term arrests and administrative measures, such as fines and curfews, imposed on people for the nonviolent exercise of their right to freedom of expression. Freedom House rated Hungary "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Hungary's population of 10.7 million is slowly declining. The annual rate of growth is minus 0.2 percent. Per capita gross national product in 1983 was $2,150.

Industrialized and increasingly decentralized, Hungary's economy has many features which are unique in Eastern Europe. Most state-owned enterprises enjoy a high degree of autonomy. Workers in much of industry were allowed or required in 1985 to vote on new managers rather than having them appointed from above. Government economic authorities do not impose specific production quotas on enterprises. Most consumer prices, especially for food items, are set largely by free market forces. There are no food shortages. Private farming activities have long been encouraged on both state and cooperative farms. Moreover, the Government has recently begun to encourage private enterprise-type activities in the consumer services sector and in small units within industrial enterprises. In short, through a combination of flexible prices and enterprise autonomy, as well as through government encouragement of private enterprise-type activities, Hungary has produced an economic system that is more sensitive to consumer needs than those of other Eastern European countries.

Hungary's standard of living, relatively high for Eastern Europe, is reflected in such measurements drawn from World Bank data as a life expectancy at birth of 72 years, an infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births of 20.2 (though this is a deterioration from previous years), and a ratio of caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements of 131.8 percent. Emphasis on education has yielded an adult literacy rate of 98.9 percent. In 1980, the primary school enrollment ratio was 130.7 overall, with no significant difference between male and female children.

The minimum age for the employment of children is 15 with restrictions pertaining to shifts and night work. There are no restrictions on minors older than 16 years of age. Although there is no national minimum wage in Hungary, wage charts are set for each profession according to the qualifications of the jobholder. The average workweek is approximately 45 hours. All Hungarians have a right to a minimum of 15 days of paid vacation per year; they are entitled to one additional day for each 3 years of service.

Women account for one-eighth of the management positions in Hungarian industry and agriculture. Approximately half of these individuals attained their positions within the past 5 years. Women's share of the more senior jobs, such as general director at state industrial complexes, is considerably lower. Women's share of professional positions has been increasing. At present, 7.6 percent of Hungarian women are professionals, compared to 8.6 percent of men.

More than one-fifth of the members of the National Assembly are women. There are very few women at top levels in the government or party. Only one Deputy Premier of the 23 members of the Council of Ministers and 4 of the 21 members of the Presidential Council are female.

A large number of Gypsies (estimates range up to 5 percent of the population) live in Hungary. They are not recognized as an official minority. The Government engages in many programs specifically designed to raise the standard of living of Gypsies and help them to adjust to the mainstream of Hungarian life. Gypsies are on average, however, considerably less well educated and poorer than the majority Magyar population or the recognized ethnic minorities. Candid discussion continues to appear in the press and specialized literature about the social and economic difficulties experienced by Gypsies, including the fact that considerable popular prejudice exists.

ICELAND

Iceland is a modern democratic social welfare state with a parliamentary institution--the Althing--which is the oldest elected parliament in the world. Iceland's highly literate and educated people take an active interest in politics and participate in high percentages in the country's regular multiparty elections. Iceland has no military forces or political security apparatus. There is a small, professional police force. Icelanders enjoy a fair and efficient civil and criminal justice system and are strong defenders of individual human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Politically motivated killings have not occurred in Iceland.

b. Disappearance

There have been no known cases of abductions or hostage-taking in Iceland in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by law and do not occur in practice. Prison conditions are excellent by international standards. The number of prisoners confined in Iceland is numbered in the tens, most of whom are held under light security conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Due process of law is guaranteed in Icelandic legal codes and observed in practice. The Constitution guarantees that any person detained by the authorities must be brought before a judge within 24 hours and charged, bound over, or released. There is no preventive detention or forced labor. There have been no allegations of arbitrary arrest.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A fair and public trial is standard practice. Icelandic courts are free of political control, though the lower court system is administered by the Ministry of Justice. The Supreme Court carefully guards its complete independence. There are no special or military courts. Right to counsel is guaranteed, and the state pays attorneys' fees when defendants cannot. Juries are not normally used, but multiple-judge courts are common, particularly on appeal. The small population allows a relatively informal administration of justice, but due process is rigorously observed. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Icelandic law and practice are based on longstanding regard for the autonomy of the individual and the impropriety of government interference with the personal rights of citizens. Judicial warrants are required for entry into homes, except in cases of hot pursuit. Arbitrary intrusions by official entities, political organizations, or any other organized group into the personal liberties of Icelanders have not occurred.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

In Iceland, a vigorous and independent press, a legal system which includes safeguards for individual rights, and a functioning democratic political system combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. Censorship is applied to print and film materials to control public display of pornography and violence, but there is no government censorship of any news media.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Individuals in Iceland are free to join together formally or informally to promote nonviolent causes or to protest government policies or actions. An active web of voluntary organizations plays a large part in the social and political life of the country. All such organizations are free to maintain international contacts.

Workers and employers in Iceland have and make extensive use of the right to establish organizations, to draw up their own constitutions and rules, to choose their own policies and representatives, and to be represented in negotiations on wages, working conditions, and the settlement of labor disputes. The labor movement is highly organized and democratic. It permeates the entire work force and spans the political spectrum. Labor unions are active and influential in national economic and political life and in the development and administration of a comprehensive social welfare system.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Lutheran Church is the established church of Iceland, and the vast majority of Icelanders are nominally Lutheran. There is complete freedom for other faiths. Religious affiliation is not a factor in political or social life.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Icelanders have complete freedom to travel at home and abroad, emigrate, and return to Iceland at will.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The political system is a fully functioning parliamentary democracy with a high level of individual participation in politics. A wide range of voluntary organizations and interest groups represent diverse political interests and interact with the formal parliamentary structure. The last national election, in April 1983, resulted in the orderly transfer of power to a new coalition government composed of two political parties in May 1983. There are four political parties in the parliamentary opposition. Voter turnout is high for all elections. The use of party primaries, proportional representation in multimember districts, and a cultural insistence on representation of the views of all parties in public affairs contribute to an active formal and informal political life.

There are no known allegations of human rights violations in Iceland. Iceland, which has an active interest in human rights matters, is represented on the European Human Rights Commission of the Council of Europe and has provided a judge to the European Human Rights Court. Several human rights organizations in Iceland, including Amnesty International, take an active interest in international human rights questions. Amnesty International did not comment on Iceland in its 1985 Report, and Freedom House rated Iceland "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Iceland has an ethnically homogeneous population of 241,000 which enjoys a high standard of living and the benefits of a social welfare state on the Scandinavian model. The World Bank estimates that in 1985 Iceland's population growth was 1 percent and its gross national product per capita in 1983 was $10,260.

Food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all Icelanders without discrimination. Medical care and education through the university level are free or available at a very nominal cost. Consequently, the Icelandic people have a high rate of school enrollment (99.7 percent of children of school age in 1982), a low infant mortality rate (5.8 per 1,000 live births in 1985), and a long life expectancy (77 years at birth in 1985).

In addition to the right to organize unions, Icelandic workers benefit from numerous laws protecting their health and safety and guaranteeing health and unemployment insurance, paid vacations, and minimum wages (currently $2.31 per hour). The employment of children below the age of 16 in factories, on ships, and in other places where hazardous conditions prevail or hard labor is required, is prohibited by law.

Icelanders are fiercely egalitarian. Women participate freely in social and political life. Nevertheless, women are underrepresented in the professions, management, and politics and are continuing efforts to expand their roles and rights. In the 1983 parliamentary election, a national women's list slate resulted in the election of 3 more women to the Althing, which now has 9 women out of a total membership of 60. Iceland's Chief of State is a woman.

IRELAND

The Republic of Ireland is a parliamentary democracy with a long tradition of orderly transfer of power. Individual liberties and civil rights are guaranteed by the 1937 Irish Constitution.

Successive Irish Governments have had to deal with the spillover into the Republic of recurring outbreaks of violence in Northern Ireland. In recent years, the spillover of violence has included the assassinations of the British Ambassador (1976) and Lord Mountbatten (1979), as well as the deaths of individual police officers, soldiers, and others due to the actions of the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) and Irish National Liberation Army (INLA) elements. This violence has led successive Irish Governments to adopt special legislation to deal with acts of terrorism. During 1985 the Government has sought to apply such special legislation with fairness and balance.

Ireland attaches great importance to the observance and maintenance of human rights both in theory and practice. It places strong emphasis on human rights in formulating foreign policy and plays an active role in human rights questions in the United Nations.

On November 15, 1985, the Irish and British Governments concluded an agreement which gives the Irish Government a consultative role in certain Northern Ireland affairs. Both the Irish and British Parliaments subsequently approved the agreement.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Politically motivated killings occasionally occur in Ireland as a spillover from the violence in Northern Ireland. In these cases, such groups as PIRA or INLA usually claim responsibility. There were at least three slayings generally attributed to these two groups in the Republic in 1985; in one of these PIRA claimed responsibility. Both the Government and the population as a whole strongly deplore these actions. The Government uses the full force of the law to pursue and prosecute such cases.

b. Disappearance

People are not abducted, secretly arrested, or held in clandestine detention by the Irish authorities, nor does the Irish Government condone such practices by any element of society. Various terrorist groups have sometimes resorted to kidnapping for political purposes, most recently in 1983. In all such cases of political kidnapping, the Irish Government uses full police power either to prevent or solve the crime.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment is respected in practice by the Government. From time to time, including in Amnesty International's 1985 Report, allegations are made that individual officers have used physical abuse during interrogations or have mistreated prisoners. Such allegations are investigated by the Government, and, where warranted, charges have been brought or convictions overturned. Some civil rights groups, however, are not fully satisfied with existing investigative procedures, and the Government plans to introduce legislation establishing an independent Police Complaint Review Board.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution contains provisions implementing its guarantee that "no citizen shall be deprived of his personal liberty save in accordance with law." For example, it requires that full charges, in writing, be made available to any individual placed under arrest. Neither in law nor in practice is anyone subject to arrest for the expression of political or religious views. Arrest is carried out openly by warrant, and the right to a fair and speedy trial with full right of legal counsel exists in law and practice. Detention without charge is restricted. It is, however, permitted for a maximum of 48 hours in cases tried in "special courts" for offenses against national security. After this period the individual must be brought before a magistrate, presented with written charges, and given legal representation.

An omnibus Criminal Justice Act, passed by Parliament in November 1984 in response to growing urban crime and drug problems, gives some increased powers to the police in the area of detention for interrogation. Critics have argued that these provisions could diminish human rights. However, key provisions of the Act dealing with detention, among other things, cannot be put into effect under the terms of the Act itself until the Police Complaint Review Board has been established. Moreover, supporters of the bill point out that under the proposed law, the Irish police would have less power to detain and interrogate suspects than the police forces of other European Community states. There is no forced labor in Ireland.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Fair public trial is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. The courts are independent, and jury trial is the norm. The Constitution provides for the creation of "special courts" to deal with cases where the "ordinary courts are inadequate to secure the effective administration of justice, and the preservation of public peace and order." The "Offenses Against the State Act" of 1939 formally established such courts and provided that they may try persons for offenses against national security. These courts are used in response to the spillover of violence from Northern Ireland. Rather than having juries, these courts have panels of judges, each consisting of an uneven number of judges but never less than three. Their verdicts are by majority vote. Rules of evidence are similar to those of regular courts, except that the statement of a police chief superintendent that the accused is a member of an illegal organization is considered evidence of such membership. Court sessions are usually public but may exclude certain persons, other than genuine press representatives. There is provision for free legal aid and appeal against conviction or sentence.

IRELAND

There is no provision under Irish law for use of political offense arguments to evade prosecution or otherwise receive special consideration in law enforcement and judicial processes. Such arguments are often made by members of PIRA and other illegal organizations convicted of terrorist offenses.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution protects the basic human right of noninterference with personal privacy, family, home, or correspondence which is generally observed. The Constitution, also provides that the State shall enact no law "providing for the grant of the dissolution of marriage." Arguing that divorce is a basic human and family right, an Irish couple, in late 1983, persuaded the European Court of Human Rights to review denial of their right to a divorce as a case of denial of human rights. The case is pending. In addition, the question is under active review in the Irish Parliament.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and generally respected in practice. The State endeavors to insure that organs of public opinion, while preserving liberty of expression (including criticism of government policy) shall not be used to undermine public order, morality, or the authority of the State. Furthermore, "publication or utterance of blasphemous, seditious or indecent matter" is an offense punishable by law.

Ordinarily, such censorship as exists in Ireland is directed largely toward materials considered pornographic in nature. However, the state-owned radio and television networks, on the basis of the constitutional provisions dealing with public order and the authority of the State, have a longstanding practice of denying air time to representatives of Provisional Sinn Fein, the political wing of the illegal PIRA. In late 1982, this prohibition was challenged before the Irish Supreme Court and upheld on constitutional grounds. All other legal political parties are given full and regular access to both public-owned radio and television facilities and major independent daily newspapers. Criticism of the Government in such media is not only allowed but flourishes.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. Terrorist organizations such as PIRA are illegal, and membership in them is an offense against national security. The INLA was added to the list of banned organizations in early 1983. Political parties or groups associated with such organizations, such as Provisional Sinn Fein, are not proscribed.

Labor unions have full freedom to organize independently from the Government and engage in free collective bargaining. The Irish Congress of Trade Unions, which represents unions in both the Republic and Northern Ireland, has 89 member unions with over 650,000 members. The Irish Labor Party has not had formal links to the trade union movement since the 1930's, but many union officials and members play an active role in politics through the parties of their choice. Labor unions are permitted to conduct protests, including secondary and wildcat strikes. There are no compulsory settlement procedures.

c. Freedom of Religion

Ireland is 94 percent Roman Catholic. The Constitution guarantees freedom to all religious groups. There are no restrictions on freedom of worship or association.

Discrimination in employment, education, and other fields based on religious grounds has not been alleged. Some Irish laws, such as the prohibition against divorce, reflect the point of view of the majority community. The area of family law is the subject of much current debate in which minority religious communities have felt fully at liberty to take a vocal and active role.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is complete freedom of movement within the country as well as freedom to engage in foreign travel, emigration, and voluntary repatriation. Ireland has accepted displaced persons on a limited basis.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Ireland has had a consistent history of orderly transfer of power by elections since the end of the Irish Civil War in 1923. Ireland has two major parties, three smaller parties, and provision for independents to stand for election to either house of the Irish Parliament. The constitutional requirement that elections be held at least every 5 years has always been met. Ireland uses a proportional voting system, and the secrecy of the ballot is fully safeguarded. The Government elected in November 1982 is a two-party coalition in which the party leader of the larger party serves as Prime Minister.

The Irish Government generally cooperates with independent outside investigations of alleged human rights abuses. Amnesty International is active, as is the Irish Council for Civil Liberties. Both operate freely and without hindrance in Ireland as the principal independent organizations interested in domestic human rights issues. Amnesty International's 1985 Report noted the release of Eamonn (Nicky) Kelly in 1984 (see last year's report) and was concerned about allegations of physical ill-treatment of prisoners. Freedom House rated Ireland "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of the Irish Republic in 1985 totaled about 3,588,000 and is growing at 1 percent a year. Estimated per capita gross national product in 1983 was $5,000. Successive Irish governments have successfully promoted industrialization and diversification, raising living standards considerably.

IRELAND

During the last 3 years Ireland has been hurt by rising unemployment (17 percent in July 1985). Nonetheless, the people enjoy adequate shelter, nutrition, health care, and education. These services are available without regard to race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. Life expectancy at birth is 73.49 years, and the infant mortality rate is 9.5 per 1,000 live births. People whose means are inadequate and who are not entitled to other benefits may receive pensions or other payments from public funds.

The minimum legal age for employment in Ireland is 15 years, and hours of employment for 15-year-olds are limited to 8 hours per day and 40 hours per week. Persons 16 and 17 years of age may work up to 9 hours per day and 40 hours per week. No maximum number of hours per day or week applies to those over 18 years of age. Although there is no comprehensive law governing trade union activities, most terms and conditions of employment are determined through collective bargaining. Despite right-to-work laws, most businesses (covering over 56 percent of the labor force) are unionized.

There is no general minimum wage legislation in Ireland. However, some 50,000 workers are covered by minimum wage laws applicable to specific industrial sectors, mainly those which tend to pay lower than average wages. Four basic laws dealing with occupational safety provide adequate coverage. An extensive system of public health insurance offers health protection.

In recent years women have been playing a more significant role in the Irish work force. Although the Constitution recognizes the woman's role in terms of "her life within the home," women have been entering the office and marketplace relatively smoothly but slowly. Several studies have highlighted the difference in pay scales between men and women and have drawn particular attention to the fact that in recent pay increases female workers have lagged considerably behind males, thus further widening the gap. Equal pay for equal work is now very much on the agenda of Ireland's small but growing women's movement.

ITALY

Italy is a democratic, multiparty republic with a parliamentary system of government. Legislative power is vested in the Parliament, which is directly and freely elected on the basis of universal adult suffrage. Executive authority is concentrated in the Council of Ministers. Italy has an independent judiciary. The Chief of State, the President, is elected by Parliament and representatives of the regions.

Terrorist violence of both the left and right has declined in recent years due to the effective work of police and magistrates and, in essence, the people's rejection. Although terrorism has yet to be completely overcome, its considerable reduction has freed law enforcement resources for the struggle against organized crime, which continues to be a serious problem.

Italy has an industrialized market economy ranking among the top 10 in the world in gross national product. It is characterized by sizable government ownership in the primary industrial sectors and by a dynamic private sector, especially at the level of small and medium-sized companies.

The drafters of Italy's post-World War II Constitution were strongly influenced by Roman Catholic and social democratic traditions. The Constitution contains guarantees of political and civil rights that are rigorously observed in practice.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In 1985, there was one confirmed killing by an Italian terrorist organization, the Red Brigades. The victim was Ezio Tarantelli, a prominent labor economist. Efforts over past years by terrorists of the far left and far right to provoke the forces of order into taking extreme security measures have failed. Government and law enforcement agencies have used the emergency powers granted them to fight the terrorist threat with care and moderation.

There are indications that Italian terrorists have received some support from outside the country, particularly from extremist Middle Eastern groups, and there are continuing allegations of direct or indirect East European support. Terrorist actions claimed by Middle Eastern groups, including bombings and attacks on individuals, increased in 1985 and resulted in 3 deaths and more than 60 wounded. A Middle Eastern connection is suspected in a number of incidents for which no group claimed responsibility. In addition, an Arab terrorist group killed 12 persons and injured many more in an attack on the Israeli airline passenger ticket counter at Rome airport in December.

There have been no cases of disappearance linked to or condoned by the State or its agents. There were no kidnappings by political terrorist groups in Italy in 1985. However, an apparently foreign group continues to claim responsibility for the 1983 disappearance of a teenage Italian girl, Emanuela Orlandi. The group has called for the release from prison of Mehmet Ali Agca, who is serving a life sentence for the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II in 1981. Ms. Orlandi is still missing.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Freedom from torture is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Cruel and degrading punishment is forbidden by law and not employed by officials. Law enforcement officers accused of breaking these rules have faced criminal charges. When a Mafia suspect died in police custody in August 1985, several officers were immediately suspended, and an investigation was begun. Conditions of confinement vary, and some places of detention are outdated and crowded but not inhumane or degrading. Prisoners charged or convicted of terrorist acts are generally separated from other prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Police procedures in Italy are carefully circumscribed by law and judicial oversight. Arbitrary arrest is not practiced. Anyone detained by the authorities must be charged within 48 hours. In normal criminal cases, the duration of pretrial detention permitted varies according to the gravity of the crime. Under reforms passed in 1984, the maximum that any person may be held in preventive detention, even for the most serious crimes, is 6 years and no more than 2 years at each step of the trial and the long appeals process. Maximum periods of preventive detention are substantially less for lesser crimes. As a safeguard against abuse, "Liberty Tribunals" are empowered to review evidence in cases of persons awaiting trial and to decide whether continued detention is warranted. Authorities hope that streamlined judicial procedures will help reduce the number of prisoners, currently about 20,000, awaiting trial or appeals in Italian jails. There is no forced or compulsory labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A fair public trial is assured by law and observed in practice. Counsel is provided for the accused, free if necessary. The judiciary is independent of the executive, and there are no political or security courts. All cases may be appealed to the highest appellate court, the Court of Cassation. There are no political prisoners.

There was considerable debate in 1985 over procedures which, in certain types of cases, provide for reduced sentences for confessed offenders in return for testimony against associates and accomplices. This system proved very effective in the Government's effort to combat terrorism and is now in part being employed against organized crime. There is no evidence of any systematic abuse of the procedure by the authorities. However, critics maintain that the procedure allows too much latitude to individual magistrates, that it violates the principle of equal penalties for equivalent crimes, and that the testimony thus obtained, particularly in organized crime investigations, may not always be reliable. The issue has sparked a wide-ranging and spirited debate in the press, government circles, and other forums.

ITALY

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In Italy, the concept of the privacy of the home is legally safeguarded and generally respected by the authorities. Searches and electronic monitoring may be carried out only under judicial warrant and in carefully defined circumstances.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Free speech and a free press are assured under Italy's democratic political system, which allows full expression of a wide spectrum of political views. Although there is no censorship, publications may be seized for violations of obscenity laws or for defamation of state institutions. These powers are seldom invoked. Government-run radio and television are politicized at the administrative level but are open to widely differing views. A large number of private broadcasters air vigorous debate on political and social issues.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Italian citizens' right of free assembly is limited only in cases where security or public safety is endangered.

Trade unions are not government-controlled, and their right to organize, engage in collective bargaining, and strike are fully protected. They associate with international labor bodies freely and without interference. According to government figures, about 40 percent of the work force is organized. Professional and employer associations also organize and represent their constituencies freely.

c. Freedom of Religion

Italy's relations with the Roman Catholic Church are governed by an 1984 agreement (Concordat) between the Italian Government and the Holy See, ratified in 1985. The new agreement, replacing the Concordat of 1929, recognizes the rights and place of the Church but no longer accords it the position of Italy's state religion. The Roman Catholic Church continues informally to enjoy special standing in Italy because of the presence of the Vatican and because the overwhelming majority of Italians are at least nominally Roman Catholic. Nevertheless, all religions are free to organize and proselytize within the limits imposed by the laws governing public order. The Government is in the process of reaching agreements with other religious groups to define their rights and standing. Individuals are free to profess and practice any religious faith.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Italian citizens may travel freely both within the country and abroad. Emigration is unrestricted. Citizens who leave are guaranteed their right to return, and the Constitution forbids deprivation of citizenship for political reasons. Italy has been a haven for many persons fleeing persecution in other countries. There were no cases of forced repatriation of political refugees in 1985.

ITALY

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Italy is ruled democratically under its free parliamentary system. Although the Constitution outlaws the Fascist Party, a wide range of organized and active political parties exists from the far left of the political spectrum to the far right. Election campaigns are free and open, and voting is by secret ballot. The two chambers of Parliament and regional, provincial, and municipal councils are elected periodically. Opposition groups are active and are frequently able to alter or reject government policies. The regions of Trentino Alto-Adige and Val d'Aosta are organized under special status aimed at safeguarding the rights of their respective German- and French-speaking minorities.

The Italian Government and nongovernmental human rights organizations support human rights around the world. Italy participates fully in various international human rights organizations. Nongovernmental organizations are free to investigate conditions in Italy, to attend trials, and to publish their findings. Political parties and religious groups participate in activities related to human rights. Organizations active in human rights affairs include Amnesty International, the Official Interministerial Committee for the Rights of Man, the Institute of Human Rights, and Caritas International.

Amnesty International's principal concern in its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984) continues to be the excessive length of judicial proceedings in what it called "political" cases. Freedom House rated Italy "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Italy is a prosperous, developed country with a population of 57 million (1985). Per capita gross national product in 1984 was $6,843. As a country possessing an industrial market economy, Italy encourages the ownership of property alone or in association with others. The Government provides special funds for investment in southern Italy, whose development, for historical reasons, has been slower than that of the north.

Education and economic and social services are generally available to all without discrimination of any kind. According to 1985 statistics, life expectancy at birth was 74.6 years and the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births was 11.2.

Italy has a comprehensive body of law and regulation that outlaws child labor and ensures payment of a reasonable minimum wage and safe and healthy working conditions. Both government authorities and unions make significant efforts to ensure that these regulations are universally enforced. The proliferation of small-scale, family-run businesses and manufacturing enterprises in Italy's dynamic private sector means, however, that despite enforcement efforts, violations of these norms sometimes occur.

ITALY

Women generally have equal status under the law, but they are engaged in a continuing effort to maintain and strengthen their rights. Women participate freely in social and political life and continue to expand their economic role, although they are underrepresented in the professions and management. There are legal limitations on women's property rights within marriage which derive from traditional Italian social values. Strong private-sector demand for female labor has ensured a very low level of unemployment among women who constitute about 27 percent of the labor force.

LATVIA*

An independent Baltic state between the two World Wars, Latvia was annexed by the Soviet Union in 1940 as a constituent republic of the U.S.S.R. The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Latvia into the U.S.S.R.

Like the other Baltic states, Latvia is subjected to the same centralized rule, the same Constitution and judicial system, the same restrictions on civil and political liberties, and the same police controls as the republics in the Soviet Union. Moreover, Soviet policy toward the Latvian nation arouses grave concern because the process of Russification threatens its survival as a distinct ethnic group. The influx of Slavic settlers has reduced the proportion of Latvians in Latvia to only 53 percent of the total population.

Like the other Baltic states, Latvia is regarded as economically better off than most areas of the Soviet Union. This is beginning to change, however, as central authorities divert scarce resources to less developed areas.

Human rights violations continued in 1985. Expressions of national consciousness were harshly repressed. The state of religious liberty continued to deteriorate as the Soviet authorities harassed the clergy and lay leaders of several faiths. Latvians active in human rights issues continued to face persecution and arrest.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Several Latvian activists have died in Soviet custody in the last several years, although no such deaths were reported in 1985. However, official responsibility for the deaths of persons involved in human rights activities is difficult to establish. Soviet persecution of Latvian activists, however, may lead to their deaths.

b. Disappearance

There are no known instances of permanent or prolonged disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Throughout the Soviet system, cruel and inhuman treatment of political prisoners occurs during both interrogation and confinement to labor camp, prison, or psychiatric hospital.

Physical and psychological abuse of prisoners is common, as is detention under extremely unhealthy or otherwise onerous conditions.

* Given Soviet control over all aspects of life in Latvia, the systemic human rights abuses described in the report on the U.S.S.R. apply also to Latvia. This report discusses only instances of repression specific to Latvia.

LATVIA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Soviet legal provisions are written and interpreted so broadly that Latvians may be arrested and convicted for exercising basic human rights.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

As in the Soviet Union, Communist Party control of society is exercised in political cases to negate constitutional guarantees of the objectivity and independence of the judicial process. The self-determined compelling needs of the State override the rights of a defendant.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Through the use of informers, mail censorship, electronic monitoring of telephones, and other devices, government authorities have the ability to interfere in every aspect of personal life. Constitutional guarantees to the contrary, Soviet investigative agencies do not abstain from forced entry and illegal searches. Contacts between Latvians and foreign visitors are strongly discouraged, and those who indulge in such contacts are subject to official harassment.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for most internationally accepted political liberties as long as their exercise accords with the strengthening and security of the "socialist" system. In practice, the authorities do not tolerate freedom of speech and press or any dissident behavior. Riga dissident and Russian Orthodox activist Mikhail Bombin was under investigation at year's end facing possible charges of anti-Soviet slander for his unofficial activities in support of peace and detente.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of association is provided for in the Constitution, but the authorities strictly control all associations and organizations. Latvians peacefully celebrating Latvian Independence Day are subject to arrest, and foreigners visiting their Latvian relatives are frequently interrogated and harassed.

Soviet labor law and practice are enforced in Latvia. Although the Constitution guarantees all Soviet citizens the right to form trade unions, any efforts by workers to exercise this right independently of state-sponsored and controlled unions have been brutally repressed. Given Soviet concern that the ideas of the Polish Solidarity trade union movement might spread, this has been especially true in the Baltic states.

c. Freedom of Religion

Despite constitutional guarantees, religious activity is the subject of systematic official harassment. Jewish cultural activist Vladimir Frenkel of Riga was sentenced to 18 months in labor camp in June 1985 for writing articles for the Jewish cultural "samizdat" (self-published) journal Khaim, as well as for publishing a number of articles on Russian Orthodoxy in the West.

Members of the Roman Catholic, Baptist, and Adventist churches also appear to have encountered more difficulties with the authorities than the larger Lutheran Church, perhaps because of their outspokenness.

In September 1984, Zofiya Belyarchuk and a colleague named Sanderos were arrested for attempting to form a Franciscan church group.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Soviet authorities do not respect the right of emigration. The granting of permission to emigrate from Latvia is arbitrary and subject to increasing restrictions. The authorities harass Latvians whose desire to emigrate is known and cause their living conditions to deteriorate in order to discourage emigration applications. Two Latvian families are currently on the U.S. Government Representation List of Divided Families who have been refused Soviet permission to join their relatives in the United States. Ninety more families are on the U.S. Representation List of Soviet Jews denied permission to emigrate to Israel. A number have been trying to obtain permission for more than 10 years.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Non-Communist Latvians have almost no opportunity to participate meaningfully in the political process. Communist Party and governmental authorities in Latvia are severely limited in their ability to advance national interests, if they should choose to do so. Latvians have the lowest proportion of Communist Party membership of the three Baltic states and are outnumbered in the local party hierarchy. As in other areas under Soviet control, political activity outside the Communist Party is not tolerated.

Expressions of Latvian nationalism continued in 1985. On two occasions these led to clashes between Latvian and Russian youths in Riga. The first clash reportedly occurred on Victory Day, May 9; the second, several days later on Latvian Independence Day. The Independence Day disturbances apparently took place against the backdrop of a demonstration demanding an end to Soviet occupation. Around 300 young Latvians were temporarily detained, with injuries and even some fatalities reported.

The Soviet Government rejects any foreign criticism of its human rights record, maintaining that all internationally recognized human rights are fully protected. Its attitude toward investigation of the human rights situation in Latvia is uncompromisingly negative.

LATVIA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Since its annexation, Latvia, with its population of about 2.5 million, has become an industrial workshop and trading center for the Soviet Union. Soviet authorities have emphasized investment in heavy industry, and industrial output has increased substantially since World War II.

The process of industrialization was accompanied by a large influx of Slavic workers from elsewhere in the Soviet Union because of Latvia's small labor force and low birth rate. At the same time, Latvian agriculture has been neglected, and this has caused periodic shortages of food, particularly meat and dairy products, in a country that exported such products during independence.

Latvia's economic performance during the first 6 months of 1985 was roughly on a par with the Soviet average. Growth in industrial production was 3 percent compared with the Soviet average of 3.1 percent, and labor productivity rose by 3.2 percent, well above the Soviet average of 2.6 percent.

By most measures of economic well-being, Latvia has for decades been regarded as better off than most areas in the Soviet Union. To some extent, this former prosperity is now working against it, as centrally controlled funds are diverted to less developed areas in the Soviet Union. The deterioration of housing is readily observable, and the same phenomenon is said to extend throughout the economic and social infrastructure, including roads, schools, institutes, hospitals, and even factories.

The large proportion (about 47 percent) of non-Latvians in the population, along with cultural censorship and mandatory ideology, has placed the Latvian language and culture in jeopardy. Lacking an internal rallying point, such as the Roman Catholic Church provides for Lithuanians, or a nearby external point of cultural affinity, as Finland is for Estonians, Latvians face poor prospects in their efforts to preserve and refresh their cultural traditions.

LITHUANIA*

The largest of the three Baltic states which were independent between the two World Wars, Lithuania was annexed by the Soviet Union in 1940 as a constituent republic of the Soviet Union. The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Lithuania into the U.S.S.R.

Lithuania is subjected to the same centralized rule, the same Constitution and judicial system, the same restrictions on civil and political liberties, and the same police controls as the republics in the Soviet Union.

As in the other Baltic states, the standard of living in Lithuania is somewhat higher than in the Soviet Union. Agricultural and industrial production increased in 1985, but Soviet redistribution policies continued to force down Lithuanian living standards toward lower Soviet levels.

Respect for human rights remained substandard in 1985, as Soviet authorities continued their campaign against the Roman Catholic Church.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Although Lithuanian activists have on occasion died in Soviet custody, it is difficult to establish official responsibility for the deaths of persons involved in human rights activities. There were no reports of known political killing in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no known instances of permanent or prolonged disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Political dissidents are frequently mistreated during interrogation or confinement in labor camp, prison, or psychiatric hospital. Persons accused of publishing or distributing underground publications receive harsh sentences, including prison, labor camp, exile, and psychiatric hospital, typically on the charge of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Lithuanian Helsinki Group member Victoras Petkus, imprisoned for human rights activities, has reportedly been in very bad health since doing a term in the labor camp prison in 1983-84. There has been no direct news of Petkus since August 1983.

* Given Soviet control over all aspects of life in Lithuania, the systemic human rights abuses described in the report on the U.S.S.R. apply also to Lithuania. This report discusses only instances of repression specific to Lithuania.

LITHUANIA

On August 22, Father Vaclovas Stakenas, a member of the Catholic Committee to Defend the Rights of Believers, was violently attacked by two unknown assailants and then thrown into a pond.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The provisions of Soviet law are so broadly worded that they have been used to prosecute persons exercising basic human rights.

A Catholic activist, 79-year-old Vladas Lapienis was sentenced in March to 4 years' imprisonment for "fabrications denigrating the Soviet system." Lapienis, who had recently finished serving a prison sentence for contributing to the Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania, had written his memoirs of his time in a labor camp. It was evidently because of those memoirs that he was rearrested, tried, and convicted.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

As in the Soviet Union, Communist Party control of society is exercised in political cases to negate constitutional guarantees of the objectivity and independence of the judicial process. The self-determined compelling needs of the State override the rights of a defendant.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Through devices ranging from a network of informers to censorship of mail, electronic monitoring of telephones, and jamming of foreign radio broadcasts, government authorities have the ability to interfere in every aspect of personal life. Constitutional guarantees to the contrary, Soviet investigative agencies do not abstain from forced entry and illegal searches. Contacts between Lithuanians and foreign visitors are strongly discouraged, and those who indulge in such contacts are subject to harassment by the authorities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for most internationally accepted political liberties provided that their exercise accords with the strengthening and security of the "Socialist system". As is shown by the frequent imprisonment of religious leaders, human rights activists, and those involved in underground publications, Soviet officials show little respect for freedom of speech and press. Despite the authorities' complete control of the legal media and strict censorship, however, underground publications continue to be produced. Publications such as the Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania, Ausra (Dawn), Tautos Kelias (The Path of the Nation), Lietuvos Ateitis (Lithuania's Future), and Perspektyvos (Perspectives) appear regularly.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to associate is provided for in the Constitution, but the authorities strictly control all associations and organizations.

LITHUANIA

Soviet labor law and practice are enforced in Lithuania. Although the Constitution guarantees all Soviet citizens the right to form trade unions, any efforts by workers to exercise this right independently of state-sponsored and controlled unions have been brutally repressed. Given Soviet concern that the ideas of the Polish Solidarity trade union movement might spread, this has been especially true in the Baltic states.

Despite constitutional guarantees, religious activity is subject to systematic harassment. Soviet authorities have apparently mounted a large-scale assault on religion. Reportedly, they are taking control of church committees and excluding priests from them. Because of governmental control over admissions to Lithuania's only theological seminary, the shortage of priests is such that 139 parishes are said to have no permanent priest. Children are harassed to deter them from attending church services. In school, the children of believers are sometimes forced to join atheist organizations or are punished for not joining them. Catholics attending religious festivities have been interrogated and physically abused, and historic shrines or artifacts have been desecrated.

Because of difficult conditions created by government reprisals and threats, a group of the Lithuanian Catholic Committee for the Defense of Believers' Rights decided it could no longer function publicly and has gone underground. In January 1985, Father Jonas Matulionas became the third prominent Committee member convicted by Soviet authorities. His colleagues, Fathers Alfonsas Svarinkas and Sigitas Tamkevicius, had been convicted in 1983 of anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. Father Matulionas received 3 years in labor camp for "disrupting public order." The charge reportedly stemmed from his having led an All Saints Day procession to a cemetery, an illegal activity under restrictive Soviet religious regulations. Matulionas was released on June 19, 1985, apparently under the terms of the Amnesty Decree of June 5. He was, however, rearrested on June 26. Relatives were told that he would not be retried but would simply serve out the previous sentence. No reason for the rearrest was given. A young Catholic student, Roman Zemaitis, was convicted with him and sentenced to 2 years in labor camp.

The Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania reported in July that two residents of Klaipeda named Murauskas and Jonulis were arrested in early 1985 and charged with "illegal trade." The two men reportedly were privately printing religious cards and texts for use during religious festivals.

Despite these convictions and continuous Soviet attempts to suppress its activities, the Catholic Church in Lithuania remains an active and vigorous religious denomination.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The right to travel has been restricted even further since 1980. Many Lithuanians have family and personal ties with Poland. In past years, travel back and forth was relatively frequent. Since the emergence of the independent Solidarity trade union movement in Poland in 1980, the Polish-Lithuanian border has been closed for extended periods. The importation of printed materials from Poland was sharply curtailed during 1981. Soviet propaganda in Lithuania against the Solidarity union, designed to suppress the formation of a free labor movement in Lithuania, was particularly active.

Emigration from Lithuania has virtually stopped during the past 2 years. Although many Lithuanians have close relatives abroad, Soviet authorities use various vague phrases, such as "against the interests of the State," in order to refuse to permit the reunification of families. The authorities try to deter people from emigrating by dismissal from employment, psychological harassment, and alteration of the procedures for exit visa applications. On the U.S. Government Representation List of Divided Families, there are currently six Lithuanian families who have been repeatedly refused permission to emigrate to the United States. Five residents of Lithuania are on the U.S. Government Representation List of American Citizens, dual nationals who have been denied permission to settle in the United States. One of them, Vytautas Skuodis, a member of the Lithuanian Helsinki Group, has been serving a sentence of 7 years in labor camp and 5 years in internal exile since 1980, in connection with his human rights activities. There are 82 families on the U.S. Government Representation List of Soviet Jews Who Have Been Denied Permission to Emigrate to Israel..

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union, through its leaders in Moscow, directs and controls all political, economic, cultural, and social developments. It is defined in law as the "leading and guiding force of Soviet society" and is the only political party that is tolerated.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Rejecting foreign criticism of its human rights record, the Soviet Government argues that it fully protects all internationally recognized human rights. It will not permit any investigation of the human rights situation in Lithuania.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Lithuania is the most rural of the Baltic states, as well as the largest, with a population of 3.4 million. Despite Moscow's high priority on the development of industry, half the labor force remains employed in agriculture. Soviet statistics published for the first half of 1985 showed a relatively strong performance by the Lithuanian economy. Lithuania's 4 percent growth in industrial production was far above the pace of the other two Baltic republics and of the nation as a whole, although it trailed last year's growth of 6.6 percent. Furthermore, the 3.4 percent growth in labor productivity outstripped the national average of 2.6 percent.

Many Lithuanians, however, do not believe that this expansion of industrial production will carry over into a genuine improvement in the consumer situation. They believe that the deterioration of the average diet will continue in the republic, even in years of high production, since much of Lithuania's food production is sent to the Soviet Union or to neighboring Poland. While the quality of housing remains above general Soviet standards, living conditions as a whole are falling to the lower level common to the republics of the Soviet Union.

The relative homogeneity of Lithuania's population, its strong sense of national identity, and the binding force of the Lithuanian Catholic Church have helped to preserve many of the country's social and cultural traditions. Nevertheless, the disruptive effects of an antireligious ideology, forced collectivization, and a policy of industrialization have been severe. Rigid controls on cultural and religious expression have forced many Lithuanians into underground activity, which brings them into conflict with the authorities. A reduction in the amount of Lithuanian language instruction at the primary level in 1982, with a corresponding increase in the teaching of the Russian language and Russian history, has aroused fear that the groundwork is being laid for cultural and eventual linguistic russification of the country. Non-Lithuanians total about 20 percent of the population, and their proportion has been growing in recent years.

LUXEMBOURG

Luxembourg is a constitutional monarchy with a parliamentary form of government. The Grand Duke is the Chief of State.

Under the rule of law, the judicial and penal systems in Luxembourg function with fairness and nondiscrimination for all. The integrity of the person and civil and political rights are guaranteed by the Constitution and protected in practice.

Luxembourg is a highly developed industrialized state. Its free-enterprise economic system places heavy emphasis on steel production, agriculture, and service industries such as banking, radio-television broadcasting, and tourism.

Luxembourg insures that human rights are respected at home and works actively to promote human rights internationally. It continues efforts to treat its large foreign population fairly and to engage labor unions in the industrial decisionmaking process.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for political reasons by the Government or opposition political organizations is unknown in Luxembourg.

During 1985 there were a series of mysterious bombings aimed at public utilities, Gendarmerie facilities, and government buildings, resulting in property damage but no injuries to individuals. No group has claimed responsibility for the bombings. There is thus far no evidence linking the bombings to international terrorist groups.

b. Disappearance

Governmental or officially sanctioned abduction or secret arrest has not occurred in Luxembourg.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by law and is not practiced. Prisoners are fairly treated, have free choice of attorneys, and are allowed visitors. A new modern prison to serve all Luxembourg was recently opened.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Luxembourg law is a composite of local practice, legal tradition, and foreign systems--French, Belgian, and German. Preventive detention does not exist. Defendants must be charged no later than 24 hours after arrest. Persons can be incarcerated pending trial, if so ordered by a judge. Exile is not imposed, nor is there forced labor.

LUXEMBOURG

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Luxembourg has an independent judiciary, free from executive or military interference. There are military courts, but civilians are not subject to their jurisdiction. Defendants have the right to legal counsel. Charges are formally and clearly stated.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Police must have warrants, issued by the judiciary, to enter a private home. Luxembourg statutes prohibit other violations of the home such as demolition, sealing doors and windows, and electronic surveillance. The privacy of correspondence is universally respected.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press. Except for restrictions against pornography, there is no media censorship. The Government does not interfere with public criticism or academic inquiry.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected in practice. There are no limitations on orderly public meetings, and the right of free assembly is denied to no group.

Unions have the right to organize, negotiate, and strike, although by tradition strikes are virtually unknown in Luxembourg. Unions participate directly in a tripartite arrangement with government and management, which forms a decisive step in the decisionmaking process on major economic issues. A large percentage of the work force is unionized. Unions and professional groups maintain unrestricted contact with international bodies in their fields.

c. Freedom of Religion

Luxembourg does not have a state religion, and there is no discrimination against practitioners of any religious faith. The population is statistically 99 percent Roman Catholic, and this faith is deeply intertwined with the conservative culture of the country. Thus, a consensus with Roman Catholic beliefs often surfaces on social issues; for example, there is no government funding for abortions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions regarding movement within Luxembourg, foreign travel, or emigration and repatriation. There are no barriers to potential immigrants from countries of the European Community (EC). Since 1970, Luxembourg has had a large Portuguese population. The status of citizens of Portugal in Luxembourg is guaranteed by bilateral agreements and is similar to that accorded citizens of the EC. Although Luxembourg is not a country of first application for refugees, government officials believe that on a per capita basis within the EC relatively liberal numbers of refugees (notably Vietnamese) have been admitted. Once admitted, refugees benefit from state social programs and are well treated.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Under Luxembourg's parliamentary democracy, all citizens 18 years of age and older may participate in national elections which are held every 5 years. Luxembourg's sizable foreign resident population (26 percent) does not have the right to vote, although it enjoys the rights of free speech, press, assembly, movement, and religion. It may also join organizations such as labor unions which exert considerable indirect influence on the political process. Women participating in politics or holding political office include the leader of the Liberal Party and the Mayor of Luxembourg.

Luxembourg governments have consistently supported international and nongovernmental investigation of alleged violations of human rights. The Red Cross, Amnesty International, and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees have representatives in Luxembourg. Amnesty International did not mention Luxembourg in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated Luxembourg "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Luxembourg is a small country with a population of about 366,000 and a growth rate of 0.1 percent. Per capita gross national product for 1983 was $14,650. The unemployment rate is approximately 1.9 percent. A notable feature of the Luxembourg economy is the importance of one industry, steel, which accounts for a high percentage of Luxembourg exports. However, steel is undergoing basic restructuring and is declining gradually in terms of overall economic importance.

Luxembourg enjoys a high standard of living and the usual indices of a developed western society--adequate medical care with life expectancy of 73.2 years, 99 percent literacy, and a general lack of poverty.

The right to work is guaranteed to every Luxembourger by the Constitution. The employment of children under the age of 16, however, is prohibited. The normal workweek is 40 hours, spread over 5 workdays. Work on Sunday is generally prohibited, except in continuous process industries (like steel) and for individuals such as maintenance and security personnel.

Worker representatives are required in all businesses of 15 or more employees. In businesses with over 150 employees, 50 percent of the joint works councils are elected by the employees, and in those with more than 1,000 employees, one-third of the boards of directors must be employees.

Although few women in Luxembourg are senior executives, the situation is gradually changing as women become increasingly involved in the political process and enter the financial and business community.

LUXEMBOURG

About 26 percent of Luxembourg's population are foreigners, and although immigration is now low, the foreign population is growing gradually while the native Luxembourg population is declining. Economic recession has created a slight rise in unemployment. However, Luxembourg remains notably free from social and related political instability.

MALTA

Malta is a constitutional republic with a parliamentary government elected by universal suffrage. Executive power is vested in a President who appoints as Prime Minister the leader of the party which gains the most seats in the quinquennial election for the unicameral legislature. The outcome of the December 1981 election, in which the Nationalist Party won 51 percent of the popular vote while the Labor Party, in part because of the redrawing of electoral districts, took a majority of parliamentary seats, has caused prolonged and persistent domestic political conflict. As a former British colony, Malta is a member of the Commonwealth.

The Maltese economy is dependent on export manufacturing, tourism, and other service industries.

Malta's human rights performance in 1985, as in 1984, was marked by reported instances of police beatings and ill-treatment, political pressure on the judicial system, and strains between the Government and the Roman Catholic Church over operation of church-sponsored schools.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No known incidents of political killing by government personnel or clandestine groups occurred during 1985.

In November, heavy loss of life resulted when terrorists hijacked an Egyptian airliner to Malta and began murdering their hostages.

b. Disappearance

No cases of disappearance are known to have occurred in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Maltese Constitution prohibits inhuman or degrading punishment. In several instances during 1985 victims testified in court that the police had inflicted inhuman and degrading treatment on them. The police denied the charges. In one case medical opinion confirmed beatings and cigarette burns during police interrogation. In two court cases defendants testified that they had signed confessions under duress or threat from the police. The judge found the defendants not guilty, but no action was taken against the police.

In 1985 Amnesty International wrote to the Minister of Justice concerning allegations that detainees had been ill-treated at police headquarters between 1977 and 1985.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest or detention is provided for in the Constitution and generally respected in practice. There are no known political prisoners or persons in political exile.

MALTA

Persons can be held for 48 hours of "questioning" without being charged. On several occasions during the past few years prominent opposition figures or activists have been held under this provision. There were no such instances reported during 1985.

On September 19, 1985, an Italian citizen, Massimo Gorla, President of the European Union of Young Democrats, was arrested by the police and held at police headquarters for approximately 6 hours. Gorla was to have taken part in activities organized by the opposition Nationalist Party. A government statement said: "Gorla did not ask for, and did not get, the permission required by law." The law referred to, the Foreign Interference Act of 1982, requires that all foreigners apply for and receive permission before participating in any foreign activity in Malta, except activities which are purely cultural, educational, philanthropic, religious, or of an entertainment nature. Approval may not be given for activities which constitute an interference in the internal affairs of Malta or the foreign policy pursued by its Government or which would give an advantage to any Maltese political parties. The next day the police deported Gorla from Malta without a court order.

The Constitution also guarantees the right of habeas corpus. However, there is no right to legal assistance during interrogation. In at least one case a foreign citizen was twice detained and claimed to have been harassed by the police without any apparent justification.

The Constitution prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labor, and this prohibition is respected in practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees a fair public trial before an impartial court. The judicial system, which is constitutionally independent, is nonetheless in practice sometimes subject to political pressure. Some political and constitutional cases which were before the courts in 1984 or earlier years have not been resolved. These include several constitutional cases brought by the Catholic Church and other organizations against the Government during 1984, contesting the Government's suspension of licenses for certain private schools. Although the Government renewed the licenses for these schools to operate until the end of the 1984-85 academic year and again for the 1985-86 academic year, the constitutional issues in the cases remain in dispute.

In November 1984 a judge resigned from one of the church school cases after the Government proposed a motion in Parliament to remove him. Two other judges abstained from the same cases in February 1985. When the Constitutional Court began hearing government appeals, the Government challenged the legality of the composition of the court, but on February 25 the Constitutional Court declared itself validly constituted. Within days both cases were adjourned indefinitely by the First Hall of the Civil Court, which had originally heard the cases. In April and June the Archbishop of Malta and the Federation of Private Parent-Teacher Associations requested the court to continue with the cases by the appointment, if need be, of an acting judge under clause 99 of the Constitution. No action has been taken on these two applications.

In February 1985 the Prime Minister, in a statement to Parliament, said "the Government has never interfered with any court when it was doing its duty." He added that he "expected the court to do its duty but if the court was not doing this, they (the Government) had every right to tell the people this and come to the House to censure the court."

The Court Reform Act of 1981 limits the jurisdiction of the courts in the area of oversight of administrative actions by the Government. Defendants may not use lawyers in cases before the Industrial Tribunal, which has exclusive authority in cases of unfair dismissals of workers employed on indefinite contracts of employment. Thus, a dismissed employee may find himself in the position of having to defend his own case before the Tribunal without aid, even if such person is illiterate or has no knowledge of legal or administrative proceedings. Nor may civil servants be represented by lawyers in cases held before the Public Service Commission.

During 1985 there were several complaints that awards delivered by the Industrial Tribunal were not based on a correct and faithful interpretation of the law.

A government-established Court Commission, charged with ensuring professional and ethical adherence by lawyers, remains unrecognized by the Chamber of Advocates.

Maltese citizens do not have the right of individual petition to the European Court of Human Rights.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Protection of the privacy of the home is guaranteed in the Constitution and is respected in practice. Most police searches require warrants which are issued only after proper administrative review. However, any police officer of the rank of inspector or higher may carry out a search without a warrant. The Postmaster General employs several people to ensure that postcards, periodicals, and other publications which might be regarded as pornographic are confiscated and destroyed. In 1985 the Prime Minister denied opposition allegations of telephone tapping.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are guaranteed by the Constitution and generally respected in practice. Persons contributing to the opposition press may, however, suffer some form of retribution. For example, an opposition youth leader was suspended from work for publishing an article in the opposition press and has not been reinstated. In another instance, a young opposition party political activist sued the Government in 1984 for not issuing his civil architect's warrant after he had successfully graduated from the university. In the protracted court case, during 1985, it was revealed that he had written antigovernment articles in the press. His warrant has still not been issued.

MALTA

Moreover, several ministers in parliamentary statements have accused individual Maltese citizens of potentially treasonous behavior for criticizing Malta while abroad.

In 1985 the Government lifted a 4-year ban on the sale and distribution of The Times of London. It had imposed the ban after that paper refused to publish its reply to an article deemed detrimental to Malta. The ban was lifted after The Times carried an interview with the Prime Minister.

Television and radio are state-owned. The opposition's request to have its own radio station has been turned down. The Constitution requires that there be an independent broadcasting authority to oversee the impartial operation of the broadcast media. This has not been in existence since 1981. The opposition party and independent trade unions complain frequently that they receive biased television and radio coverage. During 1985 a Parliamentary Select Committee was established to discuss a number of political issues, including radio and television broadcasting. No agreement on broadcasting has been reached.

Government statements issued through the Department of Information are privileged, i.e., the right of reply does not apply to such statements.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to peaceful assembly is guaranteed by law. Police permits are generally given for political meetings and other public activities of the opposition Nationalist Party. However, three European Christian Democrats--all of whom had previously criticized the Government--were denied permission to address the Nationalist Party meeting in February, and a fourth, Italian Christian Democrat Massimo Gorla, was arrested after addressing a Nationalist Party rally for violation of the Maltese Foreign Interference Act (see Section 1.d.).

Trade unionists and other interest groups freely exercise the right to set up associations. The largest labor organization, the General Workers Union, has been unified by statute with the Malta Labor Party since 1978. There are also several independent unions which have, since 1982, been excluded from the Maltese delegation to the International Labor Organization (ILO). The independent unions were, nevertheless, separately represented at the annual ILO conference in Geneva in July 1985.

The Constitution guarantees the right to bargain collectively and to strike. Government employees who have exercised the right to strike have, in several instances, been transferred or suspended.

During 1985 one opposition party club was requisitioned, while a court case on the withholding of permits to build another one has been pending for some time. In another case a permit to open an opposition club was issued after a court case.

c. Freedom of Religion

The right to practice the religion of one's choice is constitutionally guaranteed. The overwhelmingly dominant religion is Roman Catholicism, and there are small groups of Protestants, Hindus, Muslims, Baha'is, and Jews.

MALTA

In 1985, for the second consecutive year, strains persisted between the Roman Catholic Church and the Government concerning church-sponsored private schools. Since 1984, secondary schools have not been permitted to charge tuition or to accept direct loans or donations from parents. The Church presented an inventory of its wealth to the Government, and discussions among the Church, the Government, and the Vatican continue over the financing and operation of church schools. The Government has indicated its interest in concluding a concordat with the Vatican.

In 1983 the Government enacted the Devolution of Certain Church Property Act, which provided a mechanism for the Government to take over a significant portion of the Catholic Church's wealth. The court has ruled, in a case brought by the Church against the Government, that this law is unconstitutional. The Government has appealed this decision.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Neither domestic nor foreign travel is circumscribed. Freedom of movement, foreign travel, and emigration are guaranteed and respected in practice. A 1984 restriction on the amount of foreign exchange Maltese travelers to Italy could take abroad was lifted on September 16, 1985.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political activity and partisan feelings run high in Malta. In the last parliamentary elections (1981), more than 95 percent of registered voters actually voted.

The opposition has charged that the most fundamental human right, that of citizens to change their government, is threatened because, in the 1981 election, the party which received a majority of the popular vote did not win a majority of parliamentary seats. A Parliamentary Select Committee, formed during 1981, is to address, among other issues, the structure of the voting system so as to avoid a repetition of the result of that election. No progress on this issue has been reported.

During 1985 the Communist Party of Malta and a new political party, the Democratic Party, announced that they intend to put forward candidates for the next parliamentary election.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In 1984 Maltese citizens established a human rights group named "Hielsa" (Free). This group, the first of its kind, was active in 1985. Amnesty International's Bulletin reported in 1985 that the organization had written to the Minister of Justice and Parliamentary Affairs concerning allegations that detainees had been ill-treated at police headquarters in Valletta between 1977 and 1985.

Amnesty International's 1985 Report did not mention Malta. Freedom House in its 1985-86 report rated Malta "partly free" and described the ruling party as "increasingly antidemocratic."

MALTA

In May 1985 the Vienna-based International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights issued a report on "Human Rights in Malta" which stated that "the jurisdiction of Maltese courts has been circumscribed and their possibility to disagree with the government has been undermined by verbal and physical attacks...violations of human rights have occurred despite the presence of a constitutional court and the very advanced provisions of the Maltese Constitution."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Malta, with a population in 1985 of 332,000, had a per capita gross national product in 1984 of $3,318. According to government statistics, unemployment is 8.6 percent.

The Constitution declares that the fundamental aims of government are to make available to all citizens the highest levels of education and social welfare. Both the Government and the opposition support the basic rights of individuals to own property, to work with just conditions and remuneration, to maintain a standard of living adequate for health and well-being, and to receive universal education.

Public economic and social services are extended on a nondiscriminatory basis though there are frequent charges of government partisan favoritism in the allocation of public housing, phone services, and import and export licenses.

General standards of health care in Malta are average. In 1984, life expectancy at birth was 72.54 years, and infant mortality is 11.7 per 1,000 live births. Government programs in health care have concentrated on providing inexpensive health care services to the largest possible proportion of the population. A prolonged 8-year old labor dispute between the Government and the medical association has led many Maltese doctors to leave the country. The Government also withdrew licenses and support for the remaining church-run private hospitals, which were consequently forced to close.

Maltese public education is free and open to all. The literacy rate is nearly 90 percent, and education is compulsory to age 16. The primary school enrollment ratio in 1979 was 96 percent. Enrollment in the only university on the island is dependent on sponsorship. Graduates of state schools have an advantage as regards admission over students coming from private schools.

The minimum age for employment of children is 16. Maltese law guarantees acceptable conditions of work, including minimum wages, maximum hours of work, and provision for occupational safety and health.

Women participate freely in social and political life and continue to expand their economic role, although they are underrepresented in the professions and management. Women constitute only 27 percent of the labor force, but strong private sector demand for female labor has ensured a very low level of unemployment among women. There are legal limitations on women's property rights within marriage, which derive from traditional Maltese social values. The Government, however, is working on legislation to remove a number of limitations, and restrictions on public sector employment of married women were removed in 1981.

THE NETHERLANDS

The Netherlands is a parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarch. A special feature of the Dutch political system is nationwide proportional voting for Parliament where the full range of the political spectrum is represented.

The Dutch have a free market economy with a large social welfare system providing a relatively high level of social benefits.

The Dutch attach great importance in their foreign and domestic policies to human rights. Internationally recognized rights are protected by Dutch law and respected in practice. The most significant development in 1985 was a government memorandum on return migration which emphasized that the return of foreign nationals legally resident in the Netherlands to their own countries was entirely a voluntary matter.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for political motives by government or domestic political groups has not occurred.

b. Disappearance

Abductions, secret arrests, and clandestine detention by police or other official security forces has not occurred.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel or inhuman punishment are prohibited by law and do not occur in practice. Prison conditions are good by international standards.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. There are no political prisoners in The Netherlands. A right of release from detention exists in practice. Preventive detention is permitted only in times of emergency, upon declaration, for a limited time by national or municipal authorities. This power is used infrequently, and normally a person can be held no longer than 6 hours unless charges are brought. Exile is unknown in The Netherlands. There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Defendants have the right to counsel, and a system of free or low-cost legal assistance exists for those unable to pay for such counsel. Charges must be formally stated. The judiciary is independent, with a functioning appeals process and a Supreme Court.

THE NETHERLANDS

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A judicial warrant is required to enter a person's home or monitor private correspondence. The State respects individual freedom of choice in family matters.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

An independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system, combine to ensure freedom of speech and press. A feature of media policy is the allocation of broadcasting time to all social and political groups, which ensures that minority viewpoints are heard.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association is not restricted. Various private interest groups exist and play an active role in the political process.

The right of unions to organize and bargain collectively is well established. The active trade union movement includes in its membership approximately 32 percent of the employed labor force. Unions are entirely free of government and political party control and may participate in political life. They are free to maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields.

All union members, except civil servants, have the legal right to strike. The interests of civil servants are safeguarded by an arbitration committee. Moreover, the Government is considering proposing a bill that would permit most civil servants to strike, except those who provide vital services, such as air traffic controllers and soldiers.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is full freedom of religion in The Netherlands. State subsidies in the educational field are provided to religious organizations which maintain educational facilities. The amount of the subsidy is based on the number of students attending the schools.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of domestic and foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation in The Netherlands. Restrictions are not placed on residence. The Netherlands has provided first asylum for refugees from Eastern European countries and permanent resettlement for a limited number of persons, principally from Eastern Europe and Vietnam.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Netherlands is a functioning multiparty democracy. Nationwide elections are held every 4 years (or more frequently in the event of a parliamentary vote of no-confidence). In the most recent elections in September 1982, a center-right coalition came to power replacing a center-left government. Political parties are numerous (13 have seats in Parliament) and represent all points of view, from the far right to the far left. Women have full political rights and are increasingly represented in political life. Approximately 20 percent of the members of the lower house of Parliament are women.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Netherlands has not been the subject of international human rights investigations. There are a number of Dutch groups interested in human rights abroad, as well as national chapters of international organizations such as Amnesty International. The Netherlands Government is active in the United Nations Human Rights Commission and other international forums concerned with human rights.

Amnesty International's 1985 Report did not mention the Netherlands. Freedom House rated the Netherlands "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Netherlands has a population of 14,481,000, and per capita gross national product was just under $10,000 in 1983. The right to private property is protected in the Dutch market economy.

The welfare state is well established, with an extensive system of cash and tax benefits to assist the unemployed and handicapped and to provide adequate educational and health opportunities to all citizens. Average life expectancy is 76 years, and the infant mortality rate is 8.1 per 1,000 live births. Primary education is universal.

The minimum age for employment of young people is 15. At 15 years of age, they may work full-time only if they have completed the mandatory 10 years of schooling. Children still in school at age 15 may not work more than 8 hours per week. Laws prohibit children under the age of 18 from working at night, from working overtime, and from working in areas which could be dangerous to their physical or mental development.

Dutch law adequately protects the safety and health of workers. The average workweek for adults is 38 hours. Workers 18 years and older receive a minimum of 15 days paid vacation per year. Full-time workers between the ages of 15 and 18 receive a minimum paid vacation of 20 days per year. Wages are sufficient to provide a decent living for workers and their families.

Women enjoy full legal and political equality in The Netherlands. In economic life, the entry of substantial numbers of women into the labor force occurred somewhat later in The Netherlands than in most Western industrialized countries. The Government and most political parties continue to advocate special consideration for women in order to further progress in the area of economic equality.

The problem of effectively integrating Dutch racial and ethnic minorities into national economic and social life is perhaps the most difficult human rights related issue confronting the Dutch Government. Thousands of persons from the former Dutch colony of Suriname and The Netherlands Antilles have come to live in The Netherlands in recent years. In addition, there are significant numbers of foreign guest workers, mostly from Turkey and Morocco. These groups face some overt discrimination in housing and employment, as well as practical limits on opportunities for social and economic advancement caused by inadequate educational levels compared to the majority of Dutch citizens. There is a widespread fear among the Dutch that discrimination, prompted by difficult economic times throughout The Netherlands, is increasing. There have been isolated instances of violence against persons for racial reasons during the past 2 years.

Government policy to combat discrimination is outlined in its 1983 "Minority Note." This document is a comprehensive plan of action to address the problems of minorities in the fields of health, education, employment, and the law. It works from a basic premise that maximum integration of racial minorities into broader Dutch society is the only way to achieve full equality. The report includes sections to address the special problems of minorities, youth, and women.

In 1985, the Government sent to Parliament a policy memorandum on return migration. The memorandum was designed to clarify the return policy, first outlined in the 1983 Note. There had been criticism of aspects of the policy which proposed financial "incentives" for those foreign-born persons who wish to return to their former country of residence. The 1985 memorandum made clear that return migration was entirely voluntary. Financial assistance is provided to assist certain foreign nationals who wish to leave The Netherlands but lack the means to do so. In an experimental program to last 1 year, workers between the ages of 55 and 64 who have been legally resident in The Netherlands for not less than 5 years and have been unemployed for not less than 6 months may be eligible to receive payment of the costs of the return journey and regular Dutch social security benefits.

NORWAY

Norway is a constitutional monarchy and parliamentary democracy. King Olav V is the titular Head of State, but his role is mainly symbolic. Norway is governed by a Prime Minister, Cabinet, and a 157-seat Parliament which is elected every 4 years and cannot be dissolved. At present, the Conservative, Christian People's, and Center Parties form a coalition government with Conservative leader Kare Willoch as Prime Minister.

An advanced industrial state, Norway has a mixed economy combining private, public, and state ownership. Individual freedoms, such as freedom of association and speech, and the right to pursue private interests and hold private property are guaranteed by Norway's Constitution and respected in practice.

Deeply rooted democratic principles, a strong egalitarian tradition, a lively press, and highly developed educational and social welfare systems have made Norway a leading defender of human rights in the world. During 1985 major domestic human rights issues included the rights of immigrants, those seeking political asylum, and those who object to military service on political grounds, as well as continuing concern on expanding opportunities for women.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Politically motivated killings have not occurred in Norway.

b. Disappearance

Secret arrests and detentions have not occurred in Norway.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment do not exist in Norway's humane penal system. The maximum sentence is 21 years. The emphasis in Norwegian prisons is on rehabilitation.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Norwegian law provides for arrest warrants, which are used except in circumstances such as hot pursuit. Persons may be detained for up to 4 hours without being charged. A person charged with a crime has the right, observed in practice, to appear before a judge for arraignment within 24 hours. If charges are formalized at the arraignment, the judge then determines whether the detainee should be kept in custody or released pending trial. A strong case must be made to justify detention. Possible grounds include fear of flight, the needs of the investigation, and fear that a detainee will commit further crimes.

Although a provision for bail exists in Norwegian law, it is not used. A person in pretrial detention generally appears before a judge every 4 weeks for a new determination of the necessity of continued detention.

There is no legal limit on the time a prisoner can be held before trial. Considerable concern was expressed during 1985 over some cases of extended pretrial detention. In one case, a recent immigrant accused of narcotics offenses was held in pretrial detention for over 7 months before a court reached a verdict of innocence. In another case, an individual accused of crimes of moral turpitude was held in detention for 1-1/2 years before being sentenced to only 90 days' imprisonment. Pretrial detention for more than a year is, however, rare. Preventive detention exists but is used infrequently, as in the temporary detention of rowdy youth by the police.

Forced or compulsory labor does not exist in Norway.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair, public trial is guaranteed by law and honored in practice. Only in certain cases, including those involving state security or private family matters, are trials closed. In criminal cases, Norwegian citizens and aliens are entitled to free counsel of their choice, regardless of their income. In certain civil cases, indigent persons are guaranteed free counsel. Charges are stated formally and clearly. Except for the labor court, which mediates industrial relations disputes, the civil court is Norway's only judicial system and thus tries military and security cases as well. The judiciary is independent of both the legislative and the executive branches of government, as well as of the military.

During 1985, the legality of imprisoning those refusing both military service and alternative civil service became a public issue. Persons refusing both kinds of service have been held in prison for up to 16 months (the equivalent period of military service) without a trial. Detention is based on an administrative decision and not a judicial one. To date, 150 Norwegians refusing both military and civil service have been held in prison on administrative decisions only, although they have received the salary and benefits normally accorded to military recruits during this period of confinement. During 1985, one person imprisoned without trial brought his complaint before the European Human Rights Commission, which accepted his case for hearing, marking only the third time the Commission has agreed to hear a complaint against Norway.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The privacy of the family and individual is free from arbitrary interference by the State. Police may conduct searches of the home only with court approval and in instances of hot pursuit or when they fear evidence is being destroyed. There have been no allegations of forced official entry into Norwegian homes in 1985. In most cases wiretapping is prohibited by law, but it can be used in state security cases or narcotics offenses when officially approved by the court within carefully drawn and monitored legal guidelines. Correspondence may be opened only with authorization of the court in cases involving state security.

NORWAY

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Norway's Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press, and these freedoms are respected in practice. In addition to restrictions on slander and libel, Norwegian law forbids racist or sexist remarks in printed or public speech. No one may publish information concerning national defense which could prove damaging to Norwegian security. During 1985 eight journalists were tried and found guilty of publishing information on secret Norwegian military installations. The journalists explained that their goal was to promote a defense policy debate on the locations of these installations and not to serve the interests of foreign powers. The cases initiated an active debate concerning the need for greater freedom of information and freedom of expression on political/military matters.

Norway has an active and diversified press sustained in part by government subsidies. Television and radio have long been operated by one state-owned broadcasting company, but the Government does not exercise direct editorial control. In recent years an experimental program for local, low-power radio stations has been expanded throughout the country, and licenses have been granted to private groups to operate local cable television stations.

Certain limitations apply to freedom of public expression with respect to the showing of films. Films must be reviewed by the Norwegian State Film Control Board, which has the authority to censor or ban any film that is overly violent, pornographic, or blasphemous. There is no evidence that any films have been censored because of political content.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Norwegians exercise these freedoms without restraint. Public demonstrations require advance permission which is routinely given.

Unions have the right to organize, negotiate, and strike. The Government, however, has the right to invoke compulsory arbitration under certain circumstances.

With membership totaling about 60 percent of the Norwegian work force, unions play an important role in Norway's political and economic life and are consulted by the Government on important economic and social problems. Although the largest trade union federation is associated with the Labor Party, all unions are free of party and government control. They maintain strong ties with international bodies such as the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

The state church is the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Norway, to which 93 percent of the population belongs. There is a constitutional requirement that the King and half of the Cabinet belong to the state church. In addition, the Norwegian Work Environment Act permits prospective employers to ask job applicants in certain categories of work, such as positions which can influence child development, whether they respect Christian beliefs and principles.

NORWAY

Approximately 4 percent of the population are registered members of 20 other denominations which operate freely and may proselytize. No religious community is required to register with the Government unless it desires state support, which is provided to all registered denominations on a proportional basis in accordance with membership.

Although the state religion is taught in all public schools, children of other faiths are allowed to be absent from such classes upon parental request. If a sufficient number of students belongs to the same faith, the school will arrange religion classes in that faith. Workers belonging to minority denominations are allowed leave for religious holidays.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not impede foreign or domestic travel, and Norwegians have full freedom of movement inside or outside Norway. The right to voluntary repatriation is guaranteed. Since 1945, the Norwegian authorities have granted asylum to approximately 11,000 persons, about half of them Vietnamese. During 1985, several nongovernmental organizations and human rights groups expressed concern about the treatment of those seeking political asylum in Norway, focusing on the well-publicized case of eight Iranians who arrived from Turkey and were sent back, although their acceptance as refugees by the Turkish authorities was not assured. The Norwegian Government later allowed the Iranians to return to Norway after consulting with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. Also in 1985, human rights groups and the press paid considerable attention to 3 Vietnamese children whose parents were refused immigration because the children were beyond the legal age limit of 15 qualifying for family reunification. Upon reconsideration, the Government changed the legal limit to 18 and granted asylum to the parents.

The status of immigrants under Norwegian law surfaced over the proposed deportation of certain immigrants with longstanding residence in the country (over 7 years) upon separation or divorce from their Norwegian spouses. One person won his appeal of this decision and was allowed to remain in Norway, while the other cases are still pending.

Norway is a multiparty democracy ruled by a freely elected government. Six parties are represented in the Parliament (Storting); distribution of seats is based upon proportional representation by district. The Storting may reject or modify government proposals; if a government loses a vote on a major issue of confidence, it resigns and a new government is formed. The minimum voting age is 18, and voter turnout in the 1985 parliamentary elections was almost 84 percent. Foreigners who have resided in Norway for at least 3 years and are otherwise eligible have the right to vote in local elections.

While the Sami (Lapps) are the only significant minority (0.5 percent) with long residence in Norway, the influx of refugees and guest workers has produced other minorities. Neither the Sami nor any other ethnic minority is represented at present in the Storting. Women hold approximately 35 percent of Storting seats and 22 percent of Cabinet positions.

Norway cooperated during 1985 with the European Human Rights Commission when it investigated a complaint by a prisoner of conscience concerning his imprisonment without trial. It also consulted with the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees with regard to the Iranians seeking political asylum in Norway from a third country where their safety might be in question, and accepted the advice of the High Commissioner on a case-by-case basis. Norway is itself an active participant in international human rights organizations which investigate alleged human rights abuses.

Within Norway, an Office of the Ombudsman provides a direct route for individual complaints against government agencies. A number of organizations monitor alleged human rights abuses either inside or, more often, outside the country. They include the Equal Rights Council (concerned with women's rights), the Immigrant Council, the Oslo Peace Research Institute, and the state-supported Human Rights Project. During 1985, an advisory council composed of government officials, legal experts, and representatives from nongovernmental organizations was formed to monitor human rights practices internationally.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International did not mention Norway. Freedom House rated Norway "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Norway's population in 1985 was 4,152,000, growing at an annual rate of 0.3 percent. Norway's per capita gross national product was $14,020 in 1983. The Government has virtually eliminated poverty through redistribution of income by subsidies, progressive income taxes, and other means.

Through a highly developed social welfare system that reflects a long tradition of egalitarianism, the Government meets the health, educational, retirement, and other needs of its people regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. Life expectancy at birth was 76.1 years, while the infant mortality rate was 7.5 per 1,000 live births. Education at all levels is free. There are 9 years of compulsory schooling, and the primary school enrollment ratio (as of 1982) was 101.7 percent.

Under the Working Environment Act, all employed persons are assured safe and physically acceptable working conditions. Children are not permitted to work full-time before the age of 15. Ordinary working hours do not exceed 40 hours per week, and 25 working days of paid leave is granted per year (31 for those over 60). All workers are assured an adequate minimum wage, with standards set by the Government within each industry.

Women form over 40 percent of the work force and are protected under the Equal Rights Law of 1978 and other regulations. A State Equal Rights Council monitors enforcement of the 1978 law, and an equal rights ombudsman processes complaints of sexual discrimination? The Government provides for liberal maternity leave and time off for either parent to care for their children.

Apart from an extremely small Finnish population in the northeastern corner of the country, the Sami (Lapp) people were Norway's only significant minority group until the influx of immigrants during the 1970's. In recent years, the Government has taken steps to protect the cultural rights of the Sami by providing Sami language instruction at schools in Sami-inhabited areas, radio and television programs broadcast or subtitled in the Sami language, and subsidies for the publication of newspapers and books oriented toward the Sami.

There is a lively political debate on whether current restrictions on non-Nordic immigration, in effect since 1975, are racially motivated and whether immigrant minority groups, such as Pakistanis, Vietnamese, Turks, and Africans, are in practice treated equally by Norwegian authorities. The government provides legal protection for all minorities' rights and has taken active measures to help these groups adjust to Norwegian society, including free Norwegian-language instruction for any foreign resident.

POLAND

Poland is ruled by the leadership of the Polish United Workers (Communist) Party (PUWP) headed by General Jaruzelski. He is also the Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces in his capacity as Chairman of the National Defense Committee. In November 1985 General Jaruzelski became Chairman of the Council of State and was replaced as Chairman of the Council of Ministers by Zbigniew Messner, an economist. Two other parties, the United Peasants Party and the Democratic Party, are represented in the Government and the Sejm (Parliament), but their representatives collaborate closely with and are dominated by the Communist leadership.

Poland has a powerful security apparatus administered by the Minister of Internal Affairs. The Ministry's power was trimmed briefly by the trial and conviction of four of its secret police officers for the October 1984 kidnapping and murder of Father Jerzy Popieluszko, a Catholic priest and human rights activist with close ties to the Solidarity trade union movement. They received sentences of up to 25 years in prison. Since the termination of martial law in 1983, the army has returned to its barracks but a military leader, General Kiszczak, remains Minister of the Interior.

Poland's economic recovery continues slowly under the burden of substantial economic difficulties, including large debts to foreign creditors. Reforms aimed at greater decentralization of decisionmaking have modified only marginally the economic system's basic dependence on central control over resource management, production, and distribution. The major exception to that system remains Poland's predominantly private agricultural sector, in which the right to own land is provided. Small private businesses, mostly in the crafts and service areas, are also permitted.

During 1985, the principal issue of public life in Poland remained the tension between the Government and the great numbers of Poles who distrust or oppose the regime of General Jaruzelski. The Polish Constitution and legal code provide for a wide spectrum of civil and political rights. Other legislation, however, makes it clear that these rights are subordinate to the interests of the State. In an important negative development in the human rights area, legislation enacted in 1985 modified the Penal Code to provide, among other things, for the greatly enlarged use of summary courts. These courts are empowered to bring an accused to trial within 48 hours of arrest and to impose prison terms of up to 3 years for certain criminal and noncriminal offenses. According to an official source, some 20 percent of all penal cases were being heard under accelerated procedures, and more than 8,000 persons, including many of at least 400 political prisoners, had been sentenced between July and December under these accelerated proceedings.

Other negative developments included: the conviction and sentencing of 3 noted opposition activists to prison terms of 2-1/2 to 3-1/2 years for participating in a meeting which allegedly discussed plans to call a 15-minute strike protesting food price rises; amendments to the Trade Union Act of 1985 which indefinitely postponed the possibility of union pluralism; legislation concerning higher education which severely reduced the relative independence of Polish universities; and the increase in the number of political prisoners detained in jail or serving sentences from about 50 at the beginning of 1985 to a high of about 360 in mid-October. A limited release of political prisoners was announced late in November. By year's end there were still at least 200 people being held on political charges.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

On February 7, 4 officers of the security service of the Ministry of Internal Affairs received prison sentences ranging from 14 to 25 years for their roles in the kidnapping and murder of the Catholic human rights activist and Solidarity supporter, Father Jerzy Popieluszko. Their conviction marked the end of a public trial, unprecedented in postwar Eastern Europe, in which members of the secret police were made accountable for their illegal activities against a citizen. Despite the outcome of the trial, many Poles remain convinced some senior official inspired the killing and will never be brought to trial.

The Polish Helsinki Committee believes that since December 13, 1981, the deaths of at least 118 persons, including many active in Solidarity, may be directly attributed to the violent imposition of martial law and the continuing suppression of popular movements in the name of public order. The committee alleges that six individuals died in 1985 as a result of physical abuse by police after arrest, and that three Solidarity activists died under suspicious circumstances. The committee reports no instances of deaths brought about during 1985 by police operations or actions against strikers or demonstrators.

Instances of prolonged or permanent disappearance have not been reported.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is no evidence that the authorities systematically use torture to extract information. However, there have been frequent complaints by human rights groups of the militia or secret police having beaten or mistreated persons in their custody.

In December a Polish human rights activist released a report accusing prison authorities in the southwestern Polish town of Leczyca of torturing (beating) several political prisoners. In March a French citizen, Frederic Castaing, was detained by police in Krakow for 48 hours, accused of acting as a courier for Solidarity, and then given 48 hours to leave the country. Just after his release he was reportedly seized by three unidentified men, taken to an isolated location, tortured for several hours by burning with cigarettes, and then left near a hospital. In April in the same city, a Catholic priest with ties to the Solidarity movement, Father Tadeusz Zaleski, reported that he was attacked and gassed at home by a masked man and received second degree burns on his face, chest, and hands. The Government dismissed Father Zaleski's claim and implied that his wounds were self-inflicted; the Church has supported Father Zaleski's version. In December, Father Zaleski was again reportedly attacked, this time by two men and one woman, and had to be hospitalized with head injuries. Incidents of this nature are not likely to occur without secret police involvement.

Both the militia and the riot police have employed unwarranted force, such as beatings and the use of water cannon, against peaceful antigovernment demonstrators. As there have been fewer demonstrations in 1985, there have also been fewer reports of the use of excessive police force.

There were continuing reports of poor prison conditions for political prisoners and of some prisoners suffering from food poisoning or hepatitis as a result of eating the prison fare. Medical services reportedly were also poor at many prisons. Some prisoners have been furloughed in order to obtain necessary medical care.

Prisoners who engaged in hunger strikes, either to protest prison conditions or to gain governmental recognition as political prisoners, have been subjected to force-feeding by prison authorities, sometimes administered so ineptly as to cause injury.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Polish law allows for a 48-hour detention period before the authorities have to bring formal charges. Certain categories of offenses may actually be tried within 48 hours of arrest under special, accelerated procedures, whose use was greatly enlarged under legislation passed in May 1985. Other suspects, after the presentation of the legal basis for formal investigation, may be held in indefinite "investigatory" or "temporary" arrest. During this period there is no guarantee of access to a lawyer. Once a formal indictment is filed, the defendant is allowed ample time to study the charges in consultation with an attorney of his or her choice. A trial date is set only after the defendant expresses readiness. Legal provisions for bail are rarely used, but suspects, as well as those already convicted, are sometimes furloughed for humanitarian reasons.

Polish law does not contain any provision for forced exile.

Under 1983 legislation, individuals who are registered as unemployed and who refuse to seek employment without adequate justification can be listed as "habitual parasites" and compelled to accept specific employment, usually street cleaning, park maintenance or garbage collection, under threat of penal sanction. To date application of the law does not suggest it is intended as a means of political coercion or education, as an additional sanction against the free expression of political or ideological opinions, or as a means of racial or social discrimination. Penal sanctions under this law are rare. In August wide publicity was given to the case of a man in Szczecin fined roughly $2,000, or more than 1 year's average income, for refusing persistently to accept a job as garbage collector.

POLAND

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Amendments to the Penal Code enacted by the Sejm (Parliament) in May 1985 and put into effect on July 1, ostensibly to assure the speedy hearing of certain accusations, have greatly enlarged the application of special accelerated trial procedures that severely limit the rights of defendants. In such summary trials, charges are made by the police rather than the prosecution, and the defendants are not given an opportunity to choose an attorney. The assigned public defender has little time to discuss the case with his client and no time to search for witnesses or for evidence of innocence since the defendant may be tried within 48 hours of arrest. These special courts, which earlier dealt with a narrow range of misdemeanor-type offenses, can now pronounce prison sentences of up to 3 years and a fine of about $3,000 for some offenses. On October 16 a deputy minister of justice announced that some 20 percent of all penal charges were being heard under this "accelerated procedure."

During the trial of four officers of the security service for the murder of Father Popieluszko (see Section 1.a.), testimony about the possible involvement of senior government figures was censored from media coverage. Furthermore, the prosecutor's closing statement sharply attacked Father Popieluszko and the Catholic Church.

The trial of opposition activists Bogdan Lis, Adam Michnik, and Wladyslaw Frasyniuk during May and June in Gdansk was widely criticized for the "political" nature of the charges, for the conduct of the trial, and for the verdict. All three were arrested in a private meeting in Gdansk on February 13 at which the Government alleged that a token 15-minute strike in protest against price rises was being discussed. The charges against them were fomenting public unrest and participating in the activities of an illegal association (Solidarity's underground Temporary Coordinating Commission). The trial was closed to journalists, outside observers, and the general public. The court reportedly often prevented the defendants from addressing the charges against them and, on occasion, ordered them removed from the court for protesting violations of their rights or improper judicial procedure. The verdict, sentencing the defendants to terms of 2-1/2, 3, and 3-1/2 years was widely deplored.

During the course of 1985 the number of political prisoners rose continually according to official figures, from about 50 as the year began to a peak of over 360 in October. Throughout 1985 the spokesman of the Government reported frequently on the number of persons imprisoned or arrested for "noncriminal reasons." On October 22 he said that the figures included "282 persons held in investigative custody, 70 convicts, and 11 not embraced by the 1984 Amnesty Act--a total of 363 persons." By year's end the Government said about 200 prisoners had been released, leaving at least 160 still in custody. Human rights groups estimated that with continuing arrests, at least 200 people were still being held. They consider that the Government's figures do not include various political activists arrested or convicted on criminal charges. Many also decry the fact that the official figure includes the four secret police officers convicted for the murder of Father Popieluszko.

POLAND

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although government activities in Poland appear less intrusive than in other Warsaw Pact countries, it is generally assumed that mail and phone calls are selectively monitored. Overt censorship of the mail and announced monitoring of telephone calls ceased with the suspension of martial law. Packages to be mailed abroad must be assembled at the post office in the presence of a customs official or postal worker. The Government does not interfere with the right to marry or to have children as one chooses, nor does it prevent the teaching of religion to children at home or in churches. However, the Government often views as suspect the contacts of its citizens with foreigners and with domestic political opponents. Searches without warrant of homes and offices and confiscation of personal documents and property continue in Poland. Warrants are sometimes required under Polish law, although the circumstances under which the warrant requirement applies are ambiguous.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution provides for freedom of speech, this right has been systematically abridged. The freedom to express one's opinion in a coffeehouse conversation is generally tolerated, while the freedom to distribute opposition pamphlets or deliver a controversial speech in a public place is not.

One example of freedom of expression is the monthly "Mass for the Fatherland" held in the church of St. Stanislaw Kostka where Father Popieluszko used to preach (see Section 1.a.). Attendance at the Mass is regarded as a way of expressing support for the Catholic Church, Father Popieluszko's work, and the ideals of the Solidarity trade union movement.

Official censorship of all media exists as part of the authorities' control mechanism. Censorship in Poland generally assumes one of three basic forms. First, there is self-censorship. Many articles are consciously or unconsciously self-censored by their authors before being submitted, more often to increase the chances for publication than to avoid specific reprisals. Second, editors of state-run media may kill an article or program entirely, if they feel its content is too controversial. Controversial articles or programs which do appear are often the result of prolonged bargaining with editors and censors. Finally, there is the government censorship apparatus. It is frequently impossible to detect the impact of the formal censorship process in state-controlled media, but such publications as the Catholic weekly, Tygodnik Powszechny, and the monthly of the Catholic intelligentsia clubs, Wiesz, indicate to their readers, in brackets, where the censors have deleted material and which particular provision of the censorship laws has been invoked.

The vast majority of newspapers and journals are state-owned and operated, as are publishing houses, television channels, and radio stations. While the state-owned press follows the approved government line on all essential issues, it does provide a forum for debate on certain domestic issues and even on some foreign policy questions. This is usually a debate of nuance rather than of fundamental principles, goals, or policies. The major national dailies are closely identified with elements of the ruling elite (e.g., the Communist Party, the government apparatus, and the armed forces), and the distinct interests of each can often be detected in its paper's columns. In addition, long articles, essays, and columns in various weeklies present contending views on such matters as economic and administrative reform, public policy and cadre matters, the nature and extent of "national reconciliation", and the role of the Church and labor unions.

Despite censorship, Poland may still have the least controlled official press (as distinct from the more tightly run electronic media) of all Warsaw Pact countries. In addition, some nongovernmental publications like Tygodnik Powszechny offer a true alternative voice to the government-run media, although their circulation and impact are limited by government restrictions on newsprint and by censorship. There is also an active underground press, chiefly reflecting the views of the banned Solidarity trade union and its supporters. It publishes weekly newspapers, periodicals, and books despite government efforts to stamp it out.

Amendments adopted in July 1985 to the 1982 higher education law empower local and national authorities to increase substantially their control over universities and other college-level institutions which could significantly increase the curbs on freedom of inquiry. The changes in the law provide for the vetting of all candidates for rectorships by the Minister of Higher Education for a greater degree of direct government involvement in university operations, and for strict limitations on the role of university senates and student self-government. The 1985 amendments legislate the composition of university senates, reserving seats for party and other official representatives and senior faculty, while limiting representation for younger faculty, "nonscientific" university employees, and students. In late 1985 over 70 rectors, deans, and department chairmen were dismissed from their administrative positions in order to ensure tighter government control.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association remain restricted in Poland. Public meetings and rallies require official sponsorship or permission, and permission is not granted for meetings of opposition groups such as Solidarity. Unauthorized protest meetings and demonstrations continued to occur in 1985, but with less participation than in the martial law period. Small gatherings, usually of students or workers, take place in private homes for the purpose of participating in "free university" courses and seminars on Polish history, sociology, economics, and other subjects. The authorities have generally not interfered with these meetings.

A "law on foundations," enacted in spring 1984, established a judicial basis for the formation of private, nonprofit institutions to conduct certain charitable, social, and health-related activities. The Roman Catholic Church and Government representatives continued to discuss details of the proposed church-sponsored foundation to assist Polish private farmers. Discussions are also under way with the Rockefeller

Brothers Foundation on a program to assist Polish agriculture and to promote export earnings.

Associations or clubs need either official permission or sponsorship. Since the end of martial law, some organizations, notably Catholic intelligentsia clubs, have been permitted to resume activities. About 40 such clubs exist throughout the country.

Professional associations, such as the writers' union, were disbanded under martial law and replaced by organizations more subservient to the Government. These associations must be registered with the courts, which in some cases have refused to grant legal recognition to an association or union, because its charter did not conform to legal requirements.

A 1982 Trade Union law outlawed Solidarity and other labor unions and provided for the formation of new government-controlled unions. A few unions were organized under the new law at the enterprise level (factory or shop) in 1983, and industry-wide occupational federations (e.g., of steelworkers' unions) were formed in 1984. Following a national congress in late November 1984, organizers proclaimed the formation of the national alliance of trade unions or OPZZ. Formal legal registration of the new union confederation followed quickly. The OPZZ has joined the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions.

Additional national meetings and organizational activities of the OPZZ took place throughout 1985. The OPZZ played a well-publicized role in government-sponsored public consultations, first on the national economic plan and later on the related issues of food price increases and rationing. In both cases the alliance took public positions critical of elements of government policy and declared its intention to be a "troublesome partner" of the Government in vigorously defending workers' interests, especially on bread and butter issues.

During the spring, the OPZZ participated in a government-established commission to amend the 1982 law. The resulting amendments, approved by the Sejm (Parliament) during the summer, gave the OPZZ greater power to distribute such fringe benefits as allocation of spaces in factory-owned vacation resorts, priority in purchasing apartments, and permits to buy cars, household furnishings, appliances, and other items in relatively short supply on the market. Significantly, the amendments also postponed indefinitely any reintroduction of union pluralism.

In a separate action, the Government formally transferred to the OPZZ the offices, equipment, and financial assets of Solidarity and other pre-1982 unions. The authorities have recently brought a court action against the former Solidarity leader in Wroclaw, Jozef Pinior, who had retained the fund of union dues that had belonged to his Solidarity region before martial law and refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of the new unions.

According to official statements, the OPZZ has a membership of some 5.5 million. The official Polish press agency reported on August 27 that 60 percent of the members, or about 3.3 million, are active workers (the Solidarity trade union in the premartial law period had nearly 10 million members). The non-rural work force is estimated to total about 15 million. Although Solidarity has not had legal status since the 1982 Trade Union Act, some factory-level Solidarity organizations continue to carry out informational, educational, and self-help activities among workers and their families on a local level.

Previous involvement in Solidarity activities deters management from hiring an applicant, thus curtailing both worker mobility and possibilities for union activity. Workers continue to be dismissed from their jobs because of previous or continued support of Solidarity. This has affected, in particular, ex-internees or political prisoners who have been released.

The right to strike exists by law, but it is severely limited. Those who, in the opinion of the authorities, abuse the right are subject to criminal punishment. Unofficial observers believe that local unauthorized strikes occurred frequently in 1985. Most of these actions concerned local issues and were settled quickly through conciliatory actions by management. There are reports, however, that the organizers of unauthorized strikes sometimes suffer subsequent discrimination. Political activity by trade unions is specifically forbidden by law, and the Government can broadly interpret what is considered "political." The right to collective bargaining for wages and improved working conditions has been considerably restricted since the suspension and subsequent prohibition of Solidarity. The Government acknowledged in October 1985 that factory managements have "failed to create conditions for trade unions to fulfill the role of co-manager."

The Constitution guarantees "freedom of conscience and belief," and Polish citizens, both in law and fact, enjoy considerable freedom to practice their religion. However, party authorities discourage the open practice of religion. The Church has criticized a new campaign for propagating atheism in the schools.

Poland is overwhelmingly Roman Catholic; the Catholic Church maintains over 3,300 churches, schools, and other institutions. Seminaries train large numbers of priests, and many religious orders are represented. The Catholic Church publishes significant numbers of books and periodicals, as does the independent Catholic press. Sunday Mass is broadcast over Polish radio under a provision of the 1980 Gdansk Accords that is still observed. The Catholic University of Lublin remains the only university in Eastern Europe under private control.

Relations between the Government and the Roman Catholic Church have been strained, particularly so following the 1984 murder of human rights activist Father Jerzy Popieluszko. The Bishops' Conference protested the conduct and official press coverage of the trial of his accused assailants, as well as press attacks on Pope John Paul II. An April incident in which a priest claimed he had been attacked and tortured added further tension. Efforts to establish a church-administered foundation to aid private agriculture continued to meet official obstacles. A June meeting between General Jaruzelski and Cardinal Glemp, the Polish Primate, appeared to do little to resolve church-state issues. But discussions take place frequently at various levels. The Primate and the Episcopate as a whole, as well as individual clergy and Catholic lay leaders, continue to campaign vigorously for greater individual freedom and respect for human rights.

There is no official discrimination against minority religions. The Orthodox, Muslim, and Jewish faiths and the various Protestant denominations sometimes find it difficult to maintain their places of worship and train their clergy. Their representatives cite limited financial resources, some traditional prejudices, and widely dispersed congregations as the chief reasons for their difficulties. Protestant services are also broadcast on Sundays over Polish radio.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on travel within Poland. There are no legal restrictions on changing one's residence, but the housing shortage makes this nearly impossible in practice. Cases of persons working in one location and legally "residing" hundreds of kilometers away are not uncommon.

The 1983 law on the liberalized issuance of passports for travel abroad continues to be applied flexibly. Actual denials of passport applications are not numerous but do occur. Denials are most often received by persons working in areas of scientific research or industry considered "sensitive" by the Government. Several prominent dissidents have been denied passports for visits abroad; many others have declined to apply for passports, fearing that, once out of Poland, they would be denied the right to return.

In order to receive an emigration passport, Poles must divest themselves of all real property and obtain customs permission for any personal items they wish to take. Although most applicants for emigration passports eventually obtain them, certain cases appear to require an unduly lengthy waiting period. While a few Solidarity members, formerly interned or jailed because of their activity, have been denied passports when seeking to relocate to another country, many others have been encouraged to leave, as the Government tries to rid the country of persons it views as "troublesome." Once residing abroad, a Polish citizen must exchange an emigration passport for a consular passport (one issued by a Polish Consulate abroad) for return trips to Poland. Otherwise there are no formal restrictions on an emigrant's return to Poland.

Only Polish citizens who have been issued emigration passports are legally permitted to take up residence in another country. Polish citizens who leave Poland on tourist passports and take up residence abroad without the permission of the Polish Government may, should they return to Poland for a temporary stay, experience difficulties departing again. Polish citizens who emigrate legally from Poland, and who desire to return for brief visits on consular passports, generally experience few difficulties with the authorities.

Under Polish citizenship law, only the Council of State may revoke citizenship. According to the law, involuntary revocation must be based on one of the following activities: actions violating the duty of allegiance to the Polish State; actions detrimental to the substantial interests of Poland; departure from Poland after May 9, 1945, and failure to return when so requested by the Polish Government; evasion of military service; or conviction abroad of a crime also recognized as a felony under Polish criminal law. The Government recently used this prerogative in revoking the citizenship of two former ambassadors who defected to the United States, as well as the citizenship of a Polish journalist now working for Radio Free Europe.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Poland is ruled by the PUWP, or Communist Party, through General Jaruzelski who, with a small group of advisers, determines national policy goals. They implement policy through the government ministries and through a parallel party bureaucracy which complements and interacts with the ministries. Unlike elsewhere in Eastern Europe, the party is not always clearly the dominating force. Various economic ministries, as well as the military and security services often play key roles, not only in exercising power but also sometimes in setting policies. The two other coalition partners, the United Peasants Party and the Democratic Party, continue to be responsive to PUWP guidance as is the Patriotic Movement for National Rebirth, an umbrella group of political, economic, and social organizations that cooperates with the authorities.

The Constitution specifies that the Sejm (Parliament) is the chief legislative body of Poland. The Sejm can be counted on to pass, nearly unanimously, any legislation that the Prime Minister and the relevant bureaucracies believe is necessary. Nevertheless, when the authorities seemed undecided or divided during 1985, deputies in the Sejm were on occasion able to modify proposed legislation, especially in behind-the-scenes committee sessions.

National parliamentary elections were held in October 1985. After wide-ranging debate on possible democratic reforms, including an open nomination procedure and mandatory use of the voting booth, the PUWP decided, nevertheless, to keep all crucial controls in its hands. In addition to 50 uncontested seats, which included Jaruzelski, most of his closest advisers, and other leaders, 2 candidates, each of the same party or grouping, were nominated to vie for each of the other 410 seats in the Sejm. The PUWP maintained its nominal majority in the Sejm. Although the number of nonparty deputies rose from 49 to 74, many were identified with the Jaruzelski regime. Several critical voices from the previous Sejm were not renominated.

According to the Government, more than 78 percent of eligible voters went to the polls, up from the 75 percent turnout it claimed in the 1984 local elections. The opposition, claimed that the turnout was only about 66 percent. The Government is bringing charges against Solidarity leader Lech Walesa on the grounds of having slandered the State in presenting Solidarity's figures for the election.

POLAND

Although the Government signed the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, it generally maintains that international inquiries into the human rights situation in Poland constitute interference in Poland's internal affairs. This attitude was evident throughout the International Labor Organization's (ILO) investigation of violations of international labor standards in Poland. The report of the ILO's commission of inquiry, published in June 1984, noted that the Polish Government "systematically abstained from participating in the procedure and from replying to the various communications addressed to it concerning the complaint." The ILO found that "the basic objection advanced by the Government of Poland to justify its attitude of non-cooperation was...that the procedure of the complaint constituted interference in Poland's internal affairs." The ILO found the Government's objection "devoid of any legal validity." After the ILO governing body voted in November 1984 to note the commission's report, thereby turning the case over to the ILO's normal executive machinery, Poland announced its intention to withdraw from the ILO.

The Government has also not cooperated in the implementation of a 1983 resolution of the United Nations Human Rights Commission requesting the Secretary General or his designee to update and complete a comprehensive study of the human rights situation in Poland. The Government refused to allow the Secretary General's special representative to visit Poland in preparation of his report.

Domestic human rights organizations are not officially allowed in Poland. The Polish Helsinki Committee, which operates anonymously, issues reports from time to time on the human rights situation in Poland. Following the murder of Father Popieluszko, groups of prominent intellectuals and social activists undertook to form several open committees on human rights, generally known by the Polish acronym "KOPP." The Government declared such organizations illegal and warned foreign news correspondents that they risked prosecution if they attended news conferences called by such committees. Many KOPP members have been questioned by the police regarding their activities; several have been fined or given short jail sentences. In June human rights activist Jan Kostecki was sentenced to 2 years in prison for his activities as deputy chairman of the regional KOPP in Szczecin. Underground Solidarity publications also call attention to reports of human rights violations. Several score individuals were arrested during 1985 for alleged participation in illegal publication, distribution, or broadcasting activities. In October, two persons received sentences under summary procedures of 3 years' and 2-1/2 years' imprisonment for unauthorized possession of broadcasting equipment.

The Catholic Church has actively employed its influence and moral authority to protect the persecuted and increase respect for human rights. The Primate's Aid Committee for Political Prisoners is one example of this activity.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International expressed concern about the arrest and detention of hundreds of prisoners of conscience, allegations of ill-treatment and torture of political prisoners, and unexplained deaths of political activists. Freedom House rated Poland "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Poland's population in 1985, according to World Bank figures, was 37,233,000, and the growth rate was 0.8 percent. The modest Polish economic recovery of 1983 and 1984 has slowed in 1985. Per capita income remains about on the level of 1973, and there are few prospects for rapid recovery.

In 1985, market supplies continued their gradual improvement, reflecting increased production as well as price rises for farmers. While rationing has been lifted on such basic food items as flour, butter, sugar, and animal fats, it continues on meat and a few nonstaples, as well as on gasoline. At the same time, the limited availability of unrationed consumer items, including consumer durables, still forces consumers either to spend hours in queues or to rely on the black market. For persons with access to hard currency, however, the market situation is entirely different; the Government maintains a chain of special stores, where a wide range of foreign-produced consumer items can be purchased by anyone with hard currency. For those without direct access to hard currency, it can be obtained illegally for four to five times the official rate.

The Government remains formally committed to an economic reform program, aimed at decentralizing the economy and giving Poland's alienated work force a greater voice in economic decisionmaking. Given the obstacles posed by a reluctant bureaucracy and by the need to manage a struggling economy, the Government in 1985 made very limited progress in implementing the reforms and in increasing the role of market forces.

Poland's primary education system reaches virtually the entire population, with 99 percent of the school age population enrolled. Literacy is almost universal. Poland has a wide-scale system of primary rural health care, although access to safe drinking water for the rural population (and in many urban centers as well) remains a problem. Life expectancy at birth is 72.4 years, and the infant mortality rate is 18.1 per 1,000 live births. Although private construction of homes in the countryside is active, state and cooperative housing continues in short supply, especially in urban areas where the average waiting time for such housing is about 15 years.

Culturally, Poland maintains a greater degree of openness in art, the theater, music, and dance than is common in eastern Europe. Political messages are frequently not very far beneath the surface of Polish theater and film productions. Cultural life in homes and churches in Poland is very active.

The Polish labor code generally forbids the employment of a person who has not reached the age of 15. The employment of a "young person," defined as aged 15 through 18, is permitted, provided the individual has completed basic schooling. Special exceptions are sometimes required if a particular work might pose a health danger. The labor code specifies that a "young person" without professional qualification may be employed only for the purpose of vocational preparation, although again there is provision for special exceptions.

The length and distribution of hours of work is regulated by the Polish labor code in accordance with internationally accepted standards. Paid annual holidays are provided for. In practice, most families find that both husband and wife must be employed in order to sustain an acceptable standard of living. Minimum conditions for the protection of worker health and safety spelled out in the Polish labor code seem, in most respects, to meet the international norm. Poland, however, suffers serious environmental pollution problems, some of which particularly affect worker health. There are frequent allegations that some plants fail to maintain government-regulated worker health and safety standards, and the official media occasionally publicize such cases.

Women's rights have not become a public issue in Poland. Historical circumstances, including World War II losses, helped open access for women into many previously closed professions. Women work in all blue-collar trades, except for heavy mining and steel, and in all professional fields. Compared to their presence in the work force, however, only a small proportion of women are found in the higher levels of local and national government.

Poland has a liberal maternity and child care leave policy dating from the Solidarity-inspired Gdansk Accords. Women are entitled to 4 months of paid maternity leave and may then opt for up to 3 years of unpaid child care leave, after which they are guaranteed a job at the same level of pay. Such a policy has obvious social benefits in terms of child-rearing and strengthening of the family; it also takes pressure off Poland's day-care system for young children.

PORTUGAL

Since Portugal's transition from authoritarian to democratic rule in 1974, vigorous democratic institutions have been established, and Portugal today enjoys a pluralistic, multiparty, parliamentary democracy with broad popular legitimacy. The President and deputies to the Assembly of the Republic are freely elected by the people. The Government is appointed by the President and is dependent upon the support of the Assembly.

Portuguese democracy was consolidated in 1982 with a revision of the Constitution which reinforced the guarantees of civil liberties contained in the 1976 Constitution and which provides for a more open economy. Nationalizations and agrarian reform shortly after the 1974 revolution established the primary role of the State in certain areas of commerce, industry, and agriculture. The Government in 1984 allowed the operation of certain private domestic banks as part of an economic reform program designed to open the nationalized banking and certain other sectors to competition from private enterprise.

In 1985 Portugal formally created its first civilian and military intelligence services since the abolition of the secret police in 1974. A number of terrorist attacks since 1983, involving both foreign and domestic organizations, convinced the Government that such services were necessary.

Terrorist actions, aimed primarily at Portuguese businessmen, and incidents at the U.S. Embassy and NATO installations have not altered the good human rights climate. Unsubstantiated charges have been made, however, that prison conditions for the 56 persons arrested for terrorist activity in June 1984 and tried in October 1985 are substandard. There are also occasional foreign and domestic complaints about lengthy delays in the handling of cases in Portuguese courts. There have been instances of the excessive use of force by the police, but these seem to reflect inadequate training rather than policy. Respect for civil and political rights, due process, and the integrity of the person are supported by the Government and reinforced by a free press. The state-owned national television network is alleged on occasion to have tailored its programming and news coverage in accord with political considerations, but opposing points of view can be and usually are aired.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

Government-sanctioned political killings do not occur in Portugal. A domestic ultraleftist terrorist group, the "Popular Forces of April 25" (FP-25, which refers to the revolution of April 25, 1974), has claimed responsibility for several murders, other armed attacks on Portuguese nationals, and numerous bombings and attempted bombings of industrial and other sites. This group also took responsibility for the July 1985 assassination of one of its own members who had agreed to testify against his former colleagues and had been provisionally released pending the trial of accused group members. The FP-25 began to target foreign installations for the first time in the autumn of 1984, using mortars to attack the U.S. Embassy, NATO ships at anchor in Lisbon harbor, NATO's Iberlant Command Headquarters, and an airbase in Beja district used by the Federal Republic of Germany. Despite FP-25's activity, Portugal continues otherwise to have a low level of violence.

b. Disappearance

The police, the armed forces, and other government agencies do not abduct or secretly arrest and detain individuals. In 1985, there were no terrorist abductions or hostage-takings by Portuguese opposition groups.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution forbids torture and the use of evidence obtained by torture in criminal proceedings. It also prohibits inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, which is punishable by fine or imprisonment. A number of the FP-25 suspects apprehended and indicted in 1984 have engaged in periodic hunger strikes and other protests against prison conditions. Beyond these protests, no independent evidence in support of the alleged inadequacies has appeared. Ten prisoners accused of crimes associated with FP-25 activity escaped from Lisbon's main penitentiary in September 1985. A stricter regime was imposed on those accused remaining under detention.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

No one can be held legally for more than 48 hours unless a prosecuting judge orders preventive detention, which may last a maximum of 4 months for each alleged crime. In some cases where persons have been detained longer than 48 hours on an order of preventive detention, defense lawyers have succeeded in protecting their clients' rights through legal means and publicity. Because of the cumbersome judicial system, preventive detention beyond the authorized 4 months and up to 6 to 9 months before trial is not unusual in the cases of individuals accused of serious crimes, such as murder or armed robbery. A large backlog of cases in the courts and vacant judgeships have caused delays. Judges are required to give priority to the cases of those under preventive detention.

Forced labor does not exist in Portugal. On February 1, 1985, the International Labor Organization (ILO), in response to a complaint filed by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP), criticized the failure of some Portuguese companies, which claimed economic distress, to pay salaries owed to their workers. The ILO report rejected the CGTP claim that the practice was a form of forced labor in violation of ILO Conventions 29 and 105 and accepted the Government's report outlining measures it was taking to combat the problem. The ILO did recommend that the Government impose sanctions against companies not paying salaries. It also said it was not enough for laws forbidding nonpayment of salaries to be on the books if effective penalties were not imposed. On July 30, the CGTP asserted that the number of workers with unpaid salaries had dropped from 130,000 to 109,000.

PORTUGAL

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Portugal has an independent judiciary and a fair judicial system. All trials are public except those which may offend the dignity of the victim, such as cases involving the sexual abuse of children. The accused is presumed innocent until convicted. A public prosecutor develops the case against the accused. A prosecuting judge reviews the evidence and determines whether the accused should be detained or released on bail. A panel of three judges (which does not include the prosecuting judge) presides over cases which go to trial. A ministerial delegate assists the judges in reviewing the evidence. At the request of the accused, a jury may be used in trials for major crimes. The judges or jury renders the verdict. Sentence may be passed only in the presence of the defense attorney.

Foreign and domestic complaints continue to be made about the lengthy delays in the handling of cases in Portuguese courts. The European Court in Strasbourg in July 1984 found that Portugal had violated Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which provides that "every person has the right to have his case disposed of justly and publicly within a reasonable time." The Portuguese chapter of the International Commission of Jurists, the main local human rights watchdog organization, is becoming increasingly concerned about this problem.

There are no political prisoners, although some elements of the extreme left often claim that persons who have been sentenced to prison for violent acts, conspiracy, or incitement to violence are, in fact, political prisoners. Some foreign and domestic groups have charged that the accused FP-25 members, particularly Otelo Saraiva De Carvalho, one of the leaders of the 1974 revolution, are political prisoners. There appears to be substantial evidence, however, for the criminal charges brought in these cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

No cases of governmental interference with the privacy of the individual were reported in 1985. The Government does not tamper with private correspondence or telephones. The Constitution forbids forced entry into homes and searches without a judicial warrant. In addition, entry into an individual's home at night requires his consent.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is guaranteed by the Constitution and respected by the Government. The constitutionally mandated Council of Social Communication, the members of which are elected by the Assembly, acts as a watchdog to protect freedom of speech and access to the media. It publicizes abuses, makes recommendations to the Assembly, and has enforcement powers (which have never been exercised). The opposition is free to voice its point of view, and the Government tolerates criticism with two restrictions:

First, "Fascist" organizations and activities, including discussions of corporativism, are prohibited by the so-called

"anti-Fascist" law of June 1978. Violators are liable to imprisonment for from 2 to 8 years. In practice, both politicians associated with the former regime and the "Force of Popular Unity", charged with being the political front group for the terrorist organization FP-25, participated in political activities preceding the legislative elections of October 6, 1985.

Second, anyone convicted of "insulting" civil or military bodies or the President of the Republic, if the "insult" was deemed intended to undermine the rule of law, may be imprisoned for 3 years. There were no prosecutions for "insult" in 1985.

Although the Government indirectly subsidizes the press (through its nationalization of the banks to which the press is indebted), it does not control editorial content, and the entire political spectrum is represented. The two television channels and most radio stations are owned by the State. The Government appoints their administrators, who are usually replaced when new governments take office. In principle, the Government should not influence television and radio policies or reporting decisions. In practice, it usually does so indirectly through its power of appointment.

Opposition parties sometimes charge that television or radio ignores or distorts their views and activities. In the preelection period those charges became a campaign issue as the Government was accused of manipulating television coverage to favor the Socialist Party. However, political parties, trade unions, and other organizations have a right to periodic access to exclusive television time after the evening news. The Communist Party and the unions use it vigorously.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Individuals have the right, in law and practice, to associate formally or informally, to promote nonviolent causes, and to protest government policies. Formation of a political party requires 5,000 subscribers. The new Party of Democratic Renewal acquired formal legal status in 1985 after having presented the required number of signatures to the appropriate authorities. Public meetings or protests require 24-hour advance notice to the civil governor of the area involved. Permission is routinely granted.

Workers have the constitutional right to set up unions by profession or industry. Collective bargaining is guaranteed by law and practiced in both the public and private sectors. Such issues as wage levels, working conditions, pay grades, and fringe benefits are regularly the subject of collective bargaining. Strikes are permitted for any, including political, reasons. Approximately 45 percent of the workers are unionized. Unions are free of governmental control but closely associated with political parties.

There are two labor federations. One, the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP), is controlled by the Communist Party and is active in Communist-sponsored causes. The other, the General Union of Workers (UGT), is a pluralist democratic union affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the European Trade Union Congress. Its leadership is associated with the Socialist and Social Democratic parties, and several members have been elected to the Assembly. Since both federations want to represent Portugal in the International Labor Organization, the Minister of Labor has decided that each will do so in alternate years.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Portugal, and the Government does not interfere with the free practice of religion, including missionary work and religious publishing. Organized religions may freely establish places of worship, train their clergy, proselytize, and convert. In order to qualify as a tax-exempt institution, an organized religion must legally establish itself as a nonprofit, private society.

The prevailing religion is Roman Catholicism. Catholic religious instruction is offered as an elective in the public schools. Pursuit of a civil, military, professional, or political career does not depend on adherence to a particular creed.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees freedom of movement, foreign travel, and emigration. There are no formal restraints on domestic travel, on the right of a citizen to change residence or place of employment, or on emigration. However, currency restrictions, resulting from a chronic balance of payments problem, in practice impose some limitations on foreign travel. Emigrants and those who travel abroad are free to return. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

An 1980 law established a humane refugee program. Displaced persons who qualify as refugees under the technical definition established by the United Nations are given permanent resident status and allowed to work. In practice, displaced persons are not forced to return to the land from which they fled or in which they fear persecution.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The President and the Assembly are elected by secret ballot and universal adult suffrage under a democratic system. Opposition parties and candidates operate freely and enjoy access to the media. Only "Fascist" organizations are outlawed. General elections for the Assembly are held at least every 4 years. The President has a 5-year mandate and may serve no more than two consecutive terms.

The population is overwhelmingly European and ethnically homogeneous. There is a small African minority, most of which emigrated to Portugal when the former African colonies won their independence following the 1974 revolution. There are no legal restrictions on political activity by Portuguese of African heritage.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Portugal has cooperated with independent outside investigations of human rights conditions and actively participates in the monitoring of human rights by the Council of Europe. Amnesty International and other private international human rights groups operate freely in Portugal. The most important domestic human rights group is the Portuguese section of the International Commission of Jurists, which considers the human rights situation in Portugal to be, "on the whole, positive and satisfactory." Amnesty International did not mention Portugal in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated Portugal "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

According to World Bank data, Portugal's population is 10,046,000, and the per capita gross national product is $2,230. A worsening of the economic situation, including deficits in both balance of payments and domestic budget, has forced the Government to reduce its subsidies of basic food and agricultural commodities. Portugal imports about 60 percent of its food needs.

In theory, food, shelter, health care, and education are available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnic background, or political opinion. In practice, many still suffer from an inadequate diet, inferior housing, poor quality and frequently unavailable health care, and substandard education. Life expectancy at birth is 71.7 years, and the infant mortality rate is 17.6 per 1,000 live births.

The Government has instituted a large-scale school construction program to improve educational opportunities. New regional colleges are spreading higher education beyond the traditional centers of Coimbra, Lisbon, and Oporto. Despite these encouraging advances, illiteracy is still about 20 percent. A shortage of buildings and teachers makes it impossible for all children of primary school age to attend classes, and the quality of personnel and facilities is frequently substandard.

Child labor in industry is not a problem in Portugal. To combat school drop-out rates, the Government in 1984 enacted an apprentice program for youths between the ages of 14 and 24. The Government has said that "thousands" of youth leave school annually without graduating. Given the high proportion of the population engaged in agriculture and other traditional work sectors, it is likely that large numbers of youth leave school prior to graduation to work on family farms or at traditional trades.

A national monthly minimum wage for full-time workers was first established in Portugal in 1974. Minimum wages for rural workers and domestic employees were legislatively established in 1977 and 1978 respectively. In every year since then, with the exception of 1982, minimum wages were adjusted upward. Workers are required by law to be granted an individual written work contract which must include their professional category and salary, the work site, the starting date, and, in the case of temporary workers, the duration of the contract.

Legislation limits hours of work to 8 hours daily and 48 hours per week. Overtime is limited to 2 hours per work period and up to 120 hours per year. Work on a normal day off is restricted to 8 hours. These limits are respected in practice.

PORTUGAL

On May 24, 1985, the Government notified the ILO that it had ratified Convention 95 on conditions of security, health, and environment in the workplace. Ratification followed an ILO visit designed to advise Portugal on changes needed to comply with the Convention.

The Civil Code guarantees full legal equality to women in accordance with the Constitution. Women play an active role in the political parties but remain underrepresented in party and government leadership positions. In 1979 a woman served as Prime Minister, and the current Minister of Health is a woman. Women are gradually increasing their representation in business, government, and the professions. Traditional attitudes of male dominance persist in most areas but are slowly changing.

ROMANIA

Romania is a highly centralized Communist state. The Romanian Communist Party, led since 1965 by President Nicolae Ceausescu, is constitutionally described as "the leading political force in the whole of society." Through the Government, the party seeks to control every significant aspect of the country's life. In practice, an imperfect bureaucratic system leaves varying degrees of latitude to local officials to carry out central directives as well as to abuse their powers in violation of constitutional rights. Almost all aspects of life proceed within narrow bounds defined by the party and its leader. Political dissent is not tolerated. Criticism of the regime and its policies is suppressed by the ubiquitous Department of State Security (DDS).

Continuing its policy of repaying its foreign debt obligations as soon as possible, Romania in 1985 made strenuous efforts to increase productivity and conserve energy and raw materials. Severe weather during the winter of 1984-1985 aggravated the domestic economic situation and increased consumer hardships. Food shortages were more pronounced in 1985. Energy conservation measures included government-sanctioned fuel and power stoppages to nonindustrial and some industrial consumers. Many homes in Bucharest and elsewhere were without heat or cooking gas. There has been generally milder weather so far in the winter of 1985-86, but hardships have continued. Many basic foodstuffs are still rationed. The supply of other items not universally rationed, such as meat, has decreased and at times has been unavailable.

In the area of human rights, major discrepancies exist between generally accepted standards, for example as embodied in the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and Romanian practice. Though many rights are guaranteed by the Romanian Constitution, both that document and Romanian law impose party control or set standards so vague as to make guarantees meaningless. The party, through the Government, continues to restrict and control the right to free speech, free assembly and association, and the practice of one's religion.

In 1985 the Government took several significant human rights steps, which included freeing a celebrated "prisoner of conscience" and permitting or facilitating both private and official factfinding visits by U.S. religious activists to Romania. Numerous American religious travelers reported that they were able to visit persons and places of their choosing, although they or their contacts may have been closely questioned by authorities. In early fall, Rev. Billy Graham spent 10 days in Romania and, with government monitoring throughout his tour, preached to crowds totaling over 110,000.

In 1985 the Government continued its "principled opposition" to emigration. Nevertheless, 1985 departures for the United States, Israel, and the Federal Republic of Germany totaled 17,312, mainly under the rubric of "family reunification." Serious problems remain with respect to emigration procedures. Departure--whether for purposes of emigration, family reunification, or binational marriage--is strongly discouraged by complicated, slow-moving procedures and coercive tactics. Potential emigrants often wait several years after applying before receiving exit permits. During this period, reductions in job status, dismissals from universities, and other sanctions are common.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no substantiated reports of political killings in Romania during 1985. In November, a detainee died while in pretrial custody. Romania officials attributed the death to complications following surgery for a serious medical problem. Other sources have expressed concern that the prisoner had suffered beatings at the hands of the police, which may have led to his death. Amnesty International reported the death of a Romanian convict but gave no cause of death.

b. Disappearance

There have been no substantiated reports of politically motivated disappearances during 1985. Several sources, however, have reported disappearances in circumstances which seem clearly to indicate that those who disappeared were in police custody; the authorities denied this (see Section 1d).

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In 1985 there have been a number of credible reports of torture. A Roman Catholic priest in western Romania was so severely beaten by DSS functionaries that he temporarily lost the use of his hands. A leading member of a religious group under heavy pressure from local authorities reportedly was detained and beaten over a period of some 16 hours, frequently losing consciousness. After release, the victim was examined by a physician and reportedly found to have suffered extensive internal injury. Amnesty International reported that in late 1984 a Baptist was arrested on suspicion of helping a relative emigrate illegally. The DSS searched his apartment and found religious literature. Amnesty International reported that while in detention the victim was hung by his wrists and beaten.

Romanian authorities reportedly also use physical and mental degradation to intimidate those caught or suspected of wrongdoing. Persons detained for questioning are often kept for long periods without sleep, food, or toilet facilities, as well as being held incommunicado. Numerous reports say those caught attempting to leave the country illegally, for example, are subject to extreme physical and mental harassment, often prior to being given only relatively light sentences if they are first offenders. Prisoners also report that, in the case of those who have received long sentences for political offenses, wives are sometimes pressured to divorce their spouses.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International stated that "prison conditions under which prisoners of conscience were held were reported to be harsh, with poor food, hygiene and medical care." The report claimed that, at the Calea Rahovei prison in Bucharest, prisoners were

"shackled with handcuffs and leg-irons to a ring fixed into a concrete pyramid, approximately 40 centimetres high, in such a way that it was only possible for the prisoner to squat."

Among numerous other reports of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment, the most common complaints concern cells which are badly ventilated and poorly heated, bad food in extremely small quantities, difficult working conditions, long periods of isolation, excessive use of force by guards, overcrowding, and segregation of persons deemed "dangerous to the State" because of religious belief or for other reasons. By law some Romanian convicts are not required to work; the State uses this provision to keep some prisoners effectively in solitary confinement, whereas others in this category, whom the State does not wish to segregate, reportedly are made to sign "voluntary" requests to be allowed to work.

Several cases of alleged incarceration of dissidents in psychiatric institutions were reported in 1985. Although corroboratory information has not been received, some independent evidence tends to support the allegations.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no provisions for habeas corpus or bail in Romanian law. Prisoners under investigation often are held incommunicado. Detention of varying duration, usually a matter of hours, and then release without charge, continues to be widespread. Such arbitrary detention may be repeated, with subjects called back for additional lengthy interrogation several times.

Typically, persons detained for political or other offenses disappear abruptly, and family and friends are left unaware of their circumstances or whereabouts. In two substantiated cases of such disappearance in 1985, the subject later was found to have been arrested, tried, and convicted the same day, reemerging only some days later when his family was notified of his prison sentence. In another current case, authorities deny knowledge of the subject's whereabouts, but Western sources report the family has been ordered regularly to appear at a detention facility, bringing clean clothing which is exchanged for a set of the subject's soiled clothes.

The scope of Romanian criminal law is broad enough to insure that persons coming under official scrutiny may be convicted of some offense. Examples of typical charges are "defaming the Socialist order" for speaking frankly to a foreigner; "disturbing the peace" or "illegal assembly" for private prayer meetings in the home; "social parasitism" if unemployed but technically guilty of no other offense; or "distributing literature without a license"---a felony---if found attempting to hand out free Bibles.

"Exile" is not a punishment found in Romanian law. The authorities, however, have used residence permit requirements to harass religious activists, in one case in 1985 seeking to banish a Baptist minister to the provinces. There have also been substantiated cases of persons "temporarily exiled" by being taken to a remote location and detained, for example, during the time Western visitors interested in their cases were in the country.

Romanian practice requires involuntary labor from citizens but, for the most part, this seems to fall within the area of "civic obligations" and thus outside the International Labor Organization's definition of "forced or compulsory labor." For example, a law passed after the 1977 earthquake required up to 6 days' unpaid labor per year (and cash contributions) from each citizen. Though still widely applied, sanctions for nonperformance are light. In some jurisdictions, the work requirement is automatically converted to an additional cash payment. Students 11 years and older perform "patriotic work" in agriculture or elsewhere, sometimes 8 to 10 hours daily for several weeks, especially during the harvest. The Union of Communist Youth organizes "youth brigades" for this purpose. Some religious groups reportedly have been "encouraged" by local authorities to perform unpaid labor in the fields on Sundays as a means of securing official approval for church building permits or other benefits for their congregations.

These types of labor contributions are general throughout the population, not selectively applied as a "means of political coercion or education, or as a sanction against free expression of political or ideological opinions." There are no reports of "gulags" or other practices which fall within the ILO definition of "forced or compulsory labor."

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In Romania, an accused person is considered guilty until proven innocent. The ability of the accused to defend himself effectively in a fair trial, however, is severely circumscribed. Although the authorities in 1985 seemingly displayed increasing regard for correct procedure and due process of law, Western observers often gained the impression that being brought to trial in Romania is an almost sure guarantee of conviction. In 1985 there were clear cases of fabrication of evidence and suborning of witnesses by prosecuting authorities, as well as of what appeared to be violations of Romanian law regarding court procedures. Defendants are often tried without counsel or are represented by state-appointed attorneys whose role appears to be that of apologizing for defendants' offenses. Members of the judiciary, like other officials, are subject to the authority of the Communist Party.

A notable example in 1985 both of an unfair trial and of an unsuccessful attempt to obtain justice through appeal procedures was the case of Constantin Sfatcu. A Baptist from eastern Romania, Sfatcu was charged with "attempted murder of a policeman" after a chance search of his car revealed some 600 copies of Bibles and other religious literature in the trunk. Despite what even a government prosecutor later called highly questionable evidence, Sfatcu was convicted and given a sentence close to the maximum. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the prosecutor recommended returning the case to the lower court for retrial because of the character of the evidence and the failure of the State to sustain its charge. The Supreme Court instead found Sfatcu guilty of a lesser offense and reduced his sentence to 4-1/2 years.

The majority of trials are held in public, though secret trials are common where state security is involved and may also be permitted in certain other cases. Foreign observers face some difficulties in attending public trials with high local or international interest. In at least one case, Western interest caused the judge arbitrarily and abruptly to order a routine trial closed over the objection of defense attorneys. The alleged offense did not fit any of the categories for which the law permits closed trials.

ROMANIA

It is impossible accurately to estimate the number of political prisoners in Romania, though the number could be several thousand, including those who have attempted to leave Romania illegally.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Romanian laws and regulations governing the security apparatus sanction a high degree of interference with the individual and the family. The interference is somewhat mitigated by the impossibility of total control, by uneven application of regulations, and occasionally by corruption of officials.

Deliberate and arbitrary interference with the privacy of the family, home, and correspondence is a frequent occurrence. Searches are made of private homes, persons, and personal effects without search warrants or probable cause that a crime may have been committed. Militiamen at checkpoints located on most roads leading out of the cities and at major highway intersections in the countryside randomly stop and search vehicles as a matter of course. Persons on tram cars and city buses often are asked for identity documents and have shopping bags and personal belongings checked by the authorities.

The authorities often enter homes on the pretext of looking for building code violations, excessive consumption of electricity (60 watt bulbs maximum), illegal use of electrical appliances, etc. These searches facilitate the discovery of other items, such as forbidden books and publications, religious materials, or any other evidence of "wrongdoing."

Violation of privacy of the person also arises from the ongoing antiabortion campaign. Some female workers undergo mandatory bimonthly pregnancy tests and physical examinations to insure that pregnancies are discovered and carried to term.

Complaints about interference with both domestic and international correspondence continue. Letters to or from persons considered "of interest" often never arrive at their destination. People have reportedly been questioned by the security police about topics discussed in letters which were delivered seemingly unopened. On other occasions, people have been questioned about statements made in letters sent abroad but never received by the addressees.

The Government has the capability to monitor domestic and international telephone calls closely and appears frequently to do so.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press but prohibits their use for any purpose "hostile to the Socialist system and the interests of the working people," as defined by the State and party. Similarly, the Penal Code prohibits "propaganda with a Fascist (as defined by the State) character delivered in public by any means... (or)...the undertaking of any action for the changing of the Socialist system..." It also prohibits acts "which would result in a danger to state security"; these offenses are punishable by prison terms of up to 15 years.

ROMANIA

The Government seeks to control the domestic dissemination of information in a variety of ways. Though official censorship was abolished some years ago, all media are state-owned, rigidly controlled, and used primarily as the vehicle for government and party propaganda. Western radio broadcasts in the Romanian language are not jammed and are a major source of both foreign and domestic news for the Romanian people. Western publications are not available to the general public, and unauthorized import or distribution of foreign publications is forbidden. In 1985 there were frequent reports of confiscations of foreign-source materials, including Hungarian-language publications, at the border. Romanian libraries carefully control access to "restricted" materials such as prewar historical texts. In 1985 there was reportedly an increase in the number of books banned or restricted. For live theater, censorship boards must approve all new productions before the opening performance. Serial numbers and type-face samples of all typewriters must be registered with the authorities, and the use of duplicating machines is strictly regulated.

Foreign cultural centers and libraries enjoy open access to the public and are allowed to distribute limited quantities of Western periodicals.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government attempts to control all group activity. No organization independent of government or party influence is permitted to exist. Peaceful assembly and association without permission are usually short-lived and may bring severe repercussions to those involved. Citizens are strongly discouraged from making contact with foreigners, and the law requires that all such contacts be reported to the authorities within 24 hours.

The Constitution guarantees the right to join a union. As noted earlier, however, it also enshrines the Communist Party as "the leading political force in the whole of society," which applies specifically with respect to labor unions and other "mass and public organizations." Trade unions independent of the party are thus prohibited, and workers do not have the right independently to form associations, elect representatives, or affiliate with international organizations.

Workers do not have the right to organize or bargain collectively. While they nominally have a direct voice in the management of the workplace through the unions that all must join, in most factories the senior party official is also the union's chief executive, and the primary function of the unions is to channel party doctrine and directives to the workers. Unions also dispense social benefits, such as vacations at union-owned hotels, for which the member pays only a fraction of the real cost, low-interest loans, and access to cultural, educational, and other leisure activities.

Romania's labor code is silent on the right to strike, except to elaborate procedures by which the union leadership is required to mediate disputes between the workers and management, with recourse to the courts where the dispute cannot be settled. In practice, sanctions available to the party and the union make it unlikely that such disputes would reach the courts. In the past, the Government's reaction to actual strikes, or to advocacy of the worker's right to strike, has been harsh repression.

Based on complaints by the World Federation of Labor about Romanian suppression of widespread strikes in the Jiu valley coal mines in 1977 and the 1979 suppression of an attempt to establish an independent trade union, the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1980 began an investigation of Romania's labor practices. In 1984, the ILO found that Romania's response to allegations made against it and to charges that its Constitution violated international labor standards was inadequate. The Committee on the Application of Standards and Conventions recommended that Romania accept a direct-contacts mission from the ILO. In 1985, Romania refused both to consider a direct-contacts mission and to appear before the Committee to respond further to charges about its labor policies.

There continue to be unconfirmed reports about work stoppages and labor unrest caused by dissatisfaction about food shortages, pay, or lack of heat.

c. Freedom of Religion

Despite constitutional guarantees of religious freedom, the practice of religion in Romania continues to be closely controlled by the Government. The Communist Party advocates atheism, and religious activism by state officials and party members is strongly discouraged. The Department of Religious Affairs recognizes religious denominations, including Romanian Orthodox (the largest), Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Calvinist, Unitarian, Baptist, Pentecostal, Seventh-Day Adventist, Jewish, and Muslim. The 14 officially approved faiths encompass an estimated 95 percent of all Romanians claiming religious affiliation.

The Government, through the Department of Religious Affairs, subsidizes clerical salaries, issues licenses to preach, approves permits for church construction or renovation, establishes the number of new admissions to seminaries, and controls the importation or printing of religious materials, including Bibles.

Attempts by members of officially unrecognized faiths to gather for worship generally are treated by local authorities as "illegal assemblies" or "disturbing the peace," with participants arrested and fined. Among the denominations refused recognition by the Government are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons), the Nazarenes, and Jehovah's Witnesses. The latter two faiths were singled out for strong attacks in government periodicals in 1985.

ROMANIA

The Romanian Orthodox Church has from historic times been able to coexist with a series of governments. It tends to accept government policy and did not, for example, take public issue with the authorities over the destruction of a number of churches and monasteries in 1985 which caused some public outcry. The church is believed, however, to have registered quiet objections which led to the physical relocation of several structures outside of the area of urban redevelopment plans. Government policy toward the Orthodox Church appears less restrictive than toward the more Evangelical congregations. Orthodox Church officials claim they are able to build churches as needed and have no pressing need for new churches, despite major urban and rural redevelopment programs which are causing a substantial percentage of the population to move into new high-rise apartment communities.

The remarkable growth of what the Government calls "neo-Protestant" denominations--Pentecostals, Evangelical Brethren, and especially the Baptists--has led to repeated confrontations with the Government during the last 15 years. Government animosity towards these groups is strengthened by their insistence on the primacy of religious belief over state authority in matters of conscience.

In what was seen as a positive step in 1985, the Government promised Baptist leaders additional badly needed seminary entry positions and building permits. So far, these promises remain substantially unfulfilled. The country's largest Baptist church in Oradea is scheduled for demolition in an urban renewal program but has been allowed to stand pending completion of a replacement. On the other hand, a Baptist church in Bistrita was partially demolished by the authorities in November, 1984, and has not been repaired. A Baptist church in Blaj was destroyed because of building code violations in October 1985, and a large Baptist church in Bucharest was substantially demolished during the summer for the same reason. A Baptist church in the village of Gaujani was confiscated in 1984 for use as a nursery school; the congregation has been unable to obtain either a replacement or compensation.

The Government in late 1984 permitted the consecration of the Administrator of Bucharest's Roman Catholic Archdiocese, Msgr. Ioan Robu, as a bishop. The Archdiocese had been without a prelate since the death of Archbishop Cisan in 1954. Government officials attended Bishop Robu's consecration in Rome, and a number of Catholic clergy were permitted to travel there for the ceremonies as well. The Government, however, continues to disagree with the Roman Catholic Church over the number of dioceses to be allowed in the country, and the church technically remains without an approved government charter. In 1985 Bucharest's largest Roman Catholic Church, St. Joseph's, was partially renovated inside, and a small, new Catholic church was consecrated in the resort town of Baile Tusnad.

The Government continues to support a widespread and active Jewish community organization throughout the country. Jewish cemeteries in Romania are typically well maintained; the organization runs some 11 kosher restaurants throughout the country. When city redevelopment plans threatened the smaller of two Jewish old people's homes in Bucharest in 1985, Jewish community leaders were able to gain government support for the construction, mostly with funds contributed by groups in the United States, of a new facility now nearing completion. Though current redevelopment work has destroyed a number of the Jewish organization's buildings in Bucharest, including former synagogues, the organization maintains that these buildings were no longer necessary. The organization's headquarters, the main ("Choral") synagogue, and the Jewish museum--all in the redevelopment area--have been left untouched. There have been no repetitions of the anti-Semitic literature which troubled relations in 1984 between the Government and the Jewish community. Jewish leaders are allowed to travel outside the country and do so frequently.

The apparent severe shortage of Bibles continue to lead some Romanians to risk harsh penalties for smuggling them into the country. In 1985 persons were convicted for offenses stemming from smuggling Bibles. Four of these, Evangelical Christians, were sentenced to penal work programs for about 1 year for "distributing literature without a license" when they attempted to give out Romanian-language Bibles. The Government has indicated, however, that it would be willing to permit the importation of Bibles, if a need were demonstrated which could not be met from within the country. Many religious leaders say privately that they need Bibles, but apparently no denomination has put forward a formal request for the import of Bibles. Various problems are said to have delayed implementation of a government offer, now some years outstanding, to have more Bibles printed locally for several Protestant faiths.

In what was perceived as a significant positive step, Father Gheorghe Calciu, a Romanian Orthodox priest imprisoned from 1979 to 1984 for sermons critical of the Government, was allowed to emigrate in July 1985. Upon his arrival in the West, Calciu told of several other prisoners of conscience who were in prison with him and presumably remain there for "offenses" similar to his own.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Except for certain military or other restricted areas (access prohibited) and border areas (access limited to residents of the areas and those with economic need to travel there), there are no official restrictions placed on travel within Romania. Because of economic problems, however, travel within Romania can be difficult for the average citizen. A national ban on the use of private cars was in effect during the first quarter of 1985. During this time public transportation was curtailed. A ban on driving on alternate Sundays, based on license numbers, remained in effect throughout the year. Gasoline rationing also severely inhibited automobile travel.

Reports continue that the authorities seek to discourage citizens from traveling to meet foreign visitors or to attend particular functions, notably of a religious character. During the visit of Rev. Billy Graham to Romania in 1985, reports were received of government efforts to discourage attendance at his appearances. When these efforts proved unsuccessful, despite a total clampdown on domestic publicity, the Government threw heavy cordons of security troops and police around his public appearances in Bucharest, the last stop on his tour.

ROMANIA

The right of a citizen to change his place of residence or work is restricted. Residence permits are required, and citizens may not legally move from one town to another, or between districts within a city, without official permission. Official denial of residence permits has been used to hamper and harass religious activists, in one case requiring a minister to live in a city many miles distant from his congregation. Residence-permit and antiunemployment laws have been used to dilute the ethnically homogeneous nature of some parts of the country heavily populated by national minority groups. Workers are technically free to change jobs although antiunemployment laws and government controls limit this freedom in practice. A government declaration of a "state of necessity" in the energy industry in the fall of 1985 froze all energy workers in their jobs.

Travel outside Romania is a privilege usually reserved for those who hold relatively high positions in the party or Government, or those who can "guarantee" their return, usually by leaving a close family member behind. Older persons wishing to visit their children resident abroad generally have few problems.

Officially, Romania encourages tourism by making visas available for most visitors at the border. In 1985, however, a number of Hungarian travelers--including some with valid Romanian entry visas--were turned away at the border; usually no reason is given for such entry denials. In other cases the Government has indicated that certain U.S. citizens who formerly visited Romania as tourists would neither be given visas for future visits nor allowed to reenter the country; in most cases the visitors are alleged to have engaged in Bible-smuggling or religious activities unacceptable to the authorities. Others visiting coreligionists report they encountered little or no difficulty in entry and movement about the country.

Official policy continues to oppose emigration for any purpose but family reunification. Those who seek to leave Romania continue to face harassment designed to dissuade them and others who might be considering permanent departure. To avoid enlarging the figure of "passport denials," the Government refuses to accept passport applications until a decision to issue has been made. Successful applications take one year or more before passport approval. Once emigration passports have been issued, applicants are required to show they have divested themselves of almost all property, including currency assets. Those in state- or employer-supplied apartments typically face eviction and must find accommodation in the already overcrowded dwellings of family or friends while they await foreign visas necessary for departure from Romania.

During this period, which was often very lengthy until recent changes in procedures, applicants were nearly always demoted or dismissed from their jobs although most were offered other employment, such as digging ditches in a distant city, cutting wood in forests, or farm labor positions in the provinces with no provision for family accommodation at the proffered job site.

In 1985 an understanding was reached between the United States and Romanian Governments on passport and visa procedures which has reduced these humanitarian costs for intending emigrants to the United States who have received the Romanian Government's permission to depart. The understanding provides that the Romanian Government will issue certificates of passport approval to those citizens approved for permanent departure for the United States. Passports are then issued to them after they receive letters from the American Embassy indicating that they are eligible for prompt issuance of U.S. visas or other travel documentation. In this way, the understanding delays the application of Romanian predeparture requirements (relinquishment of previous employment, housing, access to social services) until the emigrants are assured of early departure.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Though the Constitution guarantees the right of Romanians to change their government and leaders, in practice the individual citizen has almost no voice in shaping public policy or choosing public officials. The Romanian Communist Party, led by the President, his wife, and a few advisers, rules. No actual or potential alternatives to this present rigidly centralized control are apparent, and no meaningful opposition exists or would be tolerated. Public criticism of the Government, the party, and the state leadership is suppressed.

The Communist Party comprises more than 13.5 percent of the total population of the country. Women officially represent 52 percent of the general membership, and minorities are reportedly represented in proportion to their numbers within the general population. The higher echelons of the party, however, are predominantly male Romanians.

National parliamentary elections by secret ballot are held every 5 years. The public has no effective voice in the nominating process; candidates are chosen by the Front for Democracy and Socialist Unity, a mass organization whose president is Nicolae Ceausescu. Over 75 percent of its officers are Communist Party central committee members. Official statistics published after the March 1985 general election claimed that 99 percent of those registered actually voted, and 97.3 percent of these voted for the Front's candidates. Western observers closely watching the elections consider these figures highly suspect.

In Romania the chief party executive for each city, county, or enterprise is also the chief civil executive. Internal party elections were held for the new Communist Party leadership late in 1984. Though these preceded the national general election by several months, those chosen for senior party posts the previous fall were universally "elected" to the corresponding public posts the following spring.

There are no human rights monitoring organizations operating in Romania. The Government has permitted Western observers seeking to investigate the human rights situation here to visit Romania but discourages such visits and seeks to control, screen, and orchestrate such visits when they do occur. The Government has not commented officially on the reports issued by other governmental or nongovernmental organizations such as the Council of Europe, Amnesty International, or Freedom House, all of which have been critical. On the other hand, the Government organized a visit in 1985 for a human rights observer group led by three U.S. Congressmen, who traveled freely about the country and had contacts with virtually everyone--including religious dissidents--of interest to them. The group included a team of television newsmen, who produced two programs on religious freedom in Romania later broadcast in the United States.

Romania continues officially to proclaim that discussion and examination of its human rights situation is "unwarranted interference in domestic affairs," despite its professed support for human rights standards embodied in the United Nations Charter and in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International was concerned about the incarceration of prisoners of conscience, including religious believers, and about reports which indicated that defendants in political cases did not receive fair trials. Amnesty International also received allegations that political prisoners had been ill-treated. Freedom House rated Romania "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Romania's population, according to World Bank figures, was 22,734,000 in 1985, and the annual growth rate was 0.4 percent. Per capita gross national product in 1982 was $2,558. Romania reached its present semi-industrialized level by maintaining extremely high rates of industrial investment financed by the earnings of agriculture and the petroleum industry, the restructuring of consumption, and foreign borrowing. The agricultural sector, at one time a major supplier of grain to Central Europe, has received relatively little investment emphasis.

In 1985, the national economy continued to confront rising costs, energy shortages, and stringent efforts by the Government to reduce the country's foreign debt as quickly as possible. Both agriculture and industry continued to suffer during 1985 from lack of needed imports, though less than in 1984. The harsh winter of 1984-85 and the Government's inability to solve the energy problem aggravated the economy's poor performance. Many factories closed due to lack of fuel or to failure by subcontractors to deliver needed input stock or subassemblies for the same reasons. Workers laid off or working reduced hours received no assistance from the state to balance their lost wages, causing considerable hardship. Inadequate energy supplies left many homes with little or no heat, no cooking gas, and a severely restricted electrical supply. Use of private cars was banned for several months, and public transport was curtailed at the same time.

To meet energy needs during the 1985-86 winter, the Government in October declared a "state of necessity and militarized regime" in the national energy system. The government decree assigned military commanders to coal-fired power plants and other installations and made them coequal in responsibility with management and union leadership.

Although food supplies expanded during the harvest period, basic foodstuffs remained rationed. Food availability was, in general, slightly reduced from previous years because of the reduced flow of goods from private plots to farmers' markets, stricter government controls on the sale of produce from private plots which discourage private farming, and the Government's policy of increasing food sales abroad as a major source of foreign exchange earnings.

Education is universal and mandatory for the first 10 school years. Romania has almost total adult literacy. The quality of technical and scientific instruction is considered good. Adult and continuing education is available once necessary permission has been obtained.

Over the past two decades, the Government has made a determined effort to provide adequate housing for its urban population. As a result, large new multistory apartment developments abound throughout the country, and the practice of several families sharing apartments, kitchens, and toilets--common only a few years ago--is gradually disappearing.

The urban and rural redevelopment program was accelerated considerably in 1985, especially in the countryside. One result of this was the wholesale destruction of small farm villages around Bucharest and elsewhere. This campaign, according to those who felt its effects, was carried out with little advance warning. Residents were sometimes given no more than 24 hours to vacate their homes in severe winter weather and find alternate shelter. Western observers report many instances of families, dispossessed the day before, picking through the ruins of their houses to salvage what little they could. The purpose of this program, according to government statements, was to eliminate inefficient single-family traditional rural housing and to increase the amount of land available for tillage. While some evictees were given city apartments, others were offered housing in "farm complex" rural apartment developments which they said had not yet been built.

In Bucharest, the accelerated urban renewal program encompassed several additional areas in 1985. Thousands of older houses and other buildings, some of historical value, were demolished to make way for new development. President Ceausescu announced a new program to move some older people out of the cities to agro-industrial complexes scheduled for construction in rural areas. Some movement in this direction reportedly has already begun.

Romania seeks to provide free medical care for all its citizens. According to 1984 statistics, average Romanian life expectancy is 71.6 years, and infant mortality is 27 per 1,000 live births. Romanian statistics claimed 9.3 hospital beds per 1,000 inhabitants, and one physician per 507 inhabitants in 1984.

President Ceausescu in late 1984 declared that culture must be devoted totally to serving the needs of society, by contributing to the development of the "new Socialist man." Though literature and the arts remain active, government policies leave many Romanians concerned for their country's cultural future.

The Romanian Constitution guarantees the right to work. Unemployment is a crime ("social parasitism"). The Government closely controls the labor market and claims that there is no unemployment.

The Constitution guarantees equal pay for equal work. Government statistics claim the average monthly net wage in all sectors in 1984 was about $245. Government statistics indicated the losses in real earnings in 1982-83 were compensated by wage hikes in 1984, returning individual earnings to their 1980 level; there were no wage increases in 1985. A new system of wage determination, introduced in 1984, tied most wages to overall enterprise output, with no allowance for underperformance due to factors beyond the workers' control. As a result, despite the Government's claims, there were numerous reports in 1985 of greatly reduced worker pay, with widespread "moonlighting" required to reach minimum needed levels of income. A similar government plan announced late in 1985 established special bonuses (up to 20 percent of base pay) for managers in the export and extractive industries as well as a schedule of penalties (up to 50 percent) for underfulfillment of performance quotas.

The Constitution guarantees an 8-hour workday (or a 6-hour day in "arduous" occupations), a 24-hour rest period each week, paid vacations, and the "right to leisure." Labor law elaborates these guarantees but allows employers to override these standards "if conditions warrant." In 1985 there were numerous reports of workers required to perform extra, uncompensated days of labor to make up for lagging production or for some official holidays. Shift schedules and workdays have been arbitrarily adjusted, in some cases, to rationalize machinery use or energy consumption patterns.

There is no specific minimum employment age, although Romanian law requires schooling to the age of 16. Exceptions, however, are allowed for 14-year-olds in temporary jobs and for youths of 15 employed in industrial work, so long as the employer provides continuing educational opportunities and shows that the work being performed is "appropriate for the age and condition" of the employee. In such cases, the law limits work to 6 hours per day. Children from age 11 may work in the fields, or in other "patriotic work," usually as part of a school or other group activity.

The Romanian Labor Code guarantees Romanian workers a safe environment. The Ministry of Labor has established safety standards for most industries and is responsible for enforcing these standards. In practice, however, observers report that workplace conditions in many factories present substantial health or safety hazards. Although management is reportedly aware of these deficiencies in most cases, emphasis on meeting production goals clearly takes precedence over safety and health in light of the Government's insistence on rapidly paying off the foreign debt and on pursuing industrial and economic development.

Women are constitutionally guaranteed the same rights and privileges as men. The Government seeks to upgrade the role of women in society with specific policies in the areas of education, access to employment, and comparable wages. As a result, women are employed in virtually all sectors of the economy, and there is equal opportunity in education, but at the senior levels of responsibility and authority they appear in far smaller numbers. Many women are still found in the most menial jobs, such as agricultural stoop labor, street cleaning, and snow removal.

According to official figures, the country's population includes about 2.7 million members of ethnic minorities, of whom 1.7 million are ethnic Hungarians. Hungarian sources claim that the true figure is closer to 2-2.5 million ethnic Hungarians. Hungarians, Germans, Gypsies, and members of many smaller groups constitute about 12 percent of the total population. The Constitution forbids discrimination on the basis of ethnic background. Although the Government claims it does not discriminate against minorities, there nonetheless are limitations on minority groups' freedom to express and maintain their cultural heritage. Government efforts to centralize and economize by combining education, social, and cultural facilities frequently affect minority groups disproportionately. For example, the mergers of schools, theaters, or other such institutions often result in the loss of the minority group's ethnic characteristics as the institutions become predominantly Romanian. Moreover, strict government control of private organizations, which might be dedicated to the preservation of ethnic cultural practices, are often viewed by members of minority groups as discriminatory. Both Romanian and non-Romanian television and radio broadcasting have been cut as an economy measure. Despite government limitations, Hungarian- and German-language daily papers still outstrip their Romanian-language equivalents in circulation in heavily ethnic areas.

SPAIN

Spain is a parliamentary democracy with a constitutional monarch. During the past 6 years a modified form of federalism has been instituted, with 17 regional governments sharing administrative and political power with the national and municipal governments. At all levels of government, elections must be held at least every 4 years. Voter participation is high, and the freedoms of speech, press, religion, assembly, movement, and participation in the political process are extended to all groups and minorities.

The Spanish economy is mixed, with primary reliance on private initiative and market mechanisms. Social welfare and equity have received a high priority since the return of democracy to Spain in 1976-77, but world economic conditions and severe structural problems in the Spanish economy have restricted available resources. Unemployment (19-20 percent) is a major problem.

The overall level of respect for human rights in Spain is high. Real or alleged violations over the past year have continued to focus mainly on political terrorism and the Government's efforts to control and eliminate it. The Government has denied charges that it supports antiterrorist violence. Many persons arrested in connection with terrorism have alleged mistreatment, sometimes including torture. In some cases, law enforcement personnel have been found guilty and punished.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In the first 9 months of 1985, 49 persons died in terrorist actions in Spain, compared to 27 for the same period in 1984. The largest single death toll was the bombing of a restaurant near Madrid in April 1985, in which 18 persons lost their lives. Responsibility has not been determined. Foreign groups, primarily from the Middle East, have carried out some actions in Spain, but terrorism in Spain in 1985 remained primarily an indigenous phenomenon. The largest number of incidents and deaths were claimed by or attributed to the Basque separatist group ETA (Basque Fatherland and Freedom Movement). Frequently the victims are police and military personnel.

From January to August 1985, several alleged ETA activists were killed by GAL (Antiterrorist Liberation Group). These killings by GAL occurred in France. There have been charges, denied by the Government, that GAL has links to Spanish security forces.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports that government security forces have engaged in secret arrests or kidnappings. There was one recorded ETA kidnapping for ransom. Security forces carried out a successful raid to free the person.

SPAIN

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Government security forces have been accused of torturing and beating some arrestees, primarily in terrorism-related cases. According to the Ministry of Interior, in the first 9 months of 1985 there were approximately 393 persons arrested under the antiterrorist law, compared to approximately 849 arrested under this law in 1984. Many of these persons filed formal complaints of police brutality. From 1983 to August 1985 some 30 members of the various security forces have been punished for mistreatment of detainees.

In December the drowned body of alleged ETA activist Mikel Zabalza was found in a river near where security forces said he had escaped 2 weeks earlier. Family and friends claimed Zabalza had been tortured and thrown into the river. The autopsy, witnessed by a non-Spanish observer, revealed no indications of torture. Zabalza's case became a rallying point for critics of the antiterrorist law, particularly its provision for holding persons incommunicado for up to 10 days (see Section 1.d.).

According to all available sources, prison living conditions have continued to improve, and there have been few reports of prisoner mistreatment in 1985. The prison system has recently begun to allow conjugal visits on a limited basis. The International Red Cross has permission to visit any prison whenever it wants in order to review prison conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrests and detention are prohibited by the Constitution. This prohibition is respected in practice. Civil libertarians, however, criticize the special antiterrorist legislation which permits a person to be detained incommunicado for up to 10 days. The detainee has to be brought to the court's attention during the first 72 hours of detention, but the court has discretion to extend the period prior to arraignment for another 7 days. Critics of the antiterrorist law say that the judge often approves the extension of the period of detention without seeing the detainee, because the supervising court is in Madrid and detainees under this law are most often arrested in the Basque provinces.

A person detained under the antiterrorist law has to be informed of his rights and the reason for arrest. The detainee may not choose his own lawyer; instead, one is provided to him from the private (and independent) Association of Lawyers. There is no provision for an independent medical examination. The Government contends that allowing the detainee to choose his own attorney or doctor might enable him to communicate with accomplices outside. The appointed attorney formally advises the detainee of his rights, including the right to remain silent, and is present during his interrogation. However, he may not consult with the detainee until the interrogation is completed.

There is no forced labor in Spain.

SPAIN

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees the right to a fair public trial, and this right is observed in practice. The law provides for an expeditious judicial hearing following arrest. Defendants may always appeal to the next highest court, and up to the Council of Europe in cases concerning human rights.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Privacy of home and correspondence is protected by the Constitution. Under the Criminal Code, government authorities must obtain court approval before searching private property, wiretapping, or interfering with private correspondence. The current antiterrorist law, however, permits the Minister of Interior and the Director of Security to initiate postal, telephonic, and telegraphic observation "in cases of emergency," but they must inform the court of relevant jurisdiction immediately after the action taken.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government scrupulously observes the guarantee of free speech and press provided in the Constitution. Opposition viewpoints are freely expressed in speech and through the media.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

As provided in the Constitution, all groups have the right of free assembly and association for political or other purposes.

Under the Constitution, trade unions are free to organize, bargain collectively, and strike. About 20 percent of the Spanish work force is unionized. Trade unions are not subjected to official harassment. They freely maintain ties with recognized international organizations.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Spain. Catholicism is the predominant religion, but other religions are represented and function with full freedom. Adherence to a particular faith neither enhances nor diminishes a person's secular status.

A 1984 law gives legal status to conscientious objectors. The constitutionality of the law's requirement that conscientious objectors perform social service for 6 months longer than the period of service of their military counterparts is being considered by the Constitutional Court.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Spanish citizens have the freedom to travel in and outside the country. The Government restricts neither emigration nor repatriation. A law providing for political asylum, approved in March 1984, has been generally described as progressive and fair. However, the law controlling the residence of aliens, which affects some 750,000 persons, is criticized for allowing the Government too much discretion in expelling aliens and restricting their right of association. A constitutional challenge has been brought by the Office of the Public Defender (government ombudsman).

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Spain is a multiparty democracy with open elections in which all citizens over the age of 18 have the right to participate. Opposition groups exist openly and take active part in the political process. Of more than 50 national and regional political organizations which took part in the 1982 national elections, the Socialist Workers Party won an absolute majority of parliamentary seats.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government maintains good relations with international human rights groups, such as Amnesty International and the International Red Cross, as well as with national groups, such as the Spanish Human Rights Association. The Foreign Ministry, through an Office of Human Rights Affairs and current membership in the United Nations Human Rights Commission, takes an active interest in human rights issues internationally.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), was concerned about the torture and ill-treatment of detainees and the opportunity for abuses when detainees were held incommunicado under the antiterrorist law. Freedom House rated Spain "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

A country with a population of 38,829,000 in 1985 and a growth rate of 0.6 percent, Spain has a mixed-market economy. Per capita gross national product in 1983 was $4,780. Spain's economy, affected in the last few years by the general slump in the world economy, continues to recover slowly.

Under the present Government, inflation has considerably decreased, exports have surged, and a painful but necessary program of industrial restructuring and modernization has moved forward. A low rate of domestic investment and high unemployment (officially calculated at around 20 percent) remain major problem areas, although these are mitigated somewhat by the existence of a substantial "underground" economy.

The food, shelter, health, and educational needs of the people are generally met. Life expectancy at birth in 1985 was 74.6 years, the infant mortality rate was 9.0 per 1,000 live births, and the adult literacy level was 92.6 percent. Over 92 per cent of primary-school-age children were in fact in school in 1981.

Workers in general have substantial well-defined rights. A 40-hour week was established by law in 1983. Spanish workers also enjoy 12 paid holidays a year and a month's paid vacation. A minimum wage tied to the cost of living is provided by law. Children under 16 years of age may not be employed. Working and health conditions are generally good.

SPAIN

Workers in the underground economy, estimated to be as high as 25 percent in some areas, frequently do not have the same protections and benefits as those in the open economy.

Women's equality in the workplace is guaranteed by law. The Constitution confirms the equality of the sexes. Nonetheless, women face practical obstacles in the achievement of equal opportunity because employers are under no legal obligation to announce jobs for open competition. In recent years, women have made significant inroads into some traditionally male-dominated professions, such as law and medicine.

The role of women in Spanish society is also changing in other ways. A 1985 law permits women to have abortions when their physical and mental health would be threatened by giving birth. Because of the work of the Women's Institute, the problem of battered women is now recognized. In less than 2 years it has established 10 centers for battered women in cities throughout Spain. The Civil Guard, the state's security force in the countryside, has voluntarily extended its support to the Women's Institute in the implementation of its educational program concerning battered women.

Gypsies are a minority group representing 3 percent of the Spanish population. They sometimes suffer discrimination in housing, schools, and jobs. Legal mechanisms exist by which they can seek redress, for example, from discrimination by an employer. As a practical matter, however, Gypsies do not normally seek such redress. Pending in Parliament is a proposed law which would create an agency to aid the Gypsy community.

SWEDEN

Sweden is a constitutional monarchy, whose King is Chief of State. All executive authority is vested in the Cabinet, which is formed through direct parliamentary elections every 3 years and consists of a Prime Minister (head of government) and some 20 ministers. The 349 seats in the unicameral Parliament are divided proportionally among the 5 political parties currently represented. The Social Democratic Party, Sweden's largest, returned to power in the September 1985 elections, though with a reduced parliamentary plurality. Fundamental political freedoms and human rights are guaranteed by the Constitution and protected by the Government.

Sweden is an advanced industrial democracy with a high standard of living, extensive social services, and a mixed economy. Over 90 percent of business is privately owned.

Private persons are entirely free to express their political preferences, pursue individual interests, and seek legal resolution of disputes. Ombudsmen, appointed by the Parliament with full autonomy, investigate private complaints of alleged abuse of authority by officials and stipulate corrective action, if required.

Respect for human rights, at home and abroad, is a basic social value that underlies Sweden's active support of international efforts to enhance human rights observance. The human rights situation remained stable in 1985. The arrival of more asylum-seekers, many undocumented, from the Middle East has posed a humanitarian problem. Sweden observes international conventions in granting asylum and refugee status, but long delays in deciding asylum cases and the return of asylum-seekers to Lebanon and Turkey have prompted protests from immigrants and human rights groups in Sweden during 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for political motives by government or domestic opposition groups does not occur. Political killings carried out in Sweden during 1985 stemmed from non-Swedish conflicts. A former Iraqi diplomat who had requested asylum in Sweden was murdered. Swedish authorities have actively sought the suspects, but the case remains unsolved. The murder and attempted murder of two Kurdish political activists in Sweden in 1985 also appeared to have political motives. Swedish authorities minimize the potential for terrorism through (A) cooperation with Interpol, (B) refusal of visas to known terrorists or persons with terrorist connections, (C) border control by immigration and customs authorities, and (D) surveillance of foreign persons who appear to be spying on refugee groups in the country.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of abduction, secret arrests, or clandestine detention by Swedish authorities.

SWEDEN

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Swedish law prohibits these abuses, and such prohibitions are respected by Swedish authorities. Occasional accusations against individual policemen of excessive use of force in connection with arrests are carefully investigated and have not produced evidence of a systematic problem.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Statutory guarantees of individual liberty are observed. Persons disturbing the public order or considered dangerous may be held for 6 hours without charge. Criminal suspects may be held no longer than 12 hours without formal charges. If a person files for bankruptcy and refuses to cooperate with the official investigation, a court can order detention for up to 3 months (with judicial review every 2 weeks). Arrest is open and by warrant. Bail does not exist, but suspects not considered dangerous or likely to destroy evidence are released to await trial. By law, Swedish citizens cannot be expelled. However, convicted criminals who are not Swedish citizens are often expelled at the conclusion of their prison terms, unless they risk execution or other severe punishment at home.

In October 1984, the European Court decided in a case involving Sweden that the length of time which can elapse between arrest and initial court appearance violated the European Convention on Human Rights. This case concerned an individual held 15 days before receiving a court hearing. A government commission has recommended additional courts to assure hearings within 5 days and supervised release pending a hearing in certain cases. These recommendations are expected to be acted on during 1986.

There is no forced labor in Sweden.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution forbids deprivation of liberty without public trial by a court of law. The judiciary functions freely and independently. The accused has the right to counsel, although budget cutbacks since 1983 have restricted the availability of public defenders to cases where the maximum penalty could be a prison sentence of 6 months or more. There are no military courts in peacetime.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Freedom from these offenses is guaranteed by law. During 1984, citizen complaints prompted a government ombudsman to put a stop to aerial photography and surveillance by tax authorities trying to detect undeclared assets. Home searches are limited to investigations of crimes punishable by at least 2 years' imprisonment, such as murder, robbery, rape, arson, sabotage, counterfeiting, and treason. Wiretapping is permitted only in cases involving narcotics or military security. Searches and wiretaps normally require court approval. When the time factor is critical, or when life is believed to be in immediate danger, the ranking police officer can approve these measures. Search warrants are granted only after deliberation and on the basis of well-founded suspicion.

SWEDEN

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Swedes enjoy these freedoms fully. Government subsidies to daily newspapers, regardless of political affiliation, assure the expression of differing opinions. Publication of sensitive national security information and excessive violence in films and television are subject to censorship. National state-owned radio and television channels are operated by an independent board and management and present news in a nonpartisan manner. Emerging cable television and local public-access radio stations provide further opportunities for the airing of diverse views. Newspapers and periodicals are for the most part privately owned and published. One man who distributed a pro-Nazi publication has been convicted under an existing statute proscribing "incitement against ethnic groups."

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Swedes exercise these freedoms without undue restraint. Public demonstrations require a police permit, for which applications are routinely approved. An exception in the interest of public order, however, was a neo-Nazi group which was denied a permit to demonstrate in the vicinity of the labor unions' traditional May Day marches in 1985, since the police feared there could be violent confrontations.

Workers are free to organize and have the right to strike. A large majority of the working population belongs to trade unions, including career military personnel and civilian government officials. Unions and trade associations conduct their activities with complete independence from the Government and pursue extensive international contacts.

c. Freedom of Religion

Swedes have unimpaired religious freedom. There is a state Lutheran Church, supported by public funds, but all faiths are freely observed.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within and from the country and voluntary repatriation are guaranteed by law and respected in practice. Refugees, displaced persons, and others seeking political asylum are on the whole generously treated, though long waits and denial of asylum requests from applicants not meeting internationally agreed criteria are becoming common.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Sweden has a long history of vigorous democratic political life within a representative, multiparty parliamentary system. To enter Parliament, a party must win a minimum of 4 percent of the votes cast. There is universal suffrage over age 18. Although voting is not compulsory, 90 percent of eligible voters participated in the 1985 elections. Aliens who have been legal residents for at least 3 years have the right to vote and run for office in municipal elections.

SWEDEN

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Ombudsmen serve as official governmental monitors of individual rights in Sweden, effective both in making citizens aware of their rights and publicizing and correcting abuse of state authority. Active private organizations monitor issues such as the impact on individuals of comprehensive social legislation and the condition of the native Sami (Lapp) population. Sweden works energetically within the United Nations and other international organizations to promote observance of human rights. Government agencies are in close contact with Amnesty International, the Red Cross, church organizations, and a variety of other private groups working in Sweden and abroad for the same purposes. State-supported Stockholm University offers instruction in making human rights complaints to bodies such as the European Commission on Human Rights.

Amnesty International in 1985 did not report on Sweden; Freedom House called Sweden "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sweden had a population of 8,348,000 in 1985, and its per capita gross national product was $12,470 in 1984. The taxation system is designed to even the distribution of wealth among all segments of the population. Open unemployment (under 3 percent of the workforce) has fallen over recent years, while "hidden" unemployment stays stubbornly high, making unemployment, despite the low open rate, a key government concern.

Basic human needs for the entire population are thoroughly met without discrimination. The state provides social welfare and medical services, benefits to families, pensions, and disability and unemployment insurance. Life expectancy at birth is 77.7 years, and the infant mortality rate is 6.6 per 1,000 live births. Virtually the entire population is schooled and literate, with no educational discrimination between males and females.

Sweden rigorously upholds international standards regarding working conditions, child labor, and occupational safety and health. At each work site there is a designated ombudsman to monitor observance of these regulations. Full-time employment is permitted beginning at age 16, and those under 18 may work only during daytime and under a foreman's supervision. Those between 13 and 16 years of age may be hired for part-time work or light summer jobs for periods of 5 days or less. There have been no reported abuses of these rules.

Institutionalized efforts continue to extend equality between the sexes through equal employment opportunity, legal protection of the right to equal pay for equal work, and public education to break down sexual stereotypes. A public ombudsman, called the Equality Ombudsman, investigates complaints of sex discrimination in the labor market. Employers are required to base hiring decisions on merit and to pursue actively the goal of equality.

Government practice and popular attitudes encourage a wide variety of cultural expression, both from native Swedes and immigrants. The latter enjoy the same welfare benefits and legal protection as citizens. The Swedish Government runs special programs to help immigrants adjust to Swedish life and culture (including 240 hours of paid language instruction). The Government recently announced that it intends to appoint a special ombudsman to deal with complaints of racism or discrimination. Civil and criminal penalties for discrimination will be increased.

SWITZERLAND

Switzerland is a constitutional democracy with a federal structure of government which gives individual cantons a considerable degree of autonomy. Federal legislative power is vested in a bicameral legislature elected by universal suffrage every 4 years. In spite of linguistic and religious diversity, Switzerland has built up a political system based on consensus in which all citizens have the right and the opportunity to express their opinions and yet work together toward common objectives.

Switzerland, a country with long and respected democratic traditions and institutions, has over the years built an admirable record with regard to human rights. Although under the Swiss Federal system cantons are directly involved in many human rights matters, this involvement is controlled and limited by Federal legislative and constitutional guarantees. All those who feel that their rights have been violated at the cantonal level can appeal for redress to the Federal courts.

Switzerland has traditionally provided facilities to many international organizations concerned with humanitarian affairs as well as extended support to refugees from around the world. Nine international trade secretariats are headquartered in Switzerland, as is the International Labor Organization.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No such occurrences have taken place in Switzerland. However, a group apparently seeking the separation of the francophone portion of canton Bern claimed responsibility for a bomb explosion in front of the district courthouse in Moutier in September. There were no casualties.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of abduction, secret arrests, or clandestine detention.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution provides freedom from all of the above, and there have been no allegations of any violations.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile.

Freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile is guaranteed by law. A detained person may not be held longer than 24 hours without a warrant of arrest issued by the judge conducting the preliminary investigation. Once the warrant is issued, the individual may be detained as long as necessary until the investigation is completed. However, the length of investigative detention is always reviewed by higher judicial authority and, traditionally, investigations are completed within a very brief period. A suspect must immediately be shown the warrant under which he or she is being held, and he or she has a right to contact legal counsel as soon as an arrest warrant is issued. Bail, or release on personal recognizance, is traditionally granted, unless the examining magistrate believes the individual is a danger to society or will not appear for trial.

There is no forced or compulsory labor in Switzerland.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees public trials. Minor cases are tried by a single judge; difficult cases by a panel of judges; and murder or other serious crimes by public jury. According to longstanding tradition, even the most serious cases are usually brought to trial within several weeks, or, at the most, a few months.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no allegations of violations in this area by Swiss authorities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are no restrictions of freedom of speech and press in Switzerland except in cases involving groups or associations considered a potential threat to the State. However, no groups or associations are so designated at the present time.

A peripheral issue involves the linguistic minorities, specifically the Italian and Romansch linguistic groups. Occasionally, these groups have expressed their fear that the limited resources made available to them by the Government endanger the continued intellectual vitality of these languages and amount to a deprivation of freedom of speech. The Government is fully aware of these concerns and has taken steps to meet them.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The only restriction Switzerland places on peaceful assembly and association is the requirement to obtain permits from police authorities before holding public meetings. These permits are rarely refused except in cases where the authorities have reason to believe that the meeting will lead to violence. Occasionally, demonstrations, mostly involving youth, have become violent, and there have been complaints of police overreaction. In the rare instances when this has happened, public opinion and the media have strongly reacted to abuses of authority and asked that steps be taken to avoid repetition of similar incidents.

Labor unions enjoy full freedom to organize, strike, and influence political decisions. Swiss labor relations have been characterized by industrial peace, and strikes and other labor unrest are practically unknown.

c. Freedom of Religion

Switzerland enjoys religious freedom. One area which, over the years, has caused difficulties, however, is the issue of universal military service by Swiss men. Swiss law provides no exemption for conscientious objectors, who are nearly always convicted for their refusal to serve. Efforts have been made to modify the Constitution in order to provide alternative service for those who wish to claim exemption for reasons of conscience. These efforts, so far unsuccessful, continue.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Swiss citizens have freedom to travel in or outside the country and can emigrate without difficulty. Switzerland has traditionally been a haven for refugees from many countries. Currently about 32,000 Swiss residents, the vast majority from Eastern Europe, Africa, and Asia, have permanent refugee status. In addition, over 22,000 persons have pending applications for political asylum. In recent years the traditional welcome to refugees has been tempered by the growing influx of asylum-seekers, whose presence has placed significant strains on public-supported social services. Overall, however, the Swiss people remain prepared to provide shelter and assistance to refugees, as reflected in Federal and cantonal governments' actions. Applicants who fail to meet the criteria for political asylum are required to depart Switzerland. On November 3, 1985, 59 Africans were expelled from Switzerland and flown to Kinshasa. Swiss authorities stated that it was impossible to determine their nationality with certainty since they carried false identity papers. Most were believed to be from Zaire.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Switzerland is a highly developed, constitutional democracy. Popular initiatives and referendums afford an effective instrument to the citizen, as well as the group, to pursue significant changes in policies through direct action. One of the 26 Swiss cantons still excludes female suffrage at the cantonal and local levels.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no requests during 1985 for outside investigations of the human rights situation. Switzerland cooperates with international and nongovernmental groups in all areas of human rights, and Swiss nationals play a prominent role in the International Committee of the Red Cross and other humanitarian nongovernmental organizations.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International continued to express concern over the imprisonment of conscientious objectors to military service and the lack of any alternative civilian service. Freedom House rated Switzerland "free".

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Switzerland has a total population of nearly 6.5 million with a growth rate of 0.1 percent. Per capita gross national product in 1983 was $16,290. Unemployment, which until 1982 was practically nonexistent, has again fallen below 1 percent but remains a cause of concern.

SWITZERLAND

Health services are available and good. The infant mortality rate stands at 7.2 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy at birth is 79.1 years (1985). Education is of high quality and free through university level. Access to universities, however, is closely controlled through tough entrance examinations. A recurrent complaint of the Italian-speaking minority is the lack of an Italian-language university in Switzerland. In 1985, plans were announced for the establishment in Lugano of an Italoophone Technical Institute, which would offer university-level training but not grant degrees. The adult literacy rate is 99 percent.

The minimum age for the employment of children is 15 years, except that children over the age of 13 may be employed for light duties, such as helping in retail stores. In this case, they are limited to 9 hours of work per week during the school year and 15 hours otherwise. Strict regulations govern the employment of young people between the ages of 15 and 20. For example, they may not work at night or on Sundays, or under hazardous or dangerous conditions.

There is no national minimum wage. Wages in industry are freely negotiated between employers and employees as part of the collective bargaining process between employer associations and labor unions. The Labor Act sets maximum hours of work at 45 hours for blue- and white-collar workers in industry, offices, and the retail trade, and 50 hours for all other workers. Currently the workweek for blue-collar workers in most industries is 43 hours, and for white-collar workers between 40 and 43 hours. Overtime is restricted by law to 220 hours annually.

Both the Labor Act and the Federal Code of Obligations contain extensive regulations to protect the health and safety of workers. Special provisions exist for female workers, who may not be employed for dangerous work or, in most cases, at night.

About 15 percent of the population is made up of foreign workers and their families. The Government has taken steps in recent years to limit the number of foreign workers coming into Switzerland or obtaining residence permits. Real estate acquisition by foreigners is strictly controlled and has at times been the object of concern. The Government and cantonal authorities have also started to look into the need to integrate foreign workers and their families into Swiss social services programs. In times of economic difficulties and unemployment, Swiss nationals in some areas of the country resent any additional facilities provided to foreign workers.

Women still are subject to some legal disabilities, reflecting their traditionally subordinate role in Swiss society; however, recent years have seen steady progress toward political equality.

Women's limited involvement in the Swiss political and business worlds is expanding slowly. The 25 women elected to the Federal Parliament in 1983 represent 10 percent of that body, while women constitute 51 percent of the population. Since 1984, a woman has served on the seven-member Federal Council, the nation's governing executive body.

A major advance in 1985 was ratification by referendum of a new Marriage Law, which grants wives equal legal status and property rights. On the other hand, Swiss women are still paid less than men for equal work and remain underrepresented in senior positions in industry, banking, and government.

The Federal Government has been careful in the apportionment of funds to try to ensure that all linguistic groups have commensurate facilities and means to carry out cultural activities in their own language. However, the small (50,000) Romansch-speaking minority in 1985 issued a call for greater support, particularly in the areas of education and mass communications, in order to reverse a persistent historical decline in Romansch usage.

TURKEY

Turkey is a republic based on a multiparty parliamentary system and a strong presidency. Governments are elected by universal suffrage. The Government of Prime Minister Ozal asserts that democratic civilian rule returned to Turkey with the 1983 parliamentary elections. Opposition critics challenge that claim, saying that the military arbitrarily barred some parties and politicians from participating. The Government responds that the Motherland Party won despite the publicly expressed opposition of the military and points out that it earned a clear plurality in the 1984 nationwide local elections in which all legal parties participated freely. The merger of two of the existing political parties, the formation of a new party, and the preparations for by-elections in the fall of 1986 are contributing to the restoration of normal political activity and full democracy.

The Turkish National Police are responsible for maintaining public order in most of the country. In martial law areas (9 out of 67 provinces compared to 34 out of 67 at the end of 1984) military authorities oversee security through the Gendarmerie, which functions as the police in rural areas. These nine provinces are in eastern Turkey where government forces are under attack by Kurdish separatist insurgents.

Turkey is moving from a closed economy dominated by the state sector to a free market, export-oriented economy. Although the rates of inflation and unemployment are still high, the economy under the Government's structural adjustment program has made substantial advances. Both the level of exports and the gross national product increased significantly in 1984-85.

Restrictions have been placed on the activities of associations and unions, and on organic links between trade unions and political parties. There are no restrictions on the rights of Turkish citizens to own property. The Constitution, by implication, regards all citizens of Turkey as Turks; it does not permit the separate ethnic development of those minorities not given special status by international treaty. Although women generally enjoy the same legal rights as men and have risen to prominent positions in many fields, in some districts, especially rural ones, their level of education and social status is far inferior to that of men. Turkey is, by far, the poorest member country of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and many of its citizens live in a relatively depressed economic state.

The overall status of human rights in Turkey in 1985 showed continuing improvement, but there are important shortcomings. Chief among the latter is the persistence of credible reports of torture, usually at the hands of poorly educated police officials during initial periods of incommunicado detention. Politicians and the press have publicized allegations of torture. A parliamentary report released in November 1985 recommended that the Government introduce legislation to put more teeth into its laws against torture, although several hundred security officials, according to official sources, have been prosecuted and punished for acts of torture. The press has publicized domestic and foreign criticism of human rights practices and has publicized the views of banned politicians with increasing frequency. With a few notable exceptions, most of the mass trials of recent years have concluded with substantial numbers of both convictions and acquittals. In general, human rights trends in Turkey continue to move in a positive direction.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no accusations of government-instigated political killings in 1985.

Some 125 armed clashes occurred between government security forces and separatist terrorists. In an October 16 statement to the Parliament, the Interior Minister noted that a total of 59 soldiers and 108 insurgents had been killed to date. There have also been about 74 civilian deaths related to the conflict since August 1984. As of August 1985, the Government reported that 272 persons were under detention, 133 were being questioned, and 186 were on trial in connection with this conflict.

The Turkish General Staff (TGS) describes the insurgents as "terrorists/separatists" whose aim is to establish a separate Kurdish state incorporating parts of Turkey, Iran, and Iraq. Drug smugglers, Armenian terrorists, and Kurdish guerrillas operating from bases in Iraq, Iran, and elsewhere are also involved in the incidents, according to the TGS.

The Government has mounted a security operation aimed at ending the violence. According to press accounts, Turkish forces have established a "no-man's land" in some border areas to control infiltration from neighboring countries. The inhabitants of some small villages reportedly were compulsorily relocated as part of that effort, and the Government has undertaken to arm civilian villagers in the affected areas.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances caused by either the Government or opposition groups in Turkey in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution states that "no one shall be subjected to torture or ill-treatment incompatible with human dignity." However, the treatment of prisoners, especially during the initial pretrial detention period, remained an unresolved human rights issue for Turkey in 1985. Allegations that prisoners are subjected to torture and mistreatment in prisons and detention houses were made throughout the year by parliamentarians from within the ruling party, opposition political parties, the press, and outside groups which monitor human rights practices in Turkey.

The subject of torture was much more widely and publicly discussed in Turkey in 1985 than in 1984. Two opposition parties formed a joint committee to study human rights transgressions, including the practice of torture, and parliamentary deputies from one of these parties demanded that the Government investigate a number of alleged instances of torture by police officers, including 113 deaths of detainees under questionable circumstances over the past several years. Eleven of the persons on the list allegedly died in 1985. Newspapers and news magazines carried both lengthy studies of the torture issue as well as investigative accounts of specific incidents, including the results of medical reports and the comments of responsible officials. In addition, a parliamentary committee to investigate prison conditions, composed of representatives of all three parties in Parliament, submitted its report to Parliament in November. The report concluded that while some allegations of torture were clearly political in nature, torture did in fact continue to occur. The committee made a number of recommendations to the Parliament for acts of legislation to redress some of the problems it reported.

During 1985 a number of defendants claimed that they had been tortured during pretrial interrogation. The press reported several of these, including the so-called Kapikule Trial (involving former customs officials), a trial involving alleged members of a Communist organization, and a case against alleged members of an armed revolutionary group (Dev Sol), in which lawyers collectively petitioned the court to protest the treatment of the defendants. Turkish officials assert that such claims are generally proven groundless but are now made almost routinely in trials involving terrorists or drug smugglers, because the defendants can thereby retract any statements made outside of court and perhaps gain international attention.

In its May 1985 Report, Amnesty International charged that torture was "widespread and systematic" in Turkey. The Government responded that the organization had raised old, not current, incidents, and that, while occasional cases of mistreatment unfortunately still occurred, the perpetrators were punished.

In September, the Ministry of Justice published statistics on the number of security officials who have been prosecuted for mistreatment of prisoners since the 1980 military takeover. According to Ministry figures, investigations have been opened into accusations of torture involving 4,623 civilian security officers. Of these, 2,052 defendants have been acquitted, 439 have been found guilty, and charges against 410 have been dropped. The remainder are still under investigation. From among the 624 cases that involved martial law authorities, some 105 persons have been found guilty.

The Ministers of Justice and Interior have made public statements condemning the mistreatment of prisoners. In January, the High Appeals Court issued a judgment that those convicted of torturing a prisoner face a maximum 3-year sentence. Those found guilty of murder receive longer sentences appropriate to murder convictions. Another appeals court also ruled in January that supervisory officials who observe the mistreatment of a prisoner and take no corrective action are also subject to prosecution.

Many Turks link the mistreatment of prisoners to widespread public acceptance of the notion that the police should enforce public order by whatever means necessary. Other contributory factors include the generally low educational level of police personnel and the lack of adequate training. The Government has publicly recognized the latter problem by taking steps to upgrade the police force, requiring secondary-level education for new recruits, and organizing special courses to instruct policemen as to their responsibilities and the limits on their powers under the law.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires a warrant for any arrest, except in certain limited circumstances, e.g., when a person is caught redhanded. The Police Powers Act of June 1985 reduced from 48 hours to 24 hours the time within which a person taken into custody must be charged or released. This provision was applied to 2 police officers in Giresun Province who were under indictment as of October 1985 for detaining 2 suspects for 37 hours without a warrant and for beating them. The Law did not change the period of detention without charge (15 days) in cases of "offenses committed collectively."

In the 9 provinces under martial law or the 16 under state-of-emergency rule, an individual may be detained without charge for 15 to 30 days. Martial law authorities do not need warrants to detain suspects. Martial law commanders, subject to prescribed judicial procedures, may impose "internal exile" for up to 5 years on individuals believed to be acting against the "general security and public order." No such cases were reported in 1985.

Once taken formally into custody to face charges, a detainee appears first before a public prosecutor. The prosecutor informs the detainee of the suspicions or accusations which led to the warrant for his arrest. If the prosecutor decides to pursue the case, the detainee is arraigned before a judge and allowed to retain a lawyer. The judge decides whether to have the accused held in detention or to permit provisional release during the pretrial investigative period.

In all cases the authorities may hold a detainee incomunicado within the prescribed time limits until he is charged or released. According to the Police Powers Act, a detainee's next-of-kin will be notified in "the shortest time," except in cases where secrecy is deemed necessary, such as when others are believed to be involved in a given crime. A detainee may not have access to a lawyer until he is brought before a judge. However, a bill has been submitted in the Parliament which would require that all arrested persons must be given immediate access to a lawyer.

The system of justice includes a bail system under which the arraigning judge may release the accused on presentation of an appropriate guarantee, or order him held in preventive detention if the court determines that there is a risk that he may flee or destroy evidence. While Turkish law has no specific provision for habeas corpus, the Constitution includes the right of detainees to request speedy conclusion of arraignment and trial, or release "if the restriction placed upon them is not lawful." Especially in mass trials, the speed with which court proceedings are concluded or provisional release is granted is not so rapid as constitutional provisions would suggest. Indeed, due process provisions of Turkish jurisprudence often tend to prolong both civil and criminal cases.

TURKEY

The Constitution prohibits forced labor. Turkish judicial authorities, both civil and martial law, have the power to impose sentences of internal exile.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In most cases, defendants have the right to an open trial. Family members and lawyers may attend the trial. Members of the public and press are also usually free to attend. In some trials, particularly those held in military prisons or on military compounds, members of the public must seek permission to attend. The authorities usually grant such permission.

The Constitution accords a defendant the right to retain the lawyer of his choice. In September 1985, however, the press reported that the President of the Turkish Union of Bar Associations had charged state security courts and military courts with depriving defendants of legal counsel by excluding defense lawyers from court hearings on various technical grounds.

Although Turkey is overwhelmingly Muslim, its court system and judicial procedures are modeled on the Swiss and Italian systems. There are no Shari'a (Islamic law) courts.

The Constitution declares that "judges shall be independent in the discharge of their duties" and provides for their secure tenure. It also states that no authority may give orders or recommendations to judges concerning the exercise of judicial power. The Supreme Council of Judges and Public Prosecutors, appointed by the President and including the Minister of Justice, selects judges and prosecutors for the higher courts and oversees those of the lower courts.

People tried for the expression of views critical of the Constitution or of the integrity of the Turkish State are charged under Criminal Code articles specifically relating to the expression of such views. Their trials take place in one of eight state security courts which deal only with trials of this type.

In provinces under martial law, all defendants accused of terrorism or other offenses against the security of the State are tried in military courts. Martial law judges normally have law degrees and observe the same professional standards as criminal judges. They may not be transferred at the discretion of military commanders. In provinces under a state of emergency, civilian courts try cases.

Civilian and military courts generally conduct trials under the same rules of procedure, based on the Constitution or martial law regulations, respectively. A conviction in either system may be appealed to the appropriate civilian or military appeals court. If an appeals court overturns a lower court's guilty verdict, the case is sent back to the lower court for reconsideration. If the lower court insists on its original verdict, the case is returned to the Joint Council of the Appeals Court for a binding verdict. In some cases, particularly capital cases, appeals are automatic to the Supreme Court or to the High Court of Military Appeals. If a death sentence is confirmed by the appeals court, it must be approved by the Parliament, and, finally, by the President.

TURKEY

Certain trials, such as the trial of leaders of the Confederation of Revolutionary Trade Unions (DISK) and those in the first Peace Association case, have continued for up to 4 years. The DISK defendants (except for five held on other charges) and one-third of the Peace Association defendants are free on bail, but it is not clear when either trial will end. It is not unusual for mass trials to last 4 years or more, with defendants being held in custody during most or all of the trial.

Estimates of the number of political prisoners held in Turkey's jails during 1985 vary greatly with the source and the source's definition of a "political prisoner." The Prime Minister was quoted in April 1985 as stating that there were no political prisoners--only anarchists--in Turkish prisons. Figures published in the press list over 3,600 convicted persons serving prison sentences for crimes against the security of the State, crimes against security forces, or for belonging to armed organizations. Many of these were convicted of crimes of violence. Of that total, 1,700 belonged to the last category. Several thousand other people were incarcerated while under investigation or undergoing trial for similar alleged offenses.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution guarantees the inviolability of a person's domicile and the privacy of correspondence and communication. Entry by government officials into a private residence and interception or monitoring of private correspondence are permitted only upon issuance of a judicial warrant.

In the nine provinces still under martial law, the authorities have the legal power "without need for a warrant, application, or request...to search residences, or buildings of all societies, associations, political parties, unions, clubs, business locations, or offices belonging to or occupied by juridical as well as private bodies." They also may search, hold, or seize without warrant persons, letters, telegrams, and documents. There is no evidence that this power is widely used or abused, nor are there allegations or evidence of widespread use of electronic surveillance.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There was much greater freedom of expression in every medium in Turkey in 1985 than had been the case in 1984. Discontinuation of martial law in November 1985 in Istanbul removed a major restraint on freedom of the press.

The now-dissolved National Security Council promulgated a law in December 1983 which banned all criticism of the decrees, communiques, and actions of that body and its members. The same law also proscribed all statements praising or condemning leaders of banned (pre-1980) political parties. In practice, however, public disregard of that law has become increasingly commonplace. The President and members of the Presidential Council, who formerly comprised the National Security Council, have declared that they will not object to the publication of the minutes of their secret meetings during the period 1980-83, if the Parliament agrees.

TURKEY

The press in Turkey is privately owned and reflects a wide range of political views. Turkish Radio and Television (TRT), however, is a government monopoly, and the lion's share of its news coverage is traditionally devoted to the ruling government. Opposition political parties have harshly criticized TRT's programming and news coverage for ignoring their political parties.

In 1985, the press enjoyed nearly complete freedom to discuss current political and economic issues. Some topics, however, which usually involved criticism of security policy and those responsible for it, were taboo. When two foreign playwrights discussed human rights in Turkey with the press in Istanbul, martial law authorities forbade publication of the story. In addition, the State prosecuted a number of journalists and writers for violations of laws limiting criticism of the previous (military) government, for violating Turkey's secularist principles or for writing pro-Communist propaganda. For example, Professor Yalcin Kucuk, who is not imprisoned, is now facing his fourth retrial on charges that his book, "For a New Republic", was Communist propaganda.

Fifty-six prominent intellectuals, who in 1984 signed a petition to the Government concerning human rights, remain on trial in Ankara, though all are free. Also, on November 12 the Military Supreme Court of Appeals struck down the acquittal earlier in the year by a lower court of 19 members of the Turkish Writers Union. They were charged with seeking to turn the union into a Communist organization. In late December, the lower court reaffirmed the verdict of acquittal. All defendants remain free at this time.

Martial law authorities may, and occasionally do, ban the import or sale of any publications or films which are deemed to be hostile or harmful to Turkey. Such bans apply most often to pornography and to what is deemed to be Communist or religious (usually Islamic fundamentalist) propaganda.

The right of indigenous minority groups to use their own languages is also limited. The Constitution states that the official language of the country is Turkish. Although one article bans discrimination on the basis of language, others prohibit the public use of "languages prohibited by law." However, legislation has never been enacted prohibiting specific languages. The Government has stated that the intent of these articles is to foster Turkish as the language of all citizens for all uses, as part of its effort to inculcate in all Turkish citizens a sense of identity with the Turkish state and nation as opposed to identification with any particular groups within the nation. There are four main ethnic groups in Turkey whose native language and/or culture is not Turkish: Kurds, Arabs, Armenians, and Greeks. The Treaty of Lausanne guarantees the use of Greek and Armenian in schools and religious education. The Government honors that guarantee. In practice, the severity of restrictions on the use of a minority language appears to depend on the perceived threat the group in question presents to the integrity of the Turkish State. For example, the use of Kurdish, which the Government believes fosters separatist tendencies, is severely restricted. Use of Arabic, about which there are no such concerns, is not similarly restricted.

The State operates all Turkish institutions of higher education. Partly as a result of political violence emanating from university campuses in the late 1970's, the Government has moved since 1980 to bring universities under tight, centralized control through a Higher Education Council. The Constitution and the Political Parties Law prohibit faculty members and students from becoming members of political parties or involved in political activities. Thus, faculty or student political associations of any type are banned, and political parties are also forbidden to form youth branches.

Some faculty members who were fired when martial law was in effect throughout the country have unsuccessfully petitioned the Higher Education Council for reinstatement. There is a court case pending to determine the constitutionality of the earlier dismissals.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Peaceful assemblies are permitted with prior permission from the appropriate authorities. In the provinces still under martial law, this permission must be obtained from martial law authorities. In 1985, before the lifting of martial law in Istanbul, permission was given for a large rally to protest Bulgaria's oppression of its Turkish minority. In addition, the left-of-center Social Democracy Party held a mass meeting in Istanbul to protest government policies, and the Turkish Trade Union Confederation (TURK-IS) held several indoor rallies.

Updated regulations on rallies and demonstrations were published in the official gazette on August 9, 1985. According to the regulations, marching routes, rally areas, crowd dispersion routes, and poster-hanging locations are to be fixed for each city in January of each year.

The laws on associations and trade unions prohibit all associations and trade unions from having any ties to political parties. The trade union law and the Constitution also prohibit any political activity by trade unions, including the endorsement of parties or candidates and contributions to their campaigns. However, trade union activity in the defense of workers' social and economic interests is not considered political activity. The unions have taken advantage of this exception to mount strenuous public campaigns against various government policies and to lobby government and opposition parliamentarians in support of labor positions. Those unions and confederations which are organized in accordance with the 1983 Labor Law have been allowed to organize workplaces freely.

DISK, which was suspended under martial law in 1981 and whose leaders have been on trial since December 24, 1981, has not been allowed to reorganize pending the outcome of the trial. The DISK leaders are charged with "trying to change the form of government" and with "interfering with the work of the Parliament." Some defendants are charged with culpability in acts of violence. All defendants are free on bail, but the organization and its funds remain under the control of court-appointed trustees.

Although only a small percentage of Turkey's total work force of some 16 million is organized, over 60 percent of industrialized workers are union members covered by collective bargaining agreements. As a result, unions have a significant impact on the economy, especially on its work rules and wage structure. While the 1983 Labor Law strictly regulates the bargaining process and makes general strikes, political strikes, and solidarity (secondary) strikes illegal, unions are nevertheless able to represent their workers, engage in collective bargaining, and are beholden to their members' interests, not the Government's. (Strikes against companies established in the newly created free trade zones are also forbidden for 10 years, during which period both employers and unions must accept binding arbitration.) Turkish unions and confederations maintain ties with the International Labor Organization (ILO), the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and other bodies.

Both the ILO and the ICFTU have closely monitored the situation of organized labor in Turkey since the military intervention of September 12, 1980. ILO reports have noted the increase in government cooperation as well as some improvements on the outstanding issues; however, the continuing DISK trial remains a major concern, as do some restrictions on trade unions (for example, on political activities). The ICFTU has followed the DISK trial closely, although DISK is not an ICFTU affiliate, and has urged the Government to amend its labor laws and Constitution along the lines urged by Turkey's largest union confederation, the ICFTU-affiliated TURK-IS.

c. Freedom of Religion

The majority of Turks are Sunni Muslim. There is also an eclectic minority "Alevi" group made up of adherents to different varieties of Shi'ism.

The Constitution proclaims secularism to be a basic characteristic of the state. The political and military elites regard the principle of secular government as an essential attribute of a modern, Western-style, democratic system. Stringent constitutional and legal restrictions on religious activism in politics hinder the efforts of a small minority of Islamic fundamentalists who advocate a greater role for Islam in Turkish political life, if not the establishment of a state based on the Shari'a.

The Constitution stipulates that "everyone has the right to freedom of conscience, religious belief, and conviction." Constitutional and legal restrictions which are intended to protect the principle of secularism and separation of church and state limit that right significantly. For example, during the early years of the republic, the State suppressed certain Sufi brotherhoods, including the Dervish orders. In 1985 the Government charged some members of one such order with antiseccularist activities. The trial stimulated lively debate on religious orthodoxy and its proper place in contemporary Turkey.

The Criminal Code proscribes advocacy of a theocratic state or proselytizing by any person or group. Twenty-three Turkish Jehovah's Witnesses were convicted in 1984 for proselytizing and for allegedly advocating institution of a theocratic state and were sentenced to prison terms of up to 6 years and 8 months. Although their convictions were overturned by an appellate court in July 1985, they were reaffirmed by the court of first instance and are now awaiting final adjudication. All of the defendants are free pending result of the final appeal.

TURKEY

The Political Parties Law prohibits the establishment of any political party advocating theocracy or the foundation of law and government, even partially, on religious principles. Several former administrators of the now-dissolved National Salvation Party, convicted in 1983 of "turning a legally established party into a front working for the establishment of a regime based on theocratic principles," were acquitted by an appellate court in September 1985.

Under the Constitution, Islamic religious instruction, following a state-prepared curriculum, is compulsory for all students except those who declare themselves non-Muslim. The courses of about 2 hours per week are taught by lay teachers. Extracurricular Koran courses using government-approved texts are permitted.

Armenian Orthodox, Greek Orthodox, Greek Catholic, Jewish, Syrian Christian, Roman Catholic, and Protestant religious minorities are found throughout Turkey but are primarily concentrated in Istanbul. These groups operate churches, monasteries, synagogues, schools, and charitable religious foundations, such as hospitals and orphanages. Guarantees of minority rights, beyond those contained in the Constitution, are included in the Treaty of Lausanne (1923), which provides that non-Muslim minority communities may maintain separate schools for their children.

Non-Muslim minority groups have repeatedly complained about government policies and procedures concerning the operation of community schools, the formation of parish councils, and the registration and repair of church property. Government claims on property endowed by religious charitable organizations have also been cited as a major concern. There were complaints in 1985 about a government ruling that a 1984 law, which permits religious foundations to increase property rents, applies only to Muslims. Of continuing concern to some non-Muslim religious communities is the dearth of new clergy. The lack of clerics for these communities stems partly from the closure of some seminaries and partly from the inability of the communities to generate enough candidates for the religious life from their indigenous populations.

The Greek Orthodox community is concerned about its inability to obtain permission to rebuild a part of the Patriarchate administration building, although some progress was made on this issue in 1985. Relations between the Church and the Government were improved when Archbishop Iakovos, the Primate of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, was permitted to visit Turkey in 1985. Iakovos had not been allowed to enter Turkey since 1961.

A dispute between the Greek community and the Government arose in May 1985 over alterations to a Greek Orthodox church in an Istanbul suburb which the Greek community claimed was protected by the Treaty of Lausanne. The Government asserted that the alterations were necessitated by a compelling public need for road-widening and did not prevent continued use of the church for religious services. Further, the Government pointed out that several mosques were razed in a similar project. The alterations have now been completed.

The daily use of languages other than Turkish by non-Muslim religious minorities, such as Greek, Armenian, Hebrew, and Arabic, in religious services is allowed but is declining.

TURKEY

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is general freedom of movement within Turkey, except in the nine provinces under martial law where authorities have the seldom-used power to restrict movement. Martial law authorities may expel "persons whose presence in the martial law area is determined as prejudicial," or restrict and prohibit their residence in, or entry into, certain areas under martial law. Some border areas are off-limits to foreigners who have not been given specific permission to visit them.

Turks are free to travel abroad, and increasing numbers have done so since currency controls were relaxed.

Turkish law guarantees citizens protection against deportation, extradition, or denial of reentry. The Constitution guarantees the rights of Turks and their families living abroad to return home. However, under the provisions of Turkish citizenship law, the Government may deprive of their citizenship Turks who have refused to return to Turkey to face criminal charges there or who have been determined to have expatriated themselves.

Turkey has permanently resettled about 4,500 Afghan refugees in recent years and provides a temporary haven for Eastern European refugees in two temporary settlement facilities. The Government does not grant refugee status to Iranians.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Turkey has a multiparty presidential parliamentary system. The president is elected by Parliament for a single 7-year term. He has broad executive powers. The current President, whose election was automatic with the approval of Turkey's new Constitution in the 1982 referendum, is retired General Kenan Evren, former head of the Turkish General Staff and the National Security Council which ruled Turkey during the period of military rule.

The unicameral Parliament has 400 seats elected on a proportional basis. The Election Law provides that a party must obtain at least 10 percent of the vote in order to win seats in the Parliament. The 10 percent threshold is intended to prevent political fragmentation and recurrence of the parliamentary paralysis of the late 1970's.

Prime Minister Turgut Ozal's Motherland Party retained its parliamentary majority throughout 1985. Two opposition parties and some independents made up the balance.

Several changes occurred in 1985 as Turkey moved toward full political democracy. These included the formation of a new political party, the merger of two opposition parties, one of which was not represented in the Parliament, the acquittal of 20 former officials of the banned rightwing National Salvation Party, and increased press coverage of the views of politicians constitutionally banned from political activity.

Besides the continuing political ban on leadership figures of the pre-September 1980 political system, restrictions on political activity include the barring of certain groups from operating independently in the political arena, for example, the ban on political parties which advocate a theocratic state. Furthermore, no party may advocate the superiority or dictatorship of a particular social class or group, or "exclusive" or "elitist" political philosophies, and no party may be formed around a particular ethnic or cultural group. Prohibited political groupings also include a Communist or other Marxist party based on class or a Fascist "elitist" party. Any of these is regarded as inimical to a Western-style democratic society and threatening to Turkey's fundamental integrity. People considered Communists or Fascists by the authorities are banned from membership in any party. Other groups permanently banned from joining or actively participating in political parties include active members of the armed forces and certain categories of civil servants--a prohibition based on the pre-1980 politicization of government and security structures.

The Constitution guarantees equal political rights for men and women. Turkey was one of the first countries to grant women full, equal political rights. There are 12 women members of Parliament, and several women hold important positions in party hierarchies, although the present 22-member Cabinet has no women members.

Members of minorities, Muslim and non-Muslim, face no legal limitations on political participation as long as they accept a Turkish national identity. The small numbers of most minorities, however, limit their ability to play a major role in politics. Kurds do play a large role in Turkish political life, again on the condition of their acceptance of Turkish nationality. Dozens of members of the Turkish Parliament are of Kurdish ethnic background.

The Government permitted visits by foreigners to discuss human rights in Turkey during 1985 and in most cases facilitated attendance at trials and contacts with officials. Visitors to Turkey in 1985 included rapporteurs from the Council of Europe (COE) and the European Parliament (EP), a delegation from the European Human Rights Commission, and representatives of the international writers' organization, PEN. In December, representatives of the U.S. Helsinki Watch Committee visited Turkey and had extensive meetings with Turkish officials, including Prime Minister Ozal. Although the ILO did not visit Turkey in 1985, in reviewing the report of its 1984 contact mission (the third such mission in as many years), it noted the cooperation it had received from the Government.

Amnesty International met with officials of the Turkish Government outside of Turkey but sent no official request for a visit to Turkey in 1985. There is no Amnesty International branch or any other domestic human rights organizations known to be operating in Turkey.

The Council of Europe in 1985 continued to pay special attention to the human rights situation in Turkey. In resolutions passed in April 1985, the Council cited the progress that Turkey had made but expressed concern over the continuation of martial law and the existence of the death sentence.

TURKEY

The European Parliament also concerned itself with Turkish human rights questions in 1985. In October, on the basis of a report prepared by a British Labor Party member serving on the Political Committee, the European Parliament voted not to renew its official ties to the Turkish Parliament. It cited the use of the death penalty, the continuation of the DISK trial, and the existence of torture as reasons for its decision. Some parliamentarians who opposed the decision charged that it was taken more for political than for human rights reasons. In an official response, the Turkish Foreign Ministry took issue with the veracity of the report upon which the vote was taken, charging that the author was "prejudiced" and the report was "distorted" and "full of groundless accusations."

In 1982, five nations--France, The Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway--brought a formal complaint against Turkey before the European Human Rights Commission for breaches of the European Convention on Human Rights. The complaint cited violations of articles concerning treatment of prisoners and civil rights for the period September 1980 through July 1982. On December 9, the parties reached a "friendly settlement" which included among its provisions a commitment by Turkey to issue instructions to all public officials to observe human rights principles and to make periodic reports on the measures adopted to ensure effective protection of human rights.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International continued to be concerned about the imprisonment of a considerable number of prisoners of conscience and about widespread and systematic torture and ill-treatment of political prisoners. It was also concerned about the effects of inadequate access to lawyers and the use of confessions allegedly induced by torture on the fairness of trials before military courts. Freedom House rated Turkey "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Unofficial, preliminary reports of the just-completed national census show the population of Turkey in 1985 at about 51.4 million, with an annual growth rate of 2.8 percent. This compares with World Bank estimates of a population of 50,661,000 and an annual growth rate of 2.3 percent. In 1983, per capita gross national product (GNP) was approximately $1,230.

The Turkish economy has made substantial advances under the economic structural adjustment program begun in January 1980 in consultation with the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. Through a combination of monetary and fiscal policies, export incentives, and realistic exchange rates, the stabilization program has promoted a more efficient, export-oriented economy, less dependent on a highly protected domestic market. The Ozal Government has continued the basic policies of the structural adjustment program and has introduced new measures, such as import liberalization, designed to make Turkish industry more competitive in the world market. The economy has generally responded positively to these policies. In 1984, real GNP is estimated to have increased by 6 percent, and exports were up by 24 percent in dollar terms. Inflation and unemployment, however, continued to be problems. The wholesale price index rose by 50.3 percent in 1984 and is expected to increase by about 35 percent in 1985. Estimates of unemployment range from 16 to over 20 percent.

Turkey has substantial agricultural resources which fulfill most of its food requirements and permit some exports. In 1977, caloric supply as a percentage of the total minimum requirement was 118.6 percent. Safe water was available to 95 percent of the urban population and 62 percent of the rural population, according to estimates made in 1980.

Basic medical care is available to most of the population (with the possible exception of a few provinces in the southeast), regardless of income. Life expectancy was 64 years, and infant mortality in 1985 was estimated to be 90 per 1,000 live births. Primary schooling is compulsory, although not universally available. University tuition is heavily subsidized. In 1980, the literacy rate for the general adult population was estimated to be 68.8 percent--83.2 percent for adult males and 53.4 percent for females.

The Constitution guarantees the right to reasonable conditions of labor suited to the worker's age, sex, and capacity, and grants the right to rest and leisure and a "fair wage." The labor law forbids the employment of children under 13, and restricts children under 15 to "light work which will not harm their health and physical development, prevent their attendance at occupational training and orientation programs, or their ability to benefit from education." Children between 15 and 18 years of age may not be employed in underground or underwater work, nor may they be employed at night. Girls and women may not be employed in underground or underwater work, but, if over the age of 18, may work night shifts under conditions specified jointly by the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare and the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. A board composed of government, private sector, and labor representatives establishes national minimum wages for the agricultural and nonagricultural sectors. The labor law provides for a 7.5-hour day and a 45-hour workweek. Acceptable conditions of work are both guaranteed by the Constitution and sought after by the workers, though there remains a considerable gap, especially in the area of occupational safety and health, between society's goals and laws, on the one hand, and actual practice on the other. The trade unions have repeatedly complained that existing regulations governing health, safety, and working conditions are not adequately enforced.

Turkey has long been in the forefront of Muslim nations in the promotion and protection of women's rights. Although some conservative elements in Parliament and in society at large have resisted advances in women's rights, President Evren has been a consistent champion of equality for women. Women have full suffrage, occasionally attain high public office, and are represented--albeit not always in significant numbers--in all Turkish professions and institutions. Women have served or are currently employed at the rank of university rector and dean, ambassador, political party vice president, and army colonel. Turkish businesswomen play significant roles in many industries, and a few sit on the boards of some of Turkey's largest private firms. Female lawyers and judges are no rarity, and female doctors are dominant in some specialties.

Despite government policies to promote and protect women's rights, the role of women in smaller communities and rural areas, especially in the southeast, is still defined by centuries of traditional practice. Many women and girls in the southeast are still partially or fully veiled. Prevailing cultural values make it difficult for some women to receive primary or secondary education or to pursue careers outside of the home.

It is a longstanding cultural policy of the Turkish State, supported by most Turks, that all the citizens of Turkey are "Turks" and use the Turkish language. This policy derives in large part from attempts to partition Turkey after World War I with the aim of establishing independent ethnic states on the territory of what is now the Turkish Republic. The wariness of Turkish governments toward groups which emphasize ethnic identity has since been reinforced by the activities of separatist movements inspired from outside and within Turkey--movements that frequently promoted terrorism and anarchy. As a consequence, the Turkish Government aims at the assimilation of individuals of non-Turkish ethnic backgrounds into the mainstream of Turkish society and culture. In order to further this objective, the Government has forcefully discouraged manifestations of ethnic differences, in some cases by law; for example, the use of languages other than Turkish for certain purposes is prohibited.

The separatist terrorist activities in Kurdish areas have posed the most serious challenge to the nationalities policy of successive Turkish governments. Complicating the issue is the fact that ethnic Kurds constitute a significant proportion of the population within the provinces in which they are concentrated. These provinces also include Turkey's poorest and least developed areas. Successive governments have recognized this situation and launched major programs for rural electrification, power plants, and irrigation to generate employment and income for the region. In 1985, both the President and Prime Minister traveled to the southeast to underscore the Government's commitment to the development of that region.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

According to the Soviet Constitution, the Soviet Union (U.S.S.R.) is "a socialist state of the whole people, expressing the will and interests of the workers, peasants, and intelligentsia, and the working people of all nations and nationalities of the country." In fact, the U.S.S.R. is a one-party centralized State in which the leadership of the Communist Party, a self-perpetuating elite assisted by the repressive measures of the secret police, attempts to direct all aspects of public life, to interfere significantly with what in the West would be considered private life, and to prohibit the development of independent centers of political or ideological influence. There was no evidence of change in this pattern of repression in 1985.

The Committee for State Security (KGB), police authorities, and prosecutors' offices are charged by the party with enforcing compliance by the population with policy decisions, directives, and legislation. They do so in large part by instilling fear among dissenters and potential dissenters.

The highly centralized economy has been growing at a decelerating rate in recent years. Production and distribution bottlenecks, low productivity, and poor quality consumer goods continue to characterize an inefficient economy.

Soviet performance in the realm of human rights fails to meet even the most elementary of accepted international standards. The Constitution formally provides for most internationally recognized human rights and guarantees the right to education, medical care, and work. In practice, however, these rights are limited by the admitted priority given to the interests of the State. Freedom of speech is denied by vague laws prescribing imprisonment for defaming the State.

The State and party control the mass media and seek to prevent the free flow of information and ideas from abroad. Voluntary organizations, if allowed to exist, must submit to state or party supervision. Trade unions are strictly subordinated to the party and act as agents of the Government in implementing economic policy and ensuring labor discipline. They are not collective bargaining agents for workers. Religious believers in an officially atheist State must submit to state supervision or face harassment or imprisonment. Freedom of movement is neither guaranteed by law nor respected in practice. Many infringements of human rights are carried out by the KGB and police authorities, whose actions are not subject to effective appeal.

The regime confines those attempting to exercise their rights to prison, labor camps, or psychiatric hospitals. Mistreatment of political prisoners continued in 1985. Beatings, inadequate food, clothing, and shelter, heavy manual labor, unsatisfactory medical care, isolation, extended interrogation, and threats against prisoners' families were characteristic abuses. Many prisoners are denied the right to correspond with their families or to receive family visits. Some are arbitrarily confined to special psychiatric hospitals or to the psychiatric wards of regular hospitals where they are often subjected to cruel and degrading treatment and administered doses of powerful and painful drugs to punish and intimidate them rather than to treat a medical condition. The authorities also continue to exile prisoners to remote areas of the Soviet Union or force them to emigrate. Every year a number of persons die in prisons and labor camps because of the harsh conditions and inadequate medical attention.

Persecution of individuals who attempt to express themselves outside state-controlled channels continued during 1985. Human rights monitors, religious believers, proponents of greater cultural and political rights for ethnic minorities, and peace activists were all subject to arrest and imprisonment. Jewish, ethnic German, and Armenian emigration remained at severely restricted levels, despite the desire of many thousands of persons to emigrate.

Abroad, the Soviet Union continues its occupation of Afghanistan and its support of the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia. There has been evidence that the Soviet Union has been responsible for the use of chemical warfare in Afghanistan, Laos, and Cambodia.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from*a. Political Killing

There are occasional reports of unusual circumstances surrounding the deaths of people engaged in religious or political dissent, or members of their families. The possibility of official involvement in such deaths, however, can neither be proved nor investigated. On the other hand, a number of political prisoners and common criminals do perish each year in prison and in forced labor camps due to the severe conditions: beatings, strenuous physical labor, poor diet, extreme cold, and lack of adequate medical care. It is impossible to estimate the number of such deaths.

Prominent Ukrainian dissident poet Vasyl Stus, a member of the now-defunct Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, died of emaciation in a labor camp in September following years of brutal treatment. Armenian activist Iskhan Mkrtchyan and Estonian activist Johannes Hint also died in Soviet custody in 1985.

Soviet law provides for the imposition of capital punishment for a variety of offenses, including some economic crimes (e.g., fraud) which are not generally considered capital offenses outside the U.S.S.R. Statistics on capital punishment, however, as well as statistics on crime in general, are not published by the Soviet Government.

b. Disappearance

There have been no known instances of prolonged or permanent disappearance in recent years. However, it is not unusual for people to be arrested or confined in psychiatric facilities without next of kin being notified. Concerned relatives are expected to initiate an inquiry with the authorities to find out if and when their family member was arrested, and where he or she is being held.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

It is clear that mistreatment of political prisoners during interrogation and incarceration occurs. Although the criminal codes of the Russian and other Soviet republics assert that punishment is not intended to cause physical suffering or the destruction of human dignity, reliable sources have described beatings, isolation, extreme cold, poor diet and malnutrition, compulsory hard labor in difficult conditions, inadequate medical care, and frequent arbitrary deprivation of a prisoner's limited right to receive correspondence and visits from his family. Prisoners cannot practice their religion and may be punished for attempts to do so. They have been beaten by other camp inmates at the instigation of camp authorities. Political prisoners have then been falsely accused of having created a disturbance and, on the basis of the fabricated charges, consigned to the camp prison or solitary confinement.

In 1985, members of the independent peace movement, "Group to Establish Trust Between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A.," were beaten by police agents on more than one occasion while attempting to hold peace demonstrations in Moscow. Jewish cultural activist Yuliy Edelshtein was repeatedly beaten at the instigation of labor camp officials in an effort to persuade him to renounce his religion. Prisoners who protest by hunger strikes are often force-fed by methods harmful to health and occasionally resulting in medical problems. Prisoners are frequently subjected to psychological pressures such as isolation, extended interrogation, and threats against their families. The security organs of the Government are responsible for these abuses.

The Government continues to confine political and religious activists to psychiatric hospitals where they are often subjected to painful drugs not in standard psychiatric use. This treatment is, in reality, a form of torture. In 1981 the Soviet Ministry of Health's chief neuropsychiatrist publicly stated at the Seventh All-Union Congress of Neuropathologists and Psychiatrists that 1.2 percent of patients in Moscow psychiatric hospitals were there "in connection with visits to state agencies to present groundless complaints and slanderous statements." The Soviet Union withdrew from the World Psychiatric Association in February 1983 rather than face the expected censure of that body for its abuses of psychiatry.

Among the victims of such abuses in 1985 were Rozalia Kiikbayeva, who was confined in a Kazakhstan psychiatric hospital in May 1983 for refusing to give up her emigration efforts, and who died on January 8, 1985 at the age of 29, after she was not provided sufficient medical care. Lydia Koifman, wife of imprisoned Hebrew teacher Yevgeniy Koifman, was committed to a psychiatric hospital because of her efforts to assist and defend her husband. At least three members of the "Group to Establish Trust Between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A." were confined to Moscow psychiatric hospitals for relatively short periods, either to intimidate them or to reduce their contact with foreigners. Other political victims of the abuse of psychiatry remained in such facilities, many of them in special psychiatric hospitals operated by the Ministry of the Interior. Some sources estimate that up to 1,000 persons may be confined in psychiatric hospitals for political or religious reasons.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Government spokesmen insist that prosecution occurs only in cases in which persons commit acts prohibited by law. But the provisions of laws under which prosecutions have occurred themselves violate internationally recognized human rights, including freedom of expression and freedom of association. Among these provisions are:

-- Article 190-1, "The dissemination of deliberately hostile fabrications defaming the Soviet State and social system." This article, introduced in 1965, carries a maximum penalty of 3 years' imprisonment;

-- Article 190-3, "The organization of, or active participation in, a group actively violating public order," which carries a maximum penalty of 3 years' imprisonment.

-- Article 70, "Anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda," which carries a maximum penalty of 7 years' imprisonment and up to an additional 5 years in internal exile.

-- Article 227, "The infringement of the person and the rights of citizens under the appearance of performing religious ceremonies," which carries a maximum penalty of 5 years' imprisonment.

In addition to these provisions, the authorities continue to use criminal code provisions against "parasitism," "hooliganism," and "illegal commerce" or "speculation" to harass persons for political activity. Dissidents are sometimes fired from their jobs, then arrested for parasitism because they have no jobs; or the authorities fabricate charges for common crimes, such as theft or possession of drugs or weapons. A recent new criminal code provision making labor camp prisoners liable for resentencing to additional terms of up to 5 years for "malicious disobedience of labor camp rules" has been used to prolong the sentences of prisoners of conscience. Thus, the spectre of indefinite detention, a commonplace of the Stalin era, has reappeared in the 1980's.

Habeas corpus or its equivalent does not exist. According to the code of criminal procedure, pretrial detention can last as long as 9 months, and prisoners are not entitled to consult with a lawyer until after the conclusion of the pretrial investigation. Instances of prolonged detention function in effect as a form of preventive detention.

Persons also face administrative jailing for periods of up to 15 days. In 1985 several Moscow peace activists were jailed for short periods for "hooliganism" or resisting the authorities. Sergei Petrov, who is married to an American citizen, was arrested September 20 while attempting to enter the American Embassy on consular business and was sentenced to 2 weeks in a labor camp. Arbitrary detention or house arrest were used to prevent citizens with dissenting views from meeting foreigners during an international youth festival in Moscow in August.

The practice of exiling political dissenters, often to isolated Siberian villages or other remote areas, dates back to Tsarist times and continues under Soviet rule. Exile often follows prison and, in practice, means confinement in a remote village in conditions of extreme cold, isolation, and relative scarcity of fresh food. These conditions are mitigated only by the privilege of receiving food parcels from family members, moving about within a limited area, finding work (albeit frequently far below one's capability), and arranging one's own often primitive accommodations. The families of exiles are permitted to live with them. Yuriy Orlov, the founder of the Helsinki monitoring movement, who is serving a term of internal exile in a remote area of Siberia following his release from labor camp in 1984, was beaten by unknown assailants in April 1985 and has been forced to live in a crude hut bereft of indoor plumbing.

The exile of Andrey Sakharov and his wife Yelena Bonner in the city of Gor'kiy, a city closed to foreigners, is the best-known example of this practice. Throughout much of 1985 the authorities continued to deny him normal contact with scientific colleagues and to cut them both off from virtually all contact with the rest of the world. This situation changed in early November when Soviet authorities granted exit permission to Mrs. Bonner to travel to the West for medical treatment. Both Sakharovs were subsequently permitted to speak to their U.S. relatives by telephone. Despite these gestures, at year's end Dr. Sakharov remained in exile.

Persons released from exile often are not allowed to return to their former places of residence. Some are forced to live in other areas of the country, thereby in reality insuring continuation of their exile. Others, having nowhere to go, return to their old homes without residence permits, where they run the risk of being arrested for violating residence laws.

In addition to internal exile, the authorities occasionally exile persons abroad or permit their "voluntary" departure. For example, Irina Grivnina, formerly active in monitoring abuses of psychiatry, was told to leave the country in October. The "voluntary" departure of Lydia Staskevich in September deprived Moscow's unregistered Pentacostal Church of one of its leading members.

Large areas of the country are closed to foreigners, and reports of trials in closed areas and remote regions may not become known to foreign observers. An unknown number of political prisoners have been convicted of "ordinary" crimes and therefore incarcerated in camps for common criminals rather than in special camps reserved for political prisoners.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Communist party control of society extends to the legal and judicial system and is exercised in political cases to negate constitutional guarantees of the objectivity and independence of the judicial process. Soviet authorities frequently ensure that political trials are closed to the public by requiring passes for admission to the trial, packing the courtroom with government supporters, and harassing or detaining observers outside the courtroom. The location and date of a trial are often announced on short notice and may be changed with little warning. Western journalists and diplomats are regularly denied access to political trials and permission to visit cities outside Moscow where trials are taking place.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Defense attorneys, like judges, are subject to political pressures and constraints applied by the security forces and the party. About 60 percent of Soviet attorneys are party members; they must, moreover, have special clearance to act as defense counsel in a political case. Attorneys who overstep their assigned role of providing a perfunctory defense risk losing their clearance and destroying their careers. Even the most honest and vigorous defense is of limited utility since the outcome of political trials is determined beforehand by the authorities.

No trial of civilians by military courts have been reported in recent years.

Psychiatric commitment of dissidents, described earlier, allows the Government to circumvent many requirements of the legal process and to incarcerate activists at the discretion of officials and psychiatrists.

A reliable, privately compiled list of political prisoners in the U.S.S.R., edited by Soviet emigre and former political prisoner Kronid Lubarsky, contains nearly 900 names, including some persons in internal exile in remote villages. Since data on the number of political prisoners is regarded as a state secret, only relatively prominent cases, such as those on Lubarsky's list, are known in the West. Although estimates vary somewhat, most observers believe there are as many as 10,000 prisoners of conscience.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government interference in personal life is pervasive. The authorities regard it as a citizen's duty to inform them about unorthodox attitudes of family members and friends. They routinely monitor the residences and telephones of Soviet citizens and foreigners with electronic devices. The Constitution guarantees the inviolability of citizens' homes, and in theory no one may enter a home against the will of the resident "without legal grounds." In practice this provision has little restraining effect on investigative agencies, and well-documented cases of forced entry and illegal searches continued in 1985. Through their control of mail and telephone circuits, the authorities selectively restrict contact between citizens and foreigners, often intercepting mail.

The Government continues to jam most Western radio broadcasts in Russian and other languages, an action clearly inconsistent with the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Soviet citizens who have even chance encounters with foreign tourists are often questioned, and receiving a foreign guest at home can result in extended interrogation. Foreigners are frequently questioned and intimidated after visiting Soviet citizens and, in some cases during 1985, were even expelled. Leningrad authorities were particularly active in this regard.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution mentions most internationally accepted political liberties but limits their exercise to behavior in accordance with the "interests of the people and the strengthening and development of the Socialist system." In practice, the Government does not tolerate dissident behavior and has not hesitated to imprison persons for exercising freedom of expression. All information media are controlled by the party and the Government, which own or operate almost all of them. Publications, films, and radio and television scripts are subject to censorship by the Main Administration for Safeguarding State Secrets in the Media. Soviet journalists are subject to the discipline of the Communist Party and subordinated to the directives of their editorial superiors, themselves trusted members of the party. As such, they are not journalists in the Western sense but rather spokesmen for official government policies.

All universities and research institutes are operated by the State or party; teaching and research are required to conform to official requirements. In areas such as foreign policy and contemporary Soviet history, these requirements narrowly circumscribe the content of research and teaching to the virtual exclusion of independent investigation. All books in the Soviet Union are published by the State or party, and are subject to prepublication censorship. Freedom of expression is substantially greater in scholarship not involving politically sensitive subjects. Nonetheless, the Government's range of political sensitivities is broad, and censorship standards are often applied in an arbitrary and capricious manner.

Openly dissident views on important questions of policy do not appear in the media. No criticism of the party, the Government, or the leadership is permitted except to correct an administrative abuse or to discredit an individual responsible for violating party norms. Open criticism of officials takes place only when decided upon by higher officials. Within very narrow limits, arguments for and against prospective policies may appear in public. Debate within the leadership is occasionally reflected in published texts where polemics and criticism, expressed in veiled language, allow experienced readers to identify policy trends and controversial issues. Such policy debate may not call into question the existing political and social system.

The authors of literary, religious, and political "samizdat" (self-published) materials have been subject to harassment, including loss of employment, warnings from the KGB, apartment searches, and, ultimately, arrest and conviction or incarceration in mental hospitals.

The Government continues to maintain tight control over the work of foreign newspapers. Overt censorship of wire transmissions of news stories out of the country is rare, but the authorities harass selected foreign journalists and, in some cases, either delay or deny visas already issued.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution grants citizens the right to associate in public organizations "in accordance with the aim of building communism." In practice, public associations are organized by the authorities or are subject to their strict control, and the Government suppresses attempts to function independently of its supervision. As a result of a campaign during the last few years, virtually all independent human rights or peace groups have been suppressed and have ceased functioning.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Those eliminated include the Helsinki Watch Groups, which attempted to monitor the Government's implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, and the Psychiatric Watch Group, which monitored Soviet abuses of psychiatry. Members of these groups have been imprisoned or exiled, and many still face persecution. Several persons who attempted to revive the Georgian Helsinki monitoring group in Tbilisi during 1985 were arrested or faced official threats of prosecution for offenses carrying long-term sentences in penal camps.

Trade unions are strictly subordinated to the Communist Party and act as agents of the Government in implementing economic policy and ensuring labor discipline. They in no respect act as collective bargaining agents. The International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts has noted that the Soviet Union had contravened the Convention on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize by imposing a constitutional link between the Communist Party and trade unions which restricted the right of the unions to organize their own activities and formulate their own programs. The right to strike is not recognized, and strikes are rare. Those strikes which do occur are ruthlessly put down by the security forces.

Soviet authorities have continued to suppress all unofficial labor or political associations which they believe represent a challenge to the monopoly of the State. Vladimir Sytinskiy, a member of the "Free Interprofessional Association of Workers" (SMOT, in its Russian acronym), was charged with anti-Soviet slander and confined in May by a Leningrad court to an indefinite term in a psychiatric hospital. The "Group to Establish Trust Between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A." continued to come under intense pressure in 1985, as members were arrested, detained, confined to psychiatric institutions, beaten, and exiled abroad. Group member Vladimir Brodskiy was sentenced in August to 3 years in a penal camp for "malicious hooliganism." Group members Nikolai Khranov and Aleksei Lusnikov were each detained for several days, and two young women members were "treated" in a psychiatric hospital before being released. Group members were among many residents of Moscow who were prevented or strongly discouraged from meeting foreigners attending an international youth festival in Moscow in August, some being placed under house arrest.

The Constitution guarantees the "right to profess or not to profess any religion and to conduct religious worship or atheistic propaganda." In practice, however, religious believers are subject to many restrictions. Participation in religious ceremonies causes exclusion from the Communist Party and, sometimes, dismissal from employment.

Soviet law requires religious congregations with a minimum of 20 adults to register with the authorities. In practice, the authorities reserve the right to grant or withhold registration. Soviet refusal to grant registration can be used to limit the number of congregations or to deny legal status to an entire religious denomination as has been the case, for example, with the Ukrainian Catholic (Eastern Rite or Uniate) Church. Religious believers, moreover, are prohibited from engaging in charitable activity, proselytizing, or providing formal religious training to their children. In some instances, the authorities have removed children from families which have permitted or have conducted such instruction in place of Soviet schooling. Existing seminaries and other institutions of clerical education and the numbers of students permitted to pursue a religious vocation do not provide a sufficient body of trained clergy for officially registered denominations. Unregistered believers, such as some Baptists, Jehovah's Witnesses, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Pentecostals are subject to an even wider variety of repressive measures, including harassment at school or place of employment, denial of access to housing, dismissal from work, and imprisonment.

Examples of such repression of religious freedom were abundant during 1985. A small community of 170 Pentecostals in Chuguevka in the Soviet Far East was especially victimized. Ten community elders, including Pastor Viktor Val'ter, were sentenced to labor camp terms of up to 5 years. All working adults have been fired from their jobs. Soviet authorities, meanwhile, continue their threats to take custody of community children whose parents took them out of school to save them from constant beatings and harassment. Vasily Boyechko, Pentecostal Bishop for the western U.S.S.R., was arrested in September, reportedly on charges of leading an unregistered religious group. Unregistered Baptists continued to suffer the most arrests of any Soviet religious group. Ivan Peters, Wilhelm Richert, and Victor Rogalskiy, three Baptists from Gagra on the Black Sea, were reportedly sentenced in mid-May to labor camp terms of 2 to 3 years. Other Baptists were reportedly arrested in April and June in the Kiev region, Perm, the Voroshilovgrad region, the Tula region, the Gelgorod region, and Omsk. Three more Baptists, I. Steffen, Igor Worlf, and Andrei Woln, were convicted in August in Alma-Ata for possession of a printing press.

In the Ukraine, the campaign against defenders of the outlawed Uniate Church continued. Iosif Terelya, a leader of the unofficial "Initiative Group of the Committee for the Defense of Believers of the Catholic Church," was sentenced August 20 to 7 years in a labor camp and 5 years of internal exile on charges of anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. His colleague, Vasily Kobrin, was convicted in March on charges of anti-Soviet slander. Both men were moving forces behind the samizdat Chronicle of the Catholic Church in the Ukraine which exposed systematic Soviet repression of the Uniate Church, including church burnings. The Chronicle had brought to the world's attention the fact that hundreds of Ukrainian Catholics had renounced their citizenship in protest over religious persecution and Soviet subjugation of the Ukraine.

The traditional religious affiliation of ethnic Russians and eastern Ukrainians is the Russian Orthodox Church. In Moscow, authorities permit only about 50 churches to function. On Easter, when large crowds seek entry to services, police often make access to churches difficult, seeking to intimidate those wishing to attend. Believers going beyond church ritual may encounter more serious difficulty. Orthodox activist Feliks Svetov, arrested in January and charged with anti-Soviet slander for publishing a novel in the West, was held in prison during an extended investigation still under way at year's end. His wife, Zoya Krakhmalnikova, is reportedly serving a term of exile in Siberia for publishing a religious journal. In June, Vladimir Frenkel of Riga was sentenced to 18 months in a labor camp for anti-Soviet slander. A Jewish "refusenik" converted to Christianity, Frenkel was charged with contributing to an underground Jewish cultural journal and with publishing articles on Orthodox Christianity in the West.

In the traditionally Muslim regions of central Asia and Azerbaijan, very few mosques are open for use, and officially recognized clergy are few. Muslim clergy not sanctioned by the authorities are attacked in the official press as "vagabonds." One of them, Akverdy Eshkulov, was reportedly arrested in the Samarkand region during 1985 and sentenced to 2 years in a penal camp for serving as a mullah without official sanction. The Soviet press has reported several other arrests of Muslims for religious activities, including printing and distributing religious books. The official press in Muslim areas attacks traditional Muslim funeral rites as outdated and as occasions for expressing nationalist feelings.

Even tiny religious groups were not immune to severe pressure. Five members of the Hare Krishna sect, in a trial ending July 3 in the north Caucasus village of Kurdzhinovo, were sentenced to terms of from 2 to 5 years in labor camp for "encroaching on the individuality and rights of citizens under the guise of conducting religious rites." Jehovah's Witnesses also continued to encounter serious obstacles to the free exercise of their religion.

The crackdown on Jewish (primarily "refusenik") activists and Hebrew teachers continued in 1985. (A "refusenik" is a Jew who has been denied permission to emigrate.) By year's end, 15 had been sentenced to terms of up to 4 years in a labor camp, many on trumped-up criminal charges specifically designed to discredit their cause. Moscow Hebrew teacher Dmitriy (Dan) Shapiro was brought to trial June 26. After reportedly being subjected to threats of severe punishment and other forms of pressure, Shapiro signed a "confession" to Zionist and anti-Soviet activities. Later broadcast on Soviet national television, Shapiro's statement named several Jewish "collaborators," many of whom in fact did not know him well. Shapiro was given a suspended sentence, but his public "confession" was widely interpreted as a stern warning against assertion of Jewish culture and identity.

Other arrests and trials of Hebrew teachers reinforced the climate of repression. Leningrad Hebrew teacher Roald Zelichonok was tried August 8 and sentenced to 3 years in a labor camp for anti-Soviet slander, apparently on the basis of statements made in private letters. Yevgeniy Koifman was tried in Dnepropetrovsk on a trumped-up narcotics charge and sentenced to 2-1/2 years of closely supervised work release. His wife was confined to a psychiatric hospital following her attempts to assist and defend her arrested husband. Another Hebrew teacher, Leonid Volvovskiy, already exiled to the closed city of Gor'kiy, was charged with anti-Soviet slander and sentenced October 24 to 3 years in a penal camp. His trial took place in an atmosphere characterized by anti-Semitic slogans painted on walls near his apartment and by hostile articles in the official local press. Iosif Begun was transferred from a labor camp to a prison, apparently for violation of camp rules. His wife and son were repeatedly warned by Soviet authorities to cease activities on his behalf, such as hunger strikes and press conferences. Iosif Berenshtein underwent medical treatment for blindness suffered in a prison attack but was transferred back to a camp at Zholtye Vody with little chance of regaining his sight.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Aleksandr Kholmyanskiy, another imprisoned Hebrew teacher, also suffered ill health. Samuel Epshtein, serving a term for anti-Soviet slander, had his term extended by 2 years under a new law which permits extension of camp sentences for minor infractions of camp rules. By the fall of 1985 the number of imprisoned Jewish activists was conservatively estimated at 22.

A film, "Conspiracy Against the Nation of Soviets," was shown on Soviet television in February and again in September, as well as in theaters. The film not only attacked major dissident figures but also sought to link Jewish emigration with Western intelligence activities. Many Soviet Jews regard such films, books, and articles featuring anti-Semitic themes as evidence of government-inspired hostility to them.

Beyond the persecution of specific classes of believers, the Government exerts wide-ranging pressure to discourage religious belief in general among its citizens. The Communist Party, defined in the Constitution as the "leading and guiding force in Soviet society," is, according to its rules, an atheistic organization. Membership in the party, considered incompatible with religious belief, is a requirement for advancement to most positions of authority or prestige in the country. Thus the Government has structured career incentives in such a way as virtually to exclude admitted believers from educational opportunities and desirable careers. Discrimination in education and employment is also practiced against Jews, based on ancestry rather than religious commitment.

The official media feature much antireligious propaganda, and only a few religious publications of controlled content, such as the Vestnik of the Russian Orthodox Patriarchate, are allowed to appear. The practice of religion is also discouraged by strictly applied limitations on the number of sacred books, such as the Bible or the Koran, which may be printed and by government prohibitions against their importation. Few works are published in Hebrew. The number of clergymen and places of worship today is only a small fraction of the number which existed before the October 1917 Revolution.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is neither guaranteed by law nor respected in practice. Although citizens are generally free to move about within the territory of the U.S.S.R., travel in certain areas (e.g., frontier regions or areas of military significance) requires special permission. All adults are issued identity documents or internal passports which must be carried on their person during travel in the U.S.S.R. and used to register visits of more than 3 days with the local authorities. Approximately 20 percent of Soviet territory is formally closed to travel by foreigners. An additional 70 percent is either closed in fact or inaccessible. The right to choose one's place of residence, although formally guaranteed by law, is subject to restrictions. Everyone is required to register his place of residence. The authorities limit the number of residence permits in some large cities, such as Moscow and Leningrad, where housing is at a premium.

There are persistent reports that Crimean Tatars, forcibly evicted from their historic homeland in 1944, continue to attempt to return home. Tatar families who try to reestablish farms in the Crimea, however, are often apprehended by the authorities and forced to leave again. In 1985 the authorities did, however, permit the Meskhetoms, a Turkish-speaking Islamic people also deported during World War II, to return to their homeland in southern Georgia.

As a member of the United Nations, the U.S.S.R. joined the consensus adopting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and has also accepted other international documents in which the right to leave one's country and return thereto is recognized. In reality, however, Soviet law does not recognize the right of citizens to emigrate by choice, and the only recognized motive for emigration is reunification of divided families. On this basis, emigration increased significantly during the 1970's, especially among Soviet Jews, Armenians, and ethnic Germans. Jewish emigration reached a peak of 51,320 in 1979. At the end of that year, however, Soviet authorities began deliberately to restrict the level of emigration. By 1984, Jewish emigration had fallen to only 896. The pattern of Armenian and ethnic German emigration followed suit.

Jewish emigration continued at severely restricted levels in 1985. The total for the year, 1,140, was up only slightly from 1984. Despite worldwide concern and condemnation, by year's end there was still no clear sign that Soviet authorities intended to increase the level of emigration. Many Jews have waited in vain for more than 10 years for permission to emigrate. Jewish sources estimate that there are still more than 200,000 Jews who possess the letters of invitation (vyzovs) from Israel necessary for application to emigrate. The number of ethnic Germans and Armenians emigrating from the U.S.S.R. also remained low during 1985.

In 1985 Soviet authorities resolved several cases on the U.S. Government Representation List of Divided Families. This list contains the names of Soviet families denied Soviet permission to reunite with their relatives in the United States. At year's end 130 families still remained on the List.

Twenty-three U.S./Soviet dual nationals on the U.S. Government Representation List of American Citizens have been denied Soviet permission to leave, several for many decades. Only one case on the list was resolved in 1985. The only significant progress in 1985 was in regard to persons on the U.S. Government Representation List of Separated Spouses. This List contains the names of the Soviet spouses of U.S. citizens who have been denied Soviet permission to join their spouses in the United States. Fourteen cases were resolved in 1985, but at year's end 18 spouses remained on the List.

For the very few who received exit visas in 1985, emigration procedures were cumbersome and expensive. The cost of a passport for emigration to a "capitalist" county is 200 rubles (approximately $254 at the official rate). The mere attempt to submit an emigration application frequently involves a variety of administrative and extralegal sanctions, including loss of employment, harassment, social ostracism, and long delays.

While Soviet emigrants generally retain possession of their Soviet travel passports when they leave the U.S.S.R., they are not always permitted to return. Some individuals are stripped of their citizenship when they are abroad, thus precluding their return. Jewish emigrants departing for Israel are required to renounce formally Soviet citizenship prior to departure, thus effectively precluding their return to the U.S.S.R. as Soviet citizens.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Only officeholders in either of the parallel state and party hierarchies can influence the composition of the Government. The Soviet Union is a one-party, totalitarian State in which the Communist Party directs and controls all legal political life. The Constitution provides that the Communist Party is the "leading and guiding force of Soviet society and the nucleus of its political system, of all state organizations and public organizations." The nomenklatura (Soviet personnel system in which all senior appointments are decided by the party) allows a relatively small group of the Communist Party's elite members to use the party as the instrument of their own personal, self-perpetuating rule.

The Government contends that all internationally recognized human rights are fully protected and asserts that only "Socialism" can truly guarantee human rights. Soviet authorities reject foreign criticism of their human rights record as interference in Soviet internal affairs, despite the fact that the Soviet Union is signatory to numerous international documents, including the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, recognizing human rights as a valid subject of international concern.

The authorities do not permit foreigners to investigate the status of human rights in the U.S.S.R. International human rights organizations such as Amnesty International have frequently addressed communications to the Soviet Government concerning human rights, but the authorities have declined to reply in a substantive manner. The authorities have suppressed the Moscow chapter of Amnesty International and published attacks on the organization, alleging that it works with Western intelligence agencies against the Soviet Government. Vladimir Albrecht, a former member of the Soviet chapter of Amnesty International, was sentenced in September to a term in a labor camp for "malicious hooliganism" in connection with alleged offenses committed while serving a previous penal term imposed in 1983 for anti-Soviet slander.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International was concerned that many Soviet citizens were imprisoned or confined to mental hospitals solely for the nonviolent exercise of their human rights, namely, freedom of religion and expression. It received reports of ill-treatment from prisons, corrective labor colonies, and psychiatric institutions. Amnesty International adopted as prisoners of conscience or was investigating the cases of 560 persons but believed the total number of prisoners of conscience to be much higher. It noted allegations of systematic brutality against some prisoners of conscience and was concerned that apparently none of the allegations had been thoroughly investigated by the competent authorities. Furthermore, Amnesty International reported that those who tried independently to gather information on human rights abuses themselves risked imprisonment. Freedom House rated the U.S.S.R. "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Soviet Union in 1985 had a population of 277,504,000 with an annual growth rate of 1 percent. The 1983 per capita gross national product was $6,765.

The highly centralized, rigidly planned Soviet economy is characterized by widespread waste, chronic shortages of basic goods, and low labor productivity. Current efforts to improve economic efficiency apparently do not include plans for the structural economic changes believed necessary for significant improvement. Despite attempts to improve the production and distribution of basic goods, queues and a flourishing black market remain common features of Soviet life. Formal and informal food rationing still persist in some areas.

Housing is subsidized in the U.S.S.R. but is in extremely short supply. Twenty percent of the population still live in communal apartments, and another 5 percent are housed in factory dormitories. Young couples often must live with relatives and typically have to wait years for housing of their own. The housing that does exist is extremely cramped, more so than in any other developed country in the world. Construction quality is very low, and buildings are poorly maintained. Many urban buildings and most rural buildings lack indoor plumbing.

Free, universal health care is guaranteed by the Constitution, but the health care system has proved inadequate to deal with the enormous increase in cardiovascular and other diseases associated with contemporary industrial society. Soviet male life expectancy has actually decreased by more than 4 years over the past two decades, and female life expectancy has remained static. Since these figures only account for the increase in the adult death rate, and ignore the impact of infant mortality rates, which have themselves risen during the same period by as much as 40 percent, the actual decrease in life expectancy is certainly much greater. The problems in the health care system responsible for these alarming trends involve both quality and quantity. There are chronic shortages of the most essential medicines and vaccines, the average Soviet doctor is only trained at the level of a Western paramedic, medical equipment is well below international standards or nonexistent, and poor sanitary conditions breed frequent infection and disease.

Alcohol abuse has been an important factor in increased Soviet morbidity rates. The Soviet Union ranks first in the world in the per capita consumption of hard liquor, the most dangerous from the standpoint of health. Alcohol consumption has more than doubled during the past 25 years and now takes 10 percent of the average Soviet household budget. In 1984 more than one Soviet adult in eight spent at least one night in a sobering-up station. Soviet sources have themselves estimated that more than one-third of all male workers are chronically drunk. This dramatic evidence of social malaise costs the Soviet economy 10 percent in lost production every year. In May, Soviet leaders acknowledged the gravity of this economic and social problem by enacting a series of measures aimed at reducing alcohol consumption. At year's end, the effectiveness of these measures remained in doubt.

Most members of the Soviet elites (the party, the military, the diplomatic corps, the scientific-technical intelligentsia, the cultural and sports establishments) are to various degrees shielded from these social and economic hardships. They have access to such special benefits as foreign travel, automobiles, quality consumer goods sold in special stores, special medical facilities, admission to the best schools, country houses, and paid vacations in choice resorts, which are not available to the average citizen.

Education is free at all levels and is compulsory through the 11th year. Basic literacy among citizens under 50 is practically universal; only in certain areas of central Asia and the Caucasus were some children unable to attend school. Atheism and Marxist-Leninist ideology are required courses.

The statutory minimum age for the employment of children in 1983 was 16 (18 for heavy work), and the standard workweek was 41 hours (less for minors and workers doing dangerous work). There is no indication of widespread violation of these norms. The minimum wage was set at $203 per month by the end of 1985. Soviet law requires, in general terms, healthy and safe working conditions, but practice falls far short of accepted Western standards.

Women nominally enjoy the same legal status as men but in practice are systematically discriminated against by a male-dominated society. An extensive system of day-care service and maternity leave benefits, including in some cases up to 1 year's leave from work, significantly enhances the ability of women to secure and retain employment. However, women hold less remunerative positions. Traditionally, men occupy the great majority of the leading positions in most professions and politically sensitive occupations, especially politics. At present, only 8 of the 301 full members of the Central Committee of the Soviet Communist Party are women.

Discrimination on the basis of race, sex, or other grounds is nominally prohibited by the Constitution. However, attempts to impose the Russian language on minorities have led to widespread resistance by Ukrainians, Balts, and other minority groups. In recent years, numerous reports and investigations by activists have noted discrimination against Jews in universities, research institutes, and other organizations.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

The United Kingdom (U.K.) is a constitutional monarchy, with government based on a multiparty, parliamentary democracy. As there is no written constitution, human rights are "residual," i.e., assumed unless limited by statute. Human rights have traditionally been respected and guarded by the British people and their elected governments.

Great Britain has a long tradition of respect for basic human rights. Public safety is maintained by a civilian police force. In Northern Ireland, however, human rights traditions have been, from time to time, put to the test as the British Government combats terrorism by militant organizations demanding the forcible unification of Ireland, as well as reciprocal violence by both militant nationalists and loyalist groups against Catholics. Since 1969, Army units have backed up the police in an effort to provide security.

The United Kingdom's highly developed industrial economy has a mix of private and state-owned industries. Individuals may freely own property and pursue private economic interests under the law, and the population benefits from a comprehensive social welfare program. Public policy, supported by legislation and tradition, opposes discrimination on the basis of race, religion, sex, or political opinion.

The principal development affecting human rights practices in Great Britain in 1985 was urban rioting in London suburbs, which led to government proposals for new legislation on public disorder.

On November 15, 1985, the British and Irish Governments concluded an agreement which gives the Irish Government a consultative role in certain Northern Ireland affairs. Both the Irish and British Parliaments subsequently approved the agreement. Rejecting the agreement, Unionist members of the British Parliament resigned their seats and look forward to January 1986 by-elections as a popular referendum on the agreement.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The British Government does not practice or condone killing for political motives. Under law, police may use only reasonable force in the prevention of crime.

The Government reported that during 1985, 47 persons were killed by terrorists in incidents related to Northern Ireland, about three-fifths belonging to the security forces. During the same period, security forces killed five persons. In an incident in February 1985, for which the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) claimed responsibility, 14 policemen were killed in a mortar attack on a Royal Ulster Constabulary station in Newry. Since 1969, 2,465 persons on all sides have died in Northern Ireland-related violence.

Human rights activists have expressed concern over the use by security forces in Northern Ireland of plastic baton rounds (PBR's or plastic bullets) for the purpose of riot control, which has led to over a dozen deaths in recent years. In April 1985 one Northern Ireland policeman was charged with manslaughter and another with assault in connection with the death of a man struck in the chest by a plastic bullet fired at close range at an August 1984 political rally in Belfast.

In 1984, the European Parliament passed a resolution calling for a ban on PBR use in Northern Ireland. While acknowledging the danger of PBR use, the British Government contends they are less dangerous than live rounds. This view was supported in October 1984 when the European Commission on Human Rights dismissed as "manifestly ill-founded" a case on PBR's, ruling that their use was "acceptable" and "less dangerous than alleged."

b. Disappearance

Government authorities do not abduct, secretly arrest, or hold persons in clandestine confinement, nor do they sponsor or condone such activities.

The Government reported that, during the first 7 months of 1985, 50 persons were abducted or illegally detained by terrorists in incidents related to Northern Ireland.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

British domestic law forbids mistreatment or torture of prisoners and provides penalties for such abuse. Confessions obtained by torture or any other inhuman or degrading treatment are not admissible as evidence in court. British official policy prohibits deliberately cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment of prisoners.

In questioning arrested persons, police are expected to comply with the Judges' Rules and Administrative Directions. These rules serve only as guidelines because the United Kingdom has no exclusionary rule. Improperly obtained evidence and statements made by an accused person before being warned of his rights may be used in court. However, judges can and do refuse to accept improperly obtained evidence.

The Judge's Rules are to be superseded in January 1986 by a Code of Practice for the police which has been approved by Parliament. Failure to comply with any provisions of the Code will render a police officer liable to disciplinary action.

Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act of 1984, an independent Police Complaints Authority was established in April 1985 in England and Wales. It will also have the authority to initiate investigations based on media reports. The Government plans to introduce similar legislation to cover Northern Ireland.

The Government acknowledges that some old British prisons are unsatisfactory and overcrowded and that many prisoners live in cramped, unhygienic cells. Britain's prison population is rapidly rising, up 5,000 in 1985 to approximately 46,000, but prison facilities are officially capable of holding only 40,000 persons. To relieve overcrowding, the Government is expanding parole opportunities and planning to build 16 new prisons. The prison service budget has increased 85 percent since 1979. Nonetheless, the Prison Officers Association has complained about a shortage of prison staff, claiming that overtime for its members averages over 16 hours a week. Home Office figures show that, in some prisons, guards have been working 80-hour weeks.

Prison conditions in Northern Ireland differ in some respects from those in Great Britain. All prisons in the province are maximum-security institutions, forcing low-risk common criminals to serve under maximum-security conditions. On the other hand, Northern Ireland prisons are newer and less crowded than those in Great Britain, and prisoners can wear civilian rather than prison clothing. Prisoners are also entitled to weekly visits and parcels, while mainland prisoners get these privileges monthly. The prison population in Northern Ireland, as opposed to that in the U.K. as a whole, declined by over one-third from September 1984 to September 1985.

There continue to be complaints about "strip searching" in Northern Ireland prisons, especially of female prisoners at Armagh prison. Strip searching is now conducted on a random basis for prisoners making home visits or court appearances. Visitors to prisons, including government officials, are subject to a "rub-down search," which involves an officer's passing his or her hands over the visitor's clothing to detect hidden weapons. Despite allegations to the contrary, visitors to prisons, unlike the prisoners themselves, are not subject to strip searches.

In March 1985, Amnesty International expressed concern about evidence it says strongly supports allegations by a Northern Ireland man that he was tortured and ill-treated during questioning by the police in August 1984. In May 1985, Britain ratified the Council of Europe Convention on sentenced persons, which allows prisoners to be sent to their home countries to serve their sentences. Within the U.K., convicts are almost always required to serve their prison time in the general region in which they committed the crime. For example, persons from Northern Ireland convicted of offenses in mainland Britain are usually made to serve their sentences in the jurisdictions where the crimes were committed.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act of 1984 and the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) of 1967, which applies similar provisions to Northern Ireland, empower a constable to arrest without warrant, but with reasonable cause, any person who he suspects has committed, is committing, or is about to commit what is, or what he reasonably suspects to be, an arrestable offense. Procedures for bail, judicial determination of the legality of detention, and suits for false imprisonment are routinely utilized in the United Kingdom.

Except as noted below, anyone arrested without a warrant must be released on bail if he or she cannot be brought before a magistrate's court within 24 hours, unless the alleged offense is serious. If detained in custody the defendant must be brought before a magistrate's court as soon as practicable. In some cases, magistrates have repeatedly remanded persons into custody for periods totaling up to 18 months before trial. With the recent opening of several new courts, including a temporary building to relieve long waits in the Greater London area, remand prisoners are now being held for shorter periods before trial. Nonetheless, 26 percent of persons in jail are remand prisoners awaiting trial. One Northern Ireland man charged with terrorist offenses was a remand prisoner for over 3-1/2 years and was acquitted in four trials before conviction on five terrorist-related charges, including murder, in his fifth trial. Human rights organizations have regularly criticized such delays.

Subject to review by Parliament, British common law allows for the abrogation of individual liberties by the executive in an emergency situation, such as the one posed by the continuing violence in Northern Ireland. Acting on the premise that the fundamental "right to life" was in serious jeopardy due to the violence in Northern Ireland, the British Government adopted two acts to deal with the threat: The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1973, now amended and consolidated as the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1978, which is applicable only to Northern Ireland; and the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act of 1984, (originally enacted in 1976), almost all of which is applicable to the entire United Kingdom. Although both these acts empower the restriction of personal liberties, they are subject to parliamentary review and to mandatory renewal at frequent intervals.

The 1984 Prevention of Terrorism Act gives the police the power to arrest without warrant persons anywhere in the United Kingdom whom they reasonably suspect to be involved in terrorism or from whom they wish to obtain information on terrorism. Such persons may be detained for up to 48 hours after arrest, and detention may be extended 5 days, provided that suspicion of their involvement with terrorism is such as to bring them within the criteria for arrest established by the Act. In 1985, this Act was used frequently to detain persons suspected of planning terrorist acts related to Northern Ireland, India, and the Middle East.

Under the 1978 Emergency Provisions Act, the Northern Ireland police are empowered to arrest without warrant a person suspected of being a terrorist, and to detain that person for up to 72 hours on their own authority. The Act also gives the Northern Ireland police the power to arrest without warrant a person suspected of having committed, or being about to commit, a "scheduled" offense (i.e., one listed on a schedule attached to the law). For the purpose of doing so, the police may enter and search without a warrant any premises or other place where that person is or where the police suspect him of being. Also under this Act, members of the armed forces on duty may arrest suspected terrorists without warrant and hold them for up to 4 hours, after which they must be transferred to police custody or released. Allegations that these limits have been exceeded by the police or the armed forces have not been substantiated. In Northern Ireland, the police generally act in accordance with the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act and the Emergency Provisions Act whereunder arrested persons have the right of access to a solicitor after 48 hours of detention. Human rights activists allege, however, that the 48-hour rule is not always followed.

An independent review of the 1978 Act by Sir George Baker, published in April 1984, concluded that its provisions were still necessary. The Northern Ireland Secretary announced in June 1985 that the Government would introduce a bill in Parliament within 2 or 3 years to implement several of Baker's recommendations. These would include provisions to increase the Attorney General's discretion to try specific cases by regular rather than non-jury courts, to rationalize police powers of arrest, and to limit the life of the legislation to 5 years.

There is no forced or compulsory labor practiced in the United Kingdom.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Fair trial is guaranteed by law and observed in practice. All criminal proceedings are conducted in public, with the exception of cases involving public security; public decency, at the judge's discretion; and juvenile court cases, from which the public, but not the press, is excluded. In a trial of charges under the Official Secrets Act, the court can be closed at the judge's discretion; the sentence must always be passed in public. In a 1985 trial, under this Act, of a government official charged with leaking documents on the Falklands war, the court was open to the press.

The Prosecution of Offenses Bill of 1985 will establish a new national, independent prosecution service, taking over from the police the role of deciding whether to prosecute individual cases. The bill's national coverage is intended to achieve more consistency than is presently possible with prosecutions initiated by dozens of police departments across the country.

In Northern Ireland, certain cases are tried by a judge without a jury, under legislation which decrees that terrorist offenses be tried in this manner. This form of criminal trial was introduced in 1972, following proposals of the Diplock Committee, which was established to consider legal procedures to deal with terrorist activities in Northern Ireland. The committee recommended that, for the duration of the emergency and for scheduled offenses, trial by a single judge should replace trial by jury. Among the arguments for this recommendation were that jurors were open to and afraid of intimidation or acts of physical violence against them, and that there was a continuing risk of unusual verdicts by partisan juries. However, juries continue to sit on all offenses not enumerated in antiterrorist legislation, and these constitute the majority of criminal cases. The 1984 Baker Report concluded that restoration of jury trials for terrorist offenses is not possible given present conditions in Northern Ireland.

The absence of a jury and the ability to convict solely on the basis of confession have been the subjects of criticism. Some human rights activists see an increasing tendency to rely on confessions rather than search for independent evidence of guilt or innocence. They criticize the lengthy time spent in custody awaiting trial. Critics also maintain that the conviction rates in the Diplock courts are unusually high. However, conviction rates in Diplock courts are no higher than those in non-Diplock jury courts, with about half those pleading innocent being found not guilty as charged. Judges in Diplock courts must give written reasons for their decisions, which are made public. Defendants convicted in Diplock courts have an automatic right of appeal to the three-judge Court of Appeals (Criminal), on any ground, against conviction or a sentence. In October 1985, such an appellate court reversed the murder conviction of a leading Irish Republican paramilitary figure.

The use of evidence provided by terrorist informers ("supergrasses") in non-jury courts continues to be controversial. Government officials state that the use of these informers has led to a marked reduction in the level of violence in Northern Ireland. Although the evidence of an accomplice has always been admissible in U.K. courts, in nonjury courts the judge alone must decide whether the evidence of the "supergrass" is credible, bearing in mind the danger of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice.

The Government maintains that the use of informers is vital in the legal fight against terrorism; but critics assert that this places too great a burden of assessing credibility on a single individual. They also question whether the gains to security and public safety arising from the "supergrass" procedure outweigh the dangers to the integrity of the judicial system in Northern Ireland. The use of uncorroborated evidence seems to be returning fewer convictions. The three "supergrass" trials held in 1985 resulted in 43 convictions and 60 acquittals.

The Criminal Law Jurisdictions Act, enacted by both the British Government (1975) and Irish Government (1976), permits trial in the Republic of Ireland, in Northern Ireland, or in Britain of those accused of certain terrorist offenses, regardless of where the offense was committed.

On November 15, 1985, the British and Irish Governments signed an agreement giving Dublin a consultative voice in Northern Ireland affairs through an Intergovernmental Conference. One of the prime topics of the Conference, which met for the first time in December 1985, is the administration of justice in Northern Ireland.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right of privacy is well respected in both law and custom.

In a 1983 case, the European Court of Human Rights found the British Government technically at fault with regard to police use of telephone tapping, as regulations allowing wiretapping only under a warrant from the Home Secretary were administrative and not statutory. The Government's Interception of Communications Bill of 1985 is designed to meet the Court's criticism.

Warrants are generally required to search private premises. However, under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1978, any member of the armed forces on duty or any constable may enter any premises or other place, if he or she considers it necessary to do so to preserve peace or maintain order. This provision was introduced in recognition of the practical difficulty of obtaining a warrant in certain situations involving terrorist incidents, but it has been criticized for allowing excessively broad powers of entry on mere suspicion of wrongdoing.

The Data Protection Act of 1984, designed to protect individuals against misuses of personal data stored in computers, came into force in 1985.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Personal liberty and freedom of speech are well established by British history, custom, and tradition. While the Government appoints the Board of Governors of the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), it does not seek to control the content of programs. Viewpoints independent and critical of the Government are well represented.

In July 1985, when the Government learned of BBC plans to broadcast a television documentary featuring the reputed Provisional IRA Chief of Staff, the Home Secretary wrote to the BBC that terrorism "thrives on the oxygen of publicity" and asked that, in the national interest, the program not be screened. The request provoked public discussion of the issues of freedom of speech and the BBC's independence. The program was broadcast in late October with minor alterations.

There is no government intimidation or censorship of the media, foreign and domestic books, and artistic works. On matters of national security falling under the Official Secrets Act, the Government may seek to prevent the publication of certain materials. In early 1985, however, a former Assistant Secretary of Defense was tried under this Act and found innocent for leaking papers alleging government misconduct related to the sinking of an Argentine warship in 1982. Books are removed in Canada.

Self-policing by the media is practiced by such independent bodies as the British Board of Film Classification operating under clear, published, apolitical guidelines. Material may be subject to legal action under very restricted circumstances, such as the infringement of libel laws.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association are a part of the tradition of civil liberties in the United Kingdom. Except in cases of extreme civil disorders in which public safety is judged to be at risk, the British authorities do not exercise their statutory right to limit individuals' freedom to attend public meetings of their choice. Neither is any limitation placed on individual freedom to join associations, including trade unions, with the exception of several terrorist organizations.

British trade unions have full rights, deriving from common law rather than statute, to organize, bargain collectively, and strike on behalf of their own members. The Employment Act of 1980, however, makes unions liable under civil law for losses resulting from "sympathy" strikes. In the rare instance where the right to strike is prohibited, e.g., for police officers, there are other means to resolve labor differences.

The Government does not control, intimidate, harass, or persecute unions and other associations, nor does it limit in any way their freedom to maintain relations with recognized international bodies. However, in 1984 the Government prohibited continued trade union membership for public employees at its communications headquarters at Cheltenham on grounds of national security. The ban was first overturned and then upheld in the courts. This controversy continued into 1985 as the Government threatened to fire approximately 100 employees who rejoined their banned union. In 1984 and again in 1985, the issue was considered by the International Labor Organization which urged the Government to negotiate with the unions involved to reach an agreement that would meet the Government's concerns and conform to the ILO Convention on Freedom of Association. Employees have also taken the Government to the European Court of Human Rights, where the case is now pending.

In connection with the lengthy 1984 coal miners' strike, some commentators expressed concern about limitations on secondary picketing, which is illegal in the United Kingdom; inhibitions on the movement of striking miners into areas where miners are not on strike; and allegations of police brutality in confrontations with strikers. Others have called attention to instances of intimidation against working miners by those on strike.

Another significant exception to freedom of association in the United Kingdom is a response to terrorist violence associated with Northern Ireland. The Prevention of Terrorism Act of 1984 and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act of 1978 include sections prohibiting membership in or support of organizations (Loyalist and Republican) which are involved in terrorism. These organizations are specifically listed in the statutes. Despite pressure, the lists do not include political parties, even those, such as Provisional Sinn Fein, which have close links to terrorist paramilitary organizations and openly support violence.

The Government announced in the spring of 1985 that it intended to introduce a number of public order measures called for in a White Paper discussing the inner city riot of 1981, violence during the coal miners' strike, and disorder at soccer games. These measures will give the police the power to control numbers of pickets, to fix crowd limits at sporting events where trouble is expected, and to require demonstrators or pickets to move from sensitive areas where violence is likely to occur. Laws already prohibiting conduct likely or intended to stir up racial hatred are to be tightened, and the possession of racially inflammatory material for distribution is to be made a new offense. When announcing the Government's planned public order measures, the Home Secretary said that people had the right to be protected against being bullied, hurt, intimidated, or obstructed. Critics responded that they believed the planned legislation would dangerously infringe civil liberties and the right to peaceful dissent. Subsequently, after riots in London suburbs, the Home Secretary announced the Government would introduce legislation to create a new offense of public disorder.

c. Freedom of Religion

As a matter of government policy and in general practice, everyone in Britain has religious freedom (in teaching, worship, and observance) without interference from the community or the state. Churches and religious societies may own property, conduct schools, and propagate their beliefs in speech and writing. Virtually every religion and sect found in the world is represented in the United Kingdom. There is no religious or denominational bar to the holding of public office except in the case of the Sovereign, who must be a member of the Church of England. The Sovereign's children must be raised in this church or they lose their right of succession to the throne.

England and Scotland both have established churches. The established church's relationship with the State is one of mutual obligation--privileges accorded to the church balanced by certain duties which it must fulfill. The State makes no direct financial contribution to church expenses. Church independence was demonstrated in 1985 when leading bishops criticized government policies. The existence of established churches does not limit the freedom or access to public life of members of other churches. The Church of Ireland and the Church of England in Wales have been disestablished.

In Northern Ireland, the Constitution Act of 1973 specifically prohibits discrimination on the basis of religious belief or political opinion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

In general, U.K. citizens have freedom of movement within the country, and in foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation.

One exception to this general principle is contained in the Prevention of Terrorism Act of 1984. The Act gives the Home Secretary the authority to exclude or prevent from entering mainland Britain anyone he believes may be connected with terrorism related to Northern Ireland, unless that person was born in Great Britain or has been ordinarily resident there for 3 years. Only one person was excluded in 1984, and none were excluded in 1985. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland also has the power to exclude people from that province on the same grounds, unless they were born and have been ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland, or have been ordinarily resident there for 3 years. In addition, any person may be excluded from the United Kingdom who may be ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, but who is not a U.K. citizen, and is involved in terrorism related to Northern Ireland. Once excluded from a region of the United Kingdom, the person is forbidden to reenter that area. Under the 1984 Act, exclusion orders are subject to review after they have been in force for 3 years. These powers have been referred to by many, including the National Council for Civil Liberties, as a system of internal exile.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The United Kingdom is ruled by a Government formed on the basis of a majority of seats in the House of Commons won in freely contested elections. Participation in the political process is open to all persons and parties, of which there are several representing a broad range of political views.

For parliamentary and local elections, the franchise is given to all citizens 18 years of age and over. The right to citizenship itself was significantly affected by the British Nationality Act, which came into force on January 1, 1983. Under one of its provisions, the automatic, unchallengeable right to British nationality, previously accorded to virtually every child born in Britain, now extends only to those children born on British soil, of whom one parent has the right of permanent residence in the United Kingdom.

Women have full rights of participation and are represented at all levels of British political life, but in relatively small numbers. Of 650 members of Parliament, 24, including the Prime Minister, are women. Women officials in both major political parties have complained of de facto discrimination against women within their respective parties.

While racial minorities comprise about 5 percent of the total population, no members of these groups presently sit in the House of Commons, although some are members of the House of Lords. Many non-white Britons, however, have been elected to local government, and in 1985 the first ethnic Asian mayor of a British city took office in Bradford.

The Government generally maintains an open attitude toward international inquiries into alleged violations of human rights in the United Kingdom. It cooperates fully with the European Commission on Human Rights in investigations of complaints. The Government took a number of steps in 1985 to rectify its own laws and policies when they were found not to be in conformity with the European Convention. In response to a decision of the European Court of Human Rights, the Government introduced the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill of 1985 to give parents the right to exempt their children from caning in schools. The House of Lords, however, voted for the total abolition of corporal punishment in both state and private schools. No legislation to comply with the courts' judgment has yet been passed.

In May 1985, the European Court of Human Rights ruled against Britain's immigration policy which restricted some foreign husbands, but not wives, from joining spouses legally settled in the United Kingdom. To comply with the court's ruling, the Government in July extended to wives the "Primary Purpose" Rule, which requires men seeking to join wives in Britain to prove that their main purpose in going to Britain is marriage and not immigration.

The United Kingdom is a party to several human rights conventions, participates in international and regional human rights bodies, and is the host country to international nongovernmental human rights organizations, such as Amnesty International.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International was concerned about allegations of torture and ill-treatment during interrogation of political suspects in Northern Ireland; judicial procedures in political cases in Northern Ireland and shootings by security forces there; and allegations of ill-treatment of arrested miners by the police. Freedom House rated the United Kingdom "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

With a population of just over 56.4 million, the United Kingdom's per capita gross national product in 1983 was about $9,200.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

Through a highly developed welfare system available to all inhabitants regardless of race, religion, sex, ethnicity, or political opinion, the British Government meets the health, educational, and other basic needs of the people. The National Health Service provides comprehensive medical services to the entire population at virtually no charge to the user. Life expectancy at birth is 74 years, and infant mortality is 9.8 per 1,000 live births. The primary school enrollment ratio for both boys and girls in 1981 was 97.0.

Minors are allowed to do limited part-time work beginning at age 14. Working conditions and hours are strictly regulated to ensure that a job does not interfere with school. At age 16, minors are considered adults for purposes of working hours and conditions.

Although Britain has no national minimum wage, about 48 percent of the work force belongs to labor unions that set their wages with employers. Until September 1985, organized labor opposed a national minimum wage. For about 10 percent of workers, wages councils comprising representatives of management, labor, and the public set minimum wages and other conditions of employment. The Government plans to abolish minimum wages set by wages councils for persons under 18.

Basic rights for other nonunion workers, including white collar professionals are covered by employment protection legislation. Turn-of-the-century legislation still prohibits night work and excessive overtime for women employed in most manufacturing occupations. Critics of these laws contend such legislation can bar women from well-paid jobs requiring shift work or occasional lengthy overtime.

Under the terms of the 1974 Health and Safety at Work Act, the Health and Safety Executive enforces strict occupational standards of health, safety, and working environment conditions. The Health and Safety Commission, consisting of management, labor, and public members, supervises the Executive and can develop new codes and regulations subject to government approval.

Equal status and equal opportunity for women in professional fields is provided by law. Under the Equal Pay Act of 1970, women are entitled to equal pay with men for doing work that is the same or broadly similar. The Sex Discrimination Act of 1975 guarantees equality of status and opportunity for women. The Equal Opportunities Commission assists in the enforcement of these acts. There is corresponding legislation and a separate commission for Northern Ireland.

Despite their legal rights to equal employment, however, in practice women have yet to achieve fully equal status in the United Kingdom. Women hold three-quarters of Britain's lowest-paying jobs, and the average female wage-earner takes home only three-quarters the pay of her male counterpart, up from 63 percent in 1970. Trade unions have complained of discrimination against women in occupational pension schemes, unemployment benefits, inadequate care allowances, and housewives' noncontributory invalidity pensions.

Progress toward women's equality is also visible. In November 1983, a rule change in the Social Security benefit payments system allowed women to be treated as head of the household and to claim benefits in ways that only men could do previously. Over twice as many women as men have been recruited into the civil service over the past few years in an attempt to redress previous imbalances. In 1985, bills passed Parliament prohibiting female circumcision and outlawing curb crawling by men in cars soliciting prostitution. The National Council for Civil Liberties opposed the latter bill, because they said it would lead to unfair arrests. Another bill pending in Parliament would increase the presently lower penalty for indecent assault upon a woman to equal the maximum penalty for assault upon a man.

The Race Relations Act of 1976 bars discrimination on the basis of race, color, nationality, or national or ethnic origin. Some studies have documented a black unemployment rate that is nearly double that of whites, black overrepresentation in manual jobs, and racial discrimination in job recruitment. In 1984, a Code of Practice on Employment proposed by the Commission for Racial Equality and accepted by the Government, took effect. Although the Code does not have the force of law, it is used as a standard of good practice by industrial tribunals in racial discrimination cases and serves as a guideline for firms in eliminating direct and indirect forms of discrimination. The Church of England's first black bishop to serve in Britain was consecrated Bishop of Croydon in July 1985.

In Northern Ireland, the majority Protestant community is more prosperous and highly skilled than the Catholic community, and controls much of the local economy. The unemployment rate in Northern Ireland is substantially higher than that of the United Kingdom as a whole, and, according to a July 1985 Northern Ireland Office report, twice as high for the minority Catholic population as for Protestants. The reasons for this are complex, involving a long history of discrimination by the one community against the other for the purpose of maintaining its traditionally dominant position. In addition, a higher Catholic population in younger age groups and rural areas, which suffers from higher unemployment throughout the United Kingdom, tends to skew this statistic, although Catholic youth unemployment is still higher than that for Protestants. British Government policy attempts to alleviate the problem by promoting equal opportunities, attracting more investment to the area, and subsidizing the economy through public sector spending.

Since 1972, when direct British rule was introduced in Northern Ireland, specific measures have been taken to combat religious discrimination against Catholics. These include the institution of universal suffrage and abolition of voting limitations based on property; the Representation of the People Act of 1985 to ensure more honest elections; prohibition of religious or political discrimination by any level of government; establishment of a Commissioner for Complaints to deal with grievances against local government; establishment of a Central Housing Authority to meet the problem of discrimination in housing; prohibition of discrimination in employment; and a special effort to recruit more Catholics into the Civil Service and the Police. While not disputing the value of these structures, critics are not satisfied and point to slow progress in remedying historical imbalances.

Within the Northern Ireland Civil Service, the proportion of Catholics reflects their proportion in the overall population in lower (under 35) age groups. In upper age groups and in the security forces, Protestants still dominate. Recruitment of Catholics into the security forces is made more difficult by terrorist threats, often carried out, to kill Catholics who join the Royal Ulster Constabulary or Ulster Defence Regiment.

YUGOSLAVIA

The Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia is a multinational, federal state comprising six republics, one of which has two autonomous provinces. The League of Communists of Yugoslavia (Communist Party) maintains a monopoly on political power. The ideology of Yugoslav communism and Socialist self-management differs substantially from the highly centralized and rigid Soviet model of Communist rule. The form of Marxism-Leninism that Yugoslavia professes is increasingly pragmatic, providing opportunities for open discussion and flexible decisions. In the Yugoslav political system, the party is decentralized so that the republic and provincial party authorities wield power that is seldom challenged by the central party bureaucracy. In the economic system, Socialist self-management theoretically and legally provides that the workers run their own enterprises. Extensive, private, small-scale farming is permitted, as are some private enterprises in services and small-scale manufacturing.

State security and uniformed police are under the jurisdiction of Federal and Republic secretariats for internal affairs. Security and police forces are generally subject to, and heedful of, overall direction from the political level, although significant abuses have been alleged.

Struggling through the very severe winter of 1984-85 and a drought in the summer of 1985, the Yugoslav economy was unable to deal effectively with its long-term problems of high unemployment, a large foreign debt, and persistent and rising inflation. Slowness in reaching agreement on reform measures to implement the stabilization program was partially to blame.

Although the fundamental tenets of Socialist self-management and the federal structure of the State are among the declining number of taboos which cannot be questioned, there is relatively open debate within and outside the League of Communists on the implementation of these concepts. Key topics frequently discussed in the open include the boundaries of permissible political and cultural expression, economic reform, and the functioning of the political system. Some issues, however, such as the rights of and the relations among ethnic groups, appear to be so sensitive that free speech is not tolerated. The multiethnic composition of the population and the tragic internecine strife between Croats and Serbs during World War II have made Yugoslav leaders wary of separatist sentiment. Various Yugoslav governments have taken stern measures to repress displays of "nationalism."

The human rights situation in Yugoslavia improved marginally during the year but was still marred by several negative developments. The major political trial of the so-called "Belgrade Six," which concluded in February 1985, resulted in the effective release of three of six defendants and in light sentences for the three defendants who were convicted. Appeals courts further reduced these sentences and freed another of the accused entirely. Arrests and convictions for what in Yugoslavia are called "verbal crimes" continued at a lower but still significant level in comparison to 1984, most often on charges involving "nationalism."

Continuing Serb-Albanian antagonism in south Serbia and the autonomous province of Kosovo produced a number of violent incidents, and a small but steady stream of Albanian

"nationalists" and irridentists were jailed on a variety of charges. Nationalist incidents in other parts of the country also caused concern for authorities.

In 1985, political and economic issues were debated more openly in the press and public. The Serbian Orthodox Church was permitted to resume construction of a major cathedral in Belgrade. Debate also continued on change in the political system, such as multiple candidates for political office, and on reform of the criminal justice system to eliminate some categories of political offenses.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no instances in Yugoslavia during 1985 of alleged killing by government forces. In the autonomous province of Kosovo, an ethnic Albanian policeman was killed by an ethnic Albanian teenager, who some said had been recruited to do so by an Albanian nationalist organization

In the past, Serb-Albanian ethnic tensions in the Kosovo have resulted in violence and sometimes fatalities. Attacks by members of one nationality on another continued at a low but steady level in 1985, but no deaths were reported.

b. Disappearance

No instances of prolonged or permanent disappearance of persons inside Yugoslavia were reported in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although both Yugoslav law and the Constitution forbid torture, various sources report that people have been beaten, maltreated, or threatened during pretrial detention or while serving sentences. A number of witnesses at the "Belgrade Six" trial charged police with using threats, physical intimidation, and beatings to obtain testimony. Sarajevo sociology professor Vojislav Seselj, serving a sentence for hostile propaganda, was reportedly beaten by his jailers. "Belgrade Six" defense attorney Vladimir Seks charged Yugoslav prison authorities with widespread abuse of prisoners' rights and dignity through beatings and other degrading and cruel practices. Some ethnic Albanian prisoners from Kosovo complained of physical and mental abuse by authorities during pretrial detention and while serving their sentences.

The Yugoslav press has reported instances of police misconduct for which police officials have been reprimanded, suspended, and subjected to criminal prosecution on charges of excessive use of force and abuse of citizens' rights. One case of alleged police misconduct in 1985 was the manhandling of London Observer and Daily Mail correspondent Peter Hadzi-Ristic by police in Mostar incidental to his arrest on charges of making hostile statements. No charges were brought against the police.

YUGOSLAVIA

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, and Exile

"Political crime", as defined by the Yugoslav Criminal Code, consists of attempts to overthrow the constitutional order or to undermine the country's territorial integrity, unity, or basic constitutional system. "Political crime" includes a number of broad, imprecise categories, such as "counterrevolutionary acts," "association (for the purpose of) hostile activity", "insulting the reputation of the President of the Republic," "fostering national hatred," and "hostile propaganda." Enforcement of these laws varies widely from republic to republic, with the result that people have been jailed in some parts of Yugoslavia for acts which in other parts of the country rarely, if ever, result in criminal sanctions. Authorities remain particularly sensitive to manifestations of nationalism and to contacts with a range of emigre groups considered subversive.

Pretrial confinement in political cases does not usually occur, and the system of bail used for other criminal offenses remains applicable.

Yugoslav legal procedures derive from Napoleonic law and are generally followed in all, including political, cases. Arrests are conducted pursuant to warrants, defendants are brought before a judge within 24 hours of arrest, individuals arrested for political reasons are usually charged with the specific sections of the Criminal Code dealing with political crimes, and defendants have the right to independent counsel.

The Criminal Code allows the arrest and imprisonment of Yugoslav citizens for acts considered political offenses under Yugoslav law, even though they were committed abroad and were not crimes in the country in which they took place. Such cases are often based on the expression of views hostile to the Yugoslav regime or association with anti-Yugoslav groups. In 1985 such instances involved Yugoslav dual nationals or guest workers resident in the Federal Republic of Germany, Austria, and Switzerland.

There is no information to indicate that forced labor is practiced in Yugoslavia.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although ordinary criminal trials are almost always open to the public, not all political trials are. Yugoslav political authorities usually do not actively interfere in judicial proceedings concerning political cases. However, substantial evidence exists that in some cases Federal, Republic, and provincial political authorities have sought to orchestrate the trials of those charged with political crimes. Some human rights organizations believe that the outcome in political cases in Yugoslavia is predetermined. Others, including some critics of the Government, hold that the courts have considerable independence, particularly in determining the length and type of sentences, if not innocence or guilt.

Developments in 1985 evinced considerable evidence of appellate court independence. In several important political cases, appellate courts either altered the charges or reduced sentences, particularly in the cases of Vojislav Seselj and the "Belgrade Six." In these cases, appellate courts threw out convictions on two charges by lower courts, in one case freeing the defendant entirely.

Although many persons accused of political offenses are able to find able, energetic counsel, there are cases in which government authorities seek to intimidate or chastise attorneys who take political cases. Several of the defense counsel for the "Belgrade Six" have suffered reprisals from the authorities. For example, although Vladimir Seks was convicted in 1981 for "hostile propaganda", government determination that he serve his sentence in 1985 probably stemmed from his active participation in the defense at the Belgrade trial.

The precise number of current political prisoners is very difficult to determine. Official figures are hard to obtain and frequently contradictory. According to last July's report by the public prosecutor covering calendar year 1984, the authorities brought charges against 466 persons in political cases, a decrease from 1983. Only in Kosovo did the number of political cases rise--by some 39 percent; 275 persons, or 59 percent of the total accused of political crimes were of Albanian nationality. Nearly two-thirds of the political cases were so-called "verbal crimes", that is, charges arising from something the accused said or wrote.

The Yugoslav Federal Secretariat for Internal Affairs (i.e. the security and police apparatus) reported that in 1984 police brought 809 criminal (i.e. felony) complaints and 4,268 misdemeanor charges against persons accused of "acting in a hostile fashion," including those accused of espionage or terrorism. Figures for 1985 are not yet available, but the trends show a drop in political cases in Slovenia and Serbia proper, and a slight rise in political crimes, particularly nationalist activity, in Kosovo and parts of Dalmatia (Croatia) and Bosnia-Hercegovina.

At present, there may be some 450 to 500 political prisoners in Kosovo. Countrywide, the number of political prisoners may be between 600 and 1,000.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Yugoslav authorities are widely believed to interfere in the private lives of citizens. Allegations of such interference are most common from those citizens actively engaged in nonofficial political activity. Although the judicial system provides elaborate safeguards concerning procedures for conducting searches, these safeguards are sometimes abused. The most widely publicized charges of illegal searches during 1985 were made by defendants and lawyers at the "Belgrade Six" trial. Many Yugoslavs also believe that authorities eavesdrop on conversations, read mail, and tap telephones.

Yugoslav citizens are generally free to receive and read foreign publications. Infrequently, the import or sale of a particular issue of a foreign publication will be banned, usually because the issue contains a story which the authorities believe presents false or hostile information about Yugoslavia. The publications of certain Yugoslav emigre groups are considered hostile in themselves, and their importation, possession, or sale is frequently subject to criminal charges.

YUGOSLAVIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

During 1985 Yugoslavia continued its slow and at times halting, but generally acknowledged, movement toward greater openness and freedom of speech and press. In theory, both the Yugoslav Constitution and Yugoslav law affirm these freedoms.

The Government grants some latitude to what it considers non-nationalist and nonthreatening oral expressions of disagreement with government policy. The authorities tolerate considerable commentary and criticism in academic and some quasi-official public forums. Nonetheless, a few subjects remain taboo, such as changing the political status of the autonomous province of Kosovo and interpreting the history and present state of relations between Serbs and ethnic Albanians. Ethnic Albanian professors at Pristina University have been criticized in the press, and several have been dismissed, for alleged Albanian "nationalism" in their teaching and writing.

The authorities also seek to punish allegedly derogatory or inflammatory ethnic statements which they consider incendiary. Such "hostile" oral statements and other forms of personal expression (e.g., painting slogans) are grounds for criminal prosecution. For example, "Belgrade Six" defense lawyer Vladimir Seks served a 7-month sentence in 1985 for alleged pro-Nazi statements made in an Osijek cafe in 1981. He allegedly complained that everything was rotten in Yugoslavia, insulted Tito, and suggested that Yugoslavia needed someone like Hitler to restore order. He was also disbarred for 10 years. British journalist Peter Hadzi-Ristic, although in the end charged only with disturbing the peace, was arrested and charged in August 1985 for "hostile statements" made to two strangers in a Mostar restaurant.

In general, the autonomy of newspaper publishing houses has increased markedly in recent years. A new Federal press law was adopted in July 1985 which its authors widely touted as facilitating popular access to more abundant and varied information. Press criticism of government policies and proposals concerning domestic political and economic issues is frequent. There is also ample criticism of the Federal Cabinet and of the League of Communists at all levels, but criticism of the state Presidency is rarer.

However, both Yugoslav law and practice impose some restrictions on freedom of the press and freedom to publish. Public prosecutors have the authority to ban the publication and sale of books or periodicals if their content is deemed "hostile." Yugoslav authorities claim that this power is rarely used and that only seven books were banned in Yugoslavia during 1984. However, this figure can be misleading, as some publications have been restrained or discouraged without resort to formal legal procedures. For example, in early 1985 two Belgrade publishing houses dropped plans to issue collections of the work of Slobodan Jovanovic, historian and minister in the pre-World War II Yugoslav Government, after both government and party officials denounced the proposed publications. Banning of books is often a local option, and standards of what is unacceptable vary widely throughout Yugoslavia. For example, the popular novel "Noz" (the knife) by Vuk Draskovic remains banned in Sarajevo, Bosnia-Hercegovina, but is freely sold in Serbia.

Although there is no prepublication censorship of the print and broadcast media, the authorities exercise indirect oversight through publication boards, and the editorial staff relies on self-censorship. Nevertheless, journalists and writers have tried to breach previous limits with mixed results. For example, a new, irreverent and iconoclastic magazine, Dinar, failed after only one issue in April 1985 because of a barrage of political criticism. In October 1985, Knizevne Novine, the organ of the Serbian Writers Union, was criticized by the Belgrade party organization for publishing materials which allegedly undermined the basic values of the Yugoslav system. The editors of the publication responded that its critics were falsifying the charges and were guilty of predictable repressiveness.

Similarly in book-publishing, the authorities generally provide only loose political oversight. Police and prosecutors intervene rarely. Although works by some authors, such as Milovan Djilas, have long been banned, many publishers and writers have been testing the limits of the permissible, a process which has resulted in occasional clashes with the authorities. The works of Soviet and other Eastern European dissidents are published in large press runs and sold widely. The Polish Nobel Prize winner Czeslaw Milosz was feted by the Yugoslav Union of Writers when he visited Belgrade in mid-1985 to promote a new edition of his works. In early 1985 the publication of Serbian writer Dobrica Cosic's novel, "The Sinner", became an issue because of its allegedly unfavorable treatment of the Communist Party between the two world wars. Although senior politicians attacked the book sharply, Cosic suffered no reprisals. In late 1985 the publication, with a government subsidy, of Veselin Djuretic's "The Allies and the Yugoslav Wartime Drama", a revisionist history of World War II in Yugoslavia, aroused controversy. Djuretic was accused of rehabilitating the Cetniks, Serbian national opponents of Tito's partisans during the war. Despite the furor caused by the book, Djuretic has thus far suffered only minor reprisals (loss of party membership), and his work remains in circulation.

During 1985 there continued to be considerable discussion in the Yugoslav press and public over the desirability of reforming the Criminal Code to eliminate so-called verbal crimes. Despite their discussion, it appears that such reform will not occur soon.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public political demonstrations are permitted only by official organizations and generally only in support of government policies. Others are usually suppressed. Public gatherings and meetings of private organizations are permitted but must be registered with the authorities. Regular meetings of the Serbian Philosophical Society, which has been critical of the authorities' handling of domestic dissent and other domestic policies, continued to be tolerated in 1985. When police interrupted a meeting of the Serbian Writers' Union in early 1985 in which government policies had been harshly criticized, there was widespread press support for the Union's protest, and local police later admitted an error. In May 1985, Slovene authorities tolerated a brief march in Ljubljana protesting the Government's military parade in honor of V-E Day.

The future of private gatherings remains problematical. The acquittal of some, and light sentences for others, of the "Belgrade Six" left the status of Belgrade's so-called "Open University" up in the air, but the gatherings reportedly have continued. Intellectuals critical of the Government have expressed confidence that it will not soon again attempt to disrupt or raid peaceful gatherings in private homes. However, authorities have taken other steps to harass critical intellectuals or so-called "dissidents", such as police questioning of colleagues and supervisors at their workplaces.

Trade unions are organized geographically by republic and province, and by trade within these boundaries. They are, however, no longer simply "transmission belts" of party authority and control. Under Yugoslavia's system of self-management, unions play a significant role in representing workers' interests in the management of enterprises, including the distribution and levels of income, the determination of working conditions, and the settlement of disputes. Union leaders play a significant role in the political system in advocacy of worker interests on such matters as the impact of inflation, standard of living, and wage policies.

Strikes, often referred to as "work stoppages," are neither explicitly legal nor illegal. They occur with increasing frequency, usually for local reasons. Most strikes involve either the amount or distribution of personal incomes within the work force of a particular enterprise. They usually are settled quickly, after consultation between the workers or their representatives in the larger enterprises and the management.

In 1985 the number of strikes in Yugoslavia almost doubled (to about 600) and involved one-third more workers. The authorities were especially concerned that strikes at several large enterprises would result in greater economic hardship, a continuing fall in the standard of living, and more extensive labor unrest.

The Confederation of Trade Unions of Yugoslavia is a member of the International Labor Organization (ILO). In early 1985 the ILO released a report, resulting from a 1983 visit to Yugoslavia, on the status of labor and trade unions in Yugoslavia with the major focus being on the implementation of the self-management principle. The Yugoslavs accepted the study with few reservations.

c. Freedom of Religion.

Yugoslavia is a multireligious state. Most Yugoslav believers are members of the Roman Catholic Church, of the Serbian or Macedonian Orthodox Churches, or of the Islamic faith. Since World War II, the religiously observant Jewish community has numbered only several thousand persons. There is no official or favored religion; the Government officially encourages atheism. Freedom to practice religion is guaranteed under Yugoslav law, but proselytizing is outlawed. Religious communities have their own publications sold by subscription or at churches, although not at public kiosks. Their contacts with coreligionists abroad are not restricted.

YUGOSLAVIA

The building of new churches and mosques requires government permission. Muslims have succeeded in erecting or renovating many mosques in Bosnia and have recently obtained permission to construct a large new mosque in Zagreb. In Belgrade, the Serbian Orthodox church in 1985 received authorization after 40 years to recommence construction of St. Sava Cathedral, originally begun before World War II. The rededication of the site of the cathedral was marked in May 1985 with a gathering of at least 10,000 church officials, believers, government representatives, and curious onlookers. The Government allowed several other religious gatherings of equal size in various parts of Yugoslavia during 1985, including a major Roman Catholic gathering in Djakovo at which Cardinal Casaroli of the Holy See spoke before an assemblage of European Cardinals, Yugoslav Government officials, and thousands of ordinary believers. Authorities also continued to tolerate large-scale pilgrimages by domestic and foreign Catholics to Medjugorje, a small village in Bosnia-Hercegovina where the Virgin Mary is said to have appeared before several children.

There is some discrimination against religious believers of all faiths; for example, a party member who has his children baptized risks expulsion from the party. Some party officials have criticized this punishment. Constraints on occasional attendance at services and religious instruction of children vary from region to region. All three major faiths make vigorous efforts to provide religious instruction to youth.

Conflicts between the State and Yugoslav religious communities develop when the latter attempt to engage in what the authorities consider "nationalist" or political activities. The authorities regard ties between Yugoslav Muslims and Islamic fundamentalist groups with suspicion. They regularly criticize Catholic Church organizations in Yugoslavia for alleged support of Croatian nationalism and political activism. They have also criticized the Serbian Orthodox Church, less intensely, for Serbian nationalism. They occasionally charge individual priests and Muslim imams with political offenses, usually related to "nationalism."

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within the country is guaranteed by the Constitution and permitted in practice. However, many ethnic Serbs believe that the out-migration of ethnic Serbs from the predominantly ethnic Albanian Kosovo province is the result of anti-Serbian behavior on the part of ethnic Albanians (including personal threats or occasional violent acts, forced sale of property, or vandalism). This has been the subject of public debate among political figures.

Almost all Yugoslavs are able to emigrate, seek temporary employment abroad, and visit foreign countries at will. Half of the country's population possesses valid passports, and no exit permits are required to visit the more than 135 countries with which Yugoslavia has diplomatic or consular relations. Yugoslav Jews (and many non-Jews) freely visit Israel, with which Yugoslavia has no diplomatic relations. Some Yugoslavs are denied passports either temporarily or permanently on national security, political, or criminal grounds. Over 600,000 Yugoslav workers, some with family members, are employed as "guest workers" in Western Europe.

YUGOSLAVIA

The law on the entry of foreigners to Yugoslavia notes the right of permanent asylum and provides for government assistance to persons granted that right. In addition, Yugoslavia extends temporary asylum to refugees who, with the assistance of the Belgrade office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, seek permanent resettlement in third countries. At present, there are about 1,700 refugees temporarily in Yugoslavia. There were no known cases of forcible repatriation of a refugee to his home country in 1985.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: the Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The 2-million-member League of Communists of Yugoslavia maintains a monopoly on political power, but that authority is dispersed because the party is decentralized to the level of the six republics and two provinces. Yugoslav politicians and the press regularly note that the country's eight regional party organizations hold widely differing views on key policy issues. Because of such differences, the authority of the party in the Yugoslav Government is not absolute.

Governmental bodies are responsible in theory and in fact for administering and drawing up policies, especially economic policies. At the top of the government structure are the collective state Presidency (chief of state), the Federal Executive Council (Cabinet), and the Federal Assembly (Parliament). The Presidency is responsible for overall policy direction. The Cabinet is responsible for running the governmental machinery and proposing specific legislation. The Federal Assembly is responsible for enacting legislation. It operates sometimes by majority vote and sometimes by consensus among delegations representing the country's six republics and two autonomous provinces. The Federal Assembly in recent years has been quite active and contentious. It has several times rejected or drastically altered proposals endorsed by the Federal Presidency and Cabinet, and it is often the scene of sharp debates which are generally reported fully in the press and on television. Federal laws must also be adopted separately by Republic and Provincial Assemblies before they can be implemented, and thus these local assemblies wield considerable power, amounting at times to an actual veto of federal authority. In certain cases, delegates to the Federal Assembly must have authorizing instructions from their respective Republic or Provincial Assembly before engaging in negotiation or compromise on federal legislative measures.

Selection to party bodies is accomplished by the party bodies themselves. Methods range from secret ballot and majority vote to cooptation. In late 1985 there was considerable discussion in the party over the desirability of having multiple candidates elected by majority vote.

Selection to government bodies occurs via a delegate system. Nominations originate in the various socio-political organizations which are parts of the mass umbrella organization, the Socialist Alliance of the Working People. This includes the trade unions, the League of Socialist Youth, and the Union of Veterans. On the local level, ordinary workers can and do play an active role in the selection process. Only one candidate is usually nominated for each office, although as of late 1985 there had been several elections involving more than one candidate, particularly in the Republic of Croatia and the city of Zagreb. The concept of multiple candidates has received much public attention. Virtually all government offices mandate a rotation of officials once every year or 2 years, usually with the possibility of extension for one additional term.

Yugoslavia's many ethnic groups generally have equal access to political and government positions, especially through their respective republics and provinces. Various senior executive government and party positions rotate annually from one nationality to another according to a predetermined national "key." There are some allegations of political discrimination, particularly from ethnic Albanians, that Serbs are overrepresented in the party and government organs of the autonomous province of Kosovo. However, in terms of percentages and visibility, these allegations are not borne out by the situation as of late 1985. Although the current Federal Prime Minister is a woman, there are still allegations that women cannot participate fully in government and political life. While full and unimpeded opportunities for women are mandated by law, women are underrepresented at higher levels, reflecting longstanding social attitudes and customs.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigations of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is sensitive to Western charges of human rights violations within Yugoslavia and often attempts to dismiss such charges as efforts to bring pressure on Yugoslavia to alter its social, economic, or political system. The Government issues visas to representatives of international human rights groups, but its officials may refuse requests for appointments. On at least one occasion in 1985, however, the Prime Minister received a representative of a foreign human rights group to discuss the human rights situation within Yugoslavia. Representatives of Western human rights organizations and the Western press were permitted to attend the trial of the "Belgrade Six" through to its conclusion.

In its 1985 Report (concerning the year 1984), Amnesty International was concerned about the imprisonment of over 200 prisoners of conscience. It received allegations of ill-treatment during investigation from several political prisoners and was also concerned about ill-treatment and conditions in some prisons where political prisoners were held. It called for the release of two prisoners of conscience forcibly confined to psychiatric institutions. Freedom House rated Yugoslavia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Yugoslavia in 1985 was approximately 23.1 million, with an annual growth rate of 0.7 percent. According to World Bank statistics, per capita gross national product in 1983 was $2,570.

In 1985 the largely decentralized Yugoslav economy performed less well than in 1984. Economic performance got off to a weak start in the early months of the year as Yugoslavia experienced one of the worst winters in the past 25 years. Performance began to improve in the second quarter, but export growth was less than expected, and agricultural and industrial output growth both lagged. A drought from July to September resulted in smaller crops than the record levels of 1984. Yugoslavia was again compelled to reschedule a portion of its nearly $20 billion in foreign debts, but interest payments were maintained without interruption.

In an attempt to cope with its economic problems, Yugoslavia has maintained a domestic austerity program since 1980, and the Long-Term Economic Stabilization Program lasting until 1990 was approved by the Federal Parliament in mid-1983. Development of reform measures has taken longer than originally anticipated, and inflation has continued to mount, reaching an all-time record in excess of 75 percent in 1985. Since 1980, real incomes have fallen more than 30 percent, but most Yugoslavs have been able to maintain their standard of living at higher levels than the fall in real incomes suggests. Official statistics indicate that overall personal consumption fell only 3 percent between 1979 and 1984, but some Yugoslav experts have indicated that the standard of living in 1985 had fallen back to the level of 1967.

There is an extensive system of social and medical insurance for those who are old, disabled, and unemployed. The Government provides a network of day-care nurseries for working mothers. Life expectancy at birth in 1985 was 71.7 years, and the infant mortality rate was 30.0 per 1,000 live births. Education is extensive, government-run, and free through high school. The adult literacy rate was 90.5 percent in 1981, with 95.9 percent of males and 85.3 percent of females literate. In January 1985, the Federal Committee for Labor, Health, and Social Affairs announced that 2.5 million citizens could be considered socially endangered due to low incomes. Of these, 1.2 million were pensioners drawing monthly pensions of roughly $80 or less.

Almost 85 percent of all land is privately owned. Farmers may own up to 10 hectares of arable land plus additional hectares of mountainous terrain as pasturage. Small-scale private enterprise is permitted, and republican and provincial laws limit the number of employees in private enterprises to 5 to 10 workers, plus family members.

Factories in theory are owned by society as a whole and administered by their workers, organized in enterprise-level workers' councils. In practice, the influence of workers' councils varies, but they are actively involved in determining worker incomes, fringe benefits, and working conditions. Through their trade union organizations, workers participate in decisions affecting housing, transportation, continuing education, and other living and working conditions.

The standard workweek is 42 hours. Common practice is to work five 8-hour days per week, and one Saturday per month. Most workers have the right to 1 month's paid vacation per year, as well as extensive sick leave. The minimum age for the employment of children is 16 years. In practice, young people from developed, urban areas usually wait a long time for their first job because the unemployment rate among young people is particularly high. Working conditions and safety are regulated by republican and provincial law.

The Constitution guarantees the equality of citizens regardless of sex, and the Government has taken steps to improve the status of women. Maternity leave for employed women is very liberal and is routinely granted for periods between 9 and 12 months. Depending on the republic, working mothers are given day-care allowances based on their salaries and the number of children to be cared for. Also, for up to 2 years after the birth of a child, a working mother may take sick leave when her child is ill.

The role of women in Yugoslavia's work force has slowly improved as a result of increased education and urbanization in the society as a whole. According to statistics for 1984, 37.3 percent of the Yugoslav work force was composed of women, as opposed to 34.5 percent in 1974. However, women still hold relatively low positions in their respective fields of employment.

The Constitution charges government authorities at all levels with protection of the cultural rights of all the peoples of Yugoslavia. The use of the major local language is required in official communications between Belgrade and the various republics, and local languages are used in the schools, courts, and local media. Each citizen has the right, in theory and practice, to address courts and government agencies in his own language. Despite government efforts, some social discrimination continues, however, particularly against ethnic Albanians and Gypsies.

NEAR EAST, NORTH AFRICA, AND SOUTH ASIA

AFGHANISTAN

In April 1978, a bloody Communist coup toppled the Afghan Government and led to the creation of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan (DRA). Following a period of intense and violent intraparty factionalism and growing internal opposition, the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December 1979. Soviet occupying troops--numbering 118-120,000--plus regime forces, are now in the seventh year of a brutal country-wide war against the Afghan resistance, or mujahidin, which is supported by the vast majority of the people. The regime headed by Babrak Karmal depends totally on the presence of the Soviet troops for its authority and its very existence; its writ extends mainly to Kabul and several other cities and military bases.

The Soviets' central and long-term objective appears to be to absorb Afghanistan into the socialist system by reshaping that country's traditional Islamic society into the Soviet mold as they did in Central Asia in the 1920's. Since the 1979 invasion, Soviet advisers have moved into controlling positions in government ministries, the armed forces, and the security apparatus. They now either directly make, or are deeply involved in, all significant political, military, and socioeconomic decisions. With Soviets dominating the central government organs, the still divided Marxist-Leninist People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) serves principally as a political facade.

Even before the economic deterioration brought about by the years of upheaval and warfare since 1978, Afghanistan was among the world's poorest nations. The war has further lowered living standards, disrupted the international trading system, led to the devaluation of the currency, and disrupted internal economic production and distribution. Moreover, the Soviets have pursued a deliberate policy of destroying crops, livestock, irrigation systems, and villages as part of their strategy.

Afghanistan is a country without an independent judiciary to guarantee even the most fundamental human rights. The most feared and consistent violator of human rights is the secret police, KHAD. More than 25,000 Afghans are believed to work full time for KHAD under the close supervision of Soviet secret police (KGB) "advisors." KHAD has operational responsibility for collecting foreign and domestic intelligence, conducting clandestine activities inside Afghanistan and abroad, and maintaining regime control through intimidation, surveillance, arrest, interrogation, and imprisonment.

An already bad human rights situation deteriorated still further in 1985. Basic rights continued to be violated on a magnitude unprecedented in recent Afghan history. Military and KHAD forces carried out systematic violations of the human rights of Afghans on a grand scale, and with impunity, as part of their campaign to maintain their grip on the few urban Afghans under their control. Urban centers were repeatedly bombed and strafed by aircraft and subjected to mortar and artillery bombardment. Large-scale military operations were mounted with scant regard for--and at times with deliberate intent to cause--death and injury to innocent civilians. Harsh reprisals continued against non-combatants, and entire villages were bombarded on suspicion of harboring resistance fighters. Reports continue of old men, women, and children being rounded up and shot.

Moscow's brutal conduct of the war has resulted in one of the greatest mass migrations in history. Many Afghans have been forced into urban centers such as Kabul, whose population has more than doubled to over 2 million. More than 5 million Afghans have been uprooted, nearly 4 million of them becoming refugees abroad. In large areas of the countryside where the resistance is active, wartime conditions and longstanding animosities among competing tribal groups have led to multiple taxation, arbitrary detention, and outright banditry. Without the withdrawal of Soviet forces and a political resolution of the conflict, there are no prospects for an improvement in the human rights situation.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

As in the past, arbitrary killings and other acts of violence by Soviet and Afghan troops and security forces were a daily occurrence throughout 1985. In March, Soviet soldiers reportedly murdered over 1,000 civilians during punitive strikes against villages in Laghman Province in retaliation for their support of the mujahidin. In May, again in Laghman Province, some 100 innocent civilians, mostly children and old women, were slaughtered when Soviet soldiers attacked the village of Qargan'i. After looting homes, the soldiers massacred women and children who had taken refuge in the village mosque.

Large-scale Soviet-led military operations in Logar valley caused death and massive destruction in villages located east of Asadabad and created another influx of several thousand refugees into neighboring Pakistan. Military operations in the Panjsher added to the destruction visited on villages during 1984. During October, Soviet and Afghan troops were reported to have systematically destroyed many of the smaller villages around Jabol As Saraj, near the mouth of the Panjsher. Homes and fields were methodically destroyed, often with bulldozers, and large numbers of women and children fled into Kabul and the larger towns in the Shomali.

Battlefield executions of captured resistance fighters are commonplace. Although fighting is a daily occurrence, there are no known prisoner-of-war camps or facilities for detention of resistance fighters. Regime media seldom mention the capture of mujahidin but make frequent reference to their "elimination." Reports continue to circulate that resistance forces have also killed captured Afghan (particularly officers and party members) and Soviet soldiers, though the standard practice for captured Afghan troops, and often officers as well, is to invite them to join the resistance and/or to send them back to their villages. There have been reports that in isolated instances a few prisoners have been exchanged, but such is by far the exception rather than the rule. The mujahidin have kept some Soviet prisoners in an apparent attempt to bring about prisoner exchanges, but the Soviets and DRA have shown little interest; as a result, Soviet prisoners are often executed when they become a burden to mujahidin forces because of military operations. Some Soviet soldiers have reportedly defected to and fight with the resistance.

The pace of executions of political prisoners seems to have picked up in 1985, but the regime has provided no reliable data. There was one report of an attempted breakout by 13 political prisoners from Kabul's notorious Pule Charkhi prison in early October. Wives, children, and other family members have been threatened or killed by Soviet and Afghan troops in an effort to extort information or confessions from villagers during house-to-house searches.

The Soviets continue to employ particularly cruel types of antipersonnel explosives to restrict the movement of resistance forces, and refugees alike. Butterfly mines and explosive devices disguised as household objects or toys have been strewn along trails and paths in the southwest and eastern regions of the country. Many of the relatively large number of leg and foot injuries seen on the streets of major towns and cities of Afghanistan, and among many of the refugees, probably result from such explosive devices.

Kidnappings and assassinations by mujahidin of Afghan Communist Party members, suspected police agents, informants, and Soviets in Afghan cities are a common occurrence. Political assassinations are often the work of rival party factions rather than the mujahidin, however. Resistance attacks against regime and Soviet targets have led to the death or injury of innocent bystanders. However, most resistance actions in urban centers are directed against military or government objectives.

There has been no fully confirmed report of the use of chemical weapons by Soviet forces in Afghanistan since 1982. However, reports continue to be received of incidents in which chemical or toxic agents may have been employed. There was one unconfirmed report of the use of chemical weapons by Soviet/Afghan forces during a military operation near Maidanshahr in Wardak Province in early October. Thirty Afghan soldiers and a number of civilians were said to have perished when the vapors drifted over their positions.

b. Disappearance

Persons frequently disappear and are never heard from again, although families as a rule eventually learn when missing relatives have been taken as military conscripts or have been detained by the secret police.

Reports continued of abductions of KHAD members by the resistance. In almost all cases, those abducted were executed or detained for lengthy periods.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and physical or psychological intimidation remain standard techniques used by the security services, reportedly with the participation of Soviet "advisers," to extract information or confessions from detainees and to inflict punishment. Such torture reportedly includes electric shock, beatings, deprivation of sleep, extraction of fingernails, and burning of genitalia.

AFGHANISTAN

One man was repeatedly tortured over an 18-month period before his will was finally broken enough for him to appear before regime television in 1985 to recount his "crimes" against the regime. There are similar accounts of other prisoners being "prepared" for public recantations.

Independent international human rights groups have repeatedly cataloged credible reports, many of them firsthand, of torture and ill treatment of people while in custody of the military and KHAD. Amnesty International, in its report "Torture in the Eighties," and more recently the U.N. Commission on Human Rights' report--approved by the General Assembly--on the human rights situation in Afghanistan, have both described grisly treatment of prisoners at the hands of the Afghan security apparatus. Resistance fighters have also been known to inflict grisly punishment on those who fall into their hands.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no effective constitutional or legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest or detention. Afghans in areas controlled by the regime live in fear of unwarranted seizure by the secret police. Persons are often detained for questioning on the word of KHAD informants and are not told of the charges against them. Warrants are not used, nor is the right of habeas corpus respected. Untold numbers of prisoners have languished incommunicado in Afghan prisons. Formal charges are usually brought only after months of interrogation, if ever. In many instances, innocent victims are rounded up, imprisoned, and virtually forgotten. Political crimes range from armed opposition to authorship or distribution of leaflets against the regime or Soviet occupiers, or simply an association or remote connection with a foreigner.

Bail has never been a regular feature of Afghan law. In cases of common crimes involving wealthy persons or those with good connections, bail is sometimes granted. Corruption, however, is so widespread that it is possible for the families of people detained for common crimes to obtain their release after paying bribes to secret police agents or regime officials.

To compensate for recruiting problems and the high rate of desertions, the Afghan regime uses house-to-house searches and press gangs in the bazaars and markets of the major cities to obtain conscripts, often seizing those with no legal liability to service. The regime also forces soldiers to remain in service beyond their term.

In areas not under regime control, Soviet or Afghan soldiers or suspected secret police agents are either killed or detained after an informal mujahidin inquiry. Regime soldiers are often treated as fellow Muslims and are either invited to join the resistance or are instructed to return to their villages. Soviet soldiers are sometimes killed out of hand or held for long periods of time. In many cases, such as in the Panjsher valley, they are kept under detention. Prisoners held by the mujahidin reportedly face harsh conditions. The ratio of Soviet soldiers in captivity to the number of Soviets reportedly captured appears low, suggesting that many Soviets are executed. Under a 1982 agreement, the mujahidin have delivered to the International Committee of the Red Cross 11

Soviet prisoners-of-war to serve a 2-year internment in Switzerland before being offered resettlement or repatriation to the U.S.S.R.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

All courts, whether civil, military, "revolutionary," or security, are controlled by the party. The laws governing their organization and jurisdiction set out as the first priority the safeguarding of the gains of the "revolution." One consequence is that plaintiffs may be denied due process simply because of charges regarding their political beliefs. Most of those accused of nonpolitical offenses are apparently tried in the civil court system under the harsh norms of pre-Communist judicial codes. Most political detainees, when charged, are arraigned on allegations of treason, espionage, or terrorism and are tried and sentenced in secret. They are not allowed effective legal counsel and are seldom able to cross-examine hostile witnesses. On the rare occasions when foreigners are accused of political crimes, they are denied their choice of defense counsel and not permitted to question regime witnesses whose testimony is invariably accepted as fact by the court.

In the case of widely known acts against the Government or Soviets, there is generally a televised recantation followed by a show trial. In August, five persons were condemned to death in Mazar-i-Sherif following their "confessions" about planting a bomb in an apartment building and a host of other "crimes against the revolution." Three others were condemned in June for a series of alleged crimes near Kabul, including a March bomb blast in a bazaar in which at least one Soviet woman was killed. Press accounts of such show trials repeatedly use formulations such as, "The suspects will be tried and sentenced," indicating the sham nature of the trials. Although in most cases the penalty was death, occasionally lengthy prison sentences were substituted. Death penalties generally are carried out quickly after a pro forma review by the ruling Revolutionary Council. There is no appeal from a death sentence endorsed by the Revolutionary Council.

In areas not controlled by the regime, civil and criminal cases are apparently tried by Islamic "qazis" (judges) under traditional Shari'a law and Afghan custom. The imposition of such sentences as death, stoning, or mutilation is reportedly rare. There are also some mujahidin courts for trying Soviet and regime soldiers or suspected regime agents. Little is known of these bodies, although they are believed to be based on traditional or Islamic jurisprudence.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Afghan regime and the Soviet occupation forces do not recognize the right to privacy. In the cities and during military operations against villages, areas are frequently cordoned off and subjected to house-to-house searches for military conscripts, mujahidin fighters, and weapons. Members of the secret police commonly accompany the military and check book titles and correspondence for evidence of unorthodox opinion or antiregime connections. House-to-house searches in Kabul are often conducted in the early morning before daybreak.

AFGHANISTAN

Rights to privacy and freedom from arbitrary interference vary widely in areas controlled by local mujahidin leaders. The resistance has generally tried not to antagonize the civilian population by arbitrary demands for shelter or supplies, but there are exceptions, and growing suspicion caused by the increased use of informers and agents compounds an already difficult situation.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The regime and its Soviet backers consider the educational system and the mass media to be essential to the realization of their long-term objectives of Sovietizing Afghan society and of overturning all traditional Afghan social and political institutions. The regime tolerates no expression of ideas which have not been carefully weighed, judged, and approved by the party and its Soviet ideological supervisors. Every effort is taken to stifle and suppress opposition viewpoints, and criticism of the regime or the Soviets is swiftly punished. The regime employs censorship, surveillance, and oppression to ensure that all publicly expressed views hew to the party line. There is no academic freedom in Afghanistan.

All media are owned and controlled by the regime and tightly supervised by Soviet officials. The press, radio, and television are used to convey regime policy and the Soviet interpretation of world events. Soviet films and entertainment programs are frequently featured on Afghan television to reinforce that interpretation. The unlicensed import and sale of foreign video and audio tapes, magazines, books, posters, and other publications are forbidden. The great majority of new books on sale in Kabul, irrespective of language, are published in the U.S.S.R. Afghans are guarded in their private conversations, even among friends or colleagues, lest anti-regime or anti-Soviet remarks be reported to the secret police. Western radio broadcasts in the local languages are regularly jammed, although some programs do get through to Afghan listeners and constitute one of their main sources of information. The regime has actively hampered efforts of non-Communist news media to cover the war inside Afghanistan and has imprisoned or expelled foreign correspondents captured while accompanying the mujahidin. Soviet and regime spokesmen have threatened unauthorized foreign journalists with capture or death. The regime reportedly offered a reward for the capture of foreign journalists. One American journalist was killed in September by Afghan or Soviet troops near Kandahar while traveling with a resistance group.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There is no freedom of peaceful assembly or association in areas controlled by the regime; only assemblies which are regime-sponsored and orchestrated are permitted. The regime frequently stages "spontaneous" meetings to create the impression of popular support. Demonstrations at Western embassies can be arranged on demand. Without exception, all mass organizations are tightly controlled by the regime.

Employees have been threatened with loss of jobs or imprisonment if they refuse to join party organizations. In some cases, families are warned that their children will be forced out of school if they do not join one of the youth organizations. This campaign to restrict and channel political and social activities has encouraged the exodus of the already shrunken upper and middle classes.

There is no right of labor to organize in any meaningful fashion for the protection and furtherance of workers' economic and political goals. Trade associations and unions of workers and of peasants are closely modeled after those of the Soviet Union and serve as vehicles for the Sovietization of Afghan society. The Central Committee of Afghan Trade Unions, with a claimed membership of 150,000 workers, is an affiliate of the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

Afghanistan is an overwhelmingly Islamic nation, primarily Sunni. There are some Shi'a Muslims, particularly in the Hazarajat area of central Afghanistan. Small urban enclaves of Hindus, Sikhs, and Jews have been traditionally tolerated.

The media portrays the regime as defending the faith and the resistance as destroyers of mosques. However, by far the vast bulk of the population appears to reject this interpretation and considers the regime and its Soviet sponsors to be anathema.

Since the 1978 coup, religious organizations have been tightly supervised. The regime established a Ministry of Religious Affairs in 1985. Major regime policies are promptly given the Ministry's imprimatur. Wherever possible, the regime selects, censors, and pays the mullahs for individual mosques. Such clerics are considered to be secret police agents by many Afghans and have been frequent targets for assassination by the resistance.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Domestic travel remains severely curtailed by the war. Overland movement has become more difficult because of damage to roadbeds and bridges. Surface travelers also risk being caught in fights between mujahidin and Soviet forces. Buses and other vehicles are sometimes deliberately attacked by Soviet or regime helicopter gunships. The civilian traveler is also faced with frequent checkpoints or roadblocks by Soviets, regime forces, mujahidin, and, in some cases, bandits. Tolls are often extracted. Regime officials ordinarily travel by air, since they risk being identified and executed at mujahidin roadblocks. Air travel has become more hazardous because of occasional resistance attacks on aircraft and airports. Reportedly three civil aircraft were downed by the mujahidin in 1985.

The regime severely curtails foreign travel by Afghans under its control. Travel to the West is effectively discouraged and permission routinely denied for fear the traveler will not return. Some businessmen can still obtain passports, but many Afghans are forced to pay bribes of $1,000 or more for a passport. Bank accounts and real estate are often demanded as surety for return, and the regime is free to seize the property of persons absent for more than a year. Pilgrims to Mecca are carefully screened and are issued documents valid only for Saudi Arabia. In 1985, the regime levied heavy fees on pilgrims in addition to requiring the deposit of real estate with the Government in an effort to assure their return.

Legal emigration is virtually impossible, but large numbers continue to seek refuge abroad. Families caught attempting to leave the country have been arrested, shot, or bombed by Soviet or regime aircraft patrolling Afghanistan's borders. Nevertheless, over 3 million Afghans have been registered with various international relief agencies in Pakistan and Iran, and each new military operation creates more refugees. The regime maintains that exiles are welcome to return without penalty if they agree to support objectives of the "Saur Revolution." Few, however, have returned. Recently the regime established a commission to handle returning refugees, but although there is much traffic both ways across the border few refugees have taken the regime's offer.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Afghanistan is ruled by a totalitarian apparatus fronted by a handful of Afghans and the PDPA but in reality controlled by the Soviet Union. The party is modeled closely on Soviet lines and headed by a 12-member Politburo. Regime figures put the number of party members at 123,000 but the actual number of active members is far lower. Soviet military and civilian advisors sit in almost all ministries and make or approve every significant decision.

Membership in the PDPA, the sole legal political party, is a prerequisite for meaningful participation in public affairs and professional advancement in most fields. The party itself is deeply split between its Parcham and Khalq factions. The less numerous Parcham faction, presently favored by Moscow, retains control of the party apparatus.

The regime and Soviets exert control over only a few major cities, and then only by virtue of their military presence. In cities such as Herat and Kandahar, this control is limited and challenged frequently by armed resistance attacks. Most of the countryside is, for practical purposes, not under regime control.

In April the regime staged a five-day Loya Jirga (Great Council) meeting in Kabul involving over 2,000 delegates. Numerous sources, including many delegates, said that the meeting was largely organized by KHAD and that most of the participants had either been bribed or coerced to attend. Another Jirga of borderland tribes was similarly organized in September, again with participants subjected to bribes or coercion. At both Jirgas, only expression of support for the regime was permitted.

During the year, the regime also conducted elections for local councils in Kabul, Faizabad (the capital of Badakhshan Province), and Zaranj (the capital of Nimroz Province). A few minutes prior to the voting, the single slate of candidates was presented for the first time to the voters, who then cast their votes by raising their hands. Regime and secret police officials, some with cameras, stood watch at the fringes of these voting sessions, clearly to discourage "no" votes. Regime newspaper pictures showed young children raising their hands along with other voters.

AFGHANISTAN

The Kabul regime has resisted all efforts by international humanitarian organizations to investigate its human rights practices. The International Committee of the Red Cross has not been allowed in Kabul since 1982. A request by Helsinki Watch to send an official factfinding mission to Kabul was denied. The Afghan government has refused to cooperate with Special Rapporteur Felix Ermacora, who was appointed by the U.N. Human Rights Commissioner (UNHRC) in the summer of 1984 to investigate human rights abuses in Afghanistan. Based principally on interviews with Afghan refugees in Pakistan, various reports have documented large-scale human rights violations; these include a 212-page report by Helsinki Watch entitled "Tears, Blood and Cries" and Professor Ermacora's interim report of February 19, 1985.

The decision to appoint the UNHRC Special Rapporteur was strenuously opposed by the U.S.S.R. and Afghanistan, which further declared it would not be bound by any conclusion of the report. Since submission of his report to the UNHRC in Geneva in February 1985, Professor Ermacora has been subjected to personal attacks and vitriolic denunciations. The findings of the interim report, endorsed by the UNHRC, were approved by the U.N. General Assembly in December 1985. They state "that the current situation in Afghanistan has given rise to willful killing, including murder; torture and inhuman treatment; denial of a fair trial; arbitrary arrest and execution of sentences; and the taking of hostages." The UNHRC has extended the mandate of the Special Rapporteur for an additional year.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, the detention of political prisoners without charge or trial, the use of the death penalty, and reports of torture and ill-treatment of prisoners and extrajudicial executions. It also expressed concern about political trials which appeared to fall short of internationally recognized standards. Freedom House rates Afghanistan as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Reliable social and economic statistics are not available. Population estimates vary widely but the true figure now may be under 10 million. There are also more than 3.5 million external refugees. The estimated annual population growth rate is 2.4 percent.

Party members, secret police, regime figures, and some merchants may have been enriched by the war, but most Afghans have suffered economically. Except for regime-subsidized staples in the major cities, the cost of many food items and housing has risen faster than personal income. Heating fuel costs have become exorbitant. Electricity is available only in a handful of cities and for varying periods and is often cut off completely in winter. Difficulties with surface travel and deliberate bombings of formerly rich agricultural and pastoral areas such as the Shomali, the northern steppe, and Helmand Valley have led to a decrease in traditional Afghan cash crops and exports such as grapes, dried fruit, and Karakul lambskins. Production of traditional handicraft items for export, such as carpets, has also been severely impeded. The once thriving tourism industry has vanished.

AFGHANISTAN

Life expectancy is 37 years and the infant mortality rate is more than 180 per 1,000 live births. Rural health delivery services have never been adequate. At present, they are nonexistent except for folk medicine, a limited number of Afghan paramedics who are usually only semiskilled and serve in mujahidin-controlled areas, and foreign doctors who enter the country clandestinely. Medical services provided in urban areas under regime control are also inadequate because of the war-related rural immigration, war casualties, an overall shortage of doctors and qualified staff, and severe lack of basic medicines, equipment, sheets, and beds.

The war also has had a drastic impact on education. Large numbers of the country's educated individuals have fled the country. Most rural schools were destroyed by the resistance when the regime attempted to turn them into political indoctrination centers. Many others have been closed because of the danger to regime teachers. Formal education in many cities has been brought to a virtual standstill as a result of daily firefights. In rural areas, education seems to be in the hands of traditional Islamic teachers. The regime's inability to maintain the strength of its armed forces has led to the drafting of boys as young as 15 (16 is the official age limit). University admission has been limited to women, party members, and men who have completed military service. The student body at Kabul University, the country's main center for higher learning, has dropped from 15,000 before the Soviet invasion to under 4,000 today. In secure urban areas, schools for boys and girls are functioning. The curriculums have been reoriented to conform to the Soviet model. In 1985, the regime dismissed the last of a handful of French and German high-school teachers. The regime has initiated a literacy program in the military forces. Ideological tracts serve as texts and rote memory is the method used. The regime estimates the literacy rate at less than 10 percent although the actual rate may be even lower.

Each year, thousands of young Afghans are sent to the Soviet Union for training heavily geared to political indoctrination. Thousands of teenagers have been sent to various Soviet Central Asian republics for summer vacations. And more young children, some as young as 7 years or less, have been sent to the U.S.S.R. for what has been said to be 10 or more years of education.

Information on labor conditions and practices, including the use of forced labor, is unavailable due to the current situation in Afghanistan.

Participation of Afghan women in activities beyond home and field is severely limited by traditional beliefs, customs, and religious practices. In areas of resistance control, the role of women remains much as it traditionally has been. Since the installation of the Babrak Karmal regime, the social position of some individual women has tended to improve in Kabul and other cities controlled by the regime. Access to education by younger women has increased. To attract women to the regime's banner, and to fill the gap caused by males in the army or fighting for the resistance, women have been placed in a number of nontraditional professions such as radio and television, banking, and the civil service. Few women, however, aside from one Politburo member, have decisionmaking positions. The vast majority of women under regime control have seen no improvement in their social position or status.

ALGERIA

According to its Constitution, Algeria is a Socialist, Islamic state in which ultimate power is vested in a single political party, the Front de Liberation Nationale (FLN). As Secretary General of the Party, President of the Republic, and Minister of Defense, Chadli Bendjedid holds the key decisionmaking positions. Nonetheless, most important decisions are taken by consensus involving the military, the Government, and the party elites. These elites are bound together by the common experience of a harsh struggle for independence, obtained from France in 1962. A sense of "revolutionary, anti-colonial mission" is basic to their self-perception of what Algeria is and ought to be. This revolutionary consensus is the principal source of popular legitimacy for the Government and the nation.

Urban policy and the rural-oriented gendarmerie generally adhere to constitutional guarantees against arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. Military security forces, in practice, are given greater leeway to make arrests, but there are no documented cases of abuse or torture.

The Government has made efforts to reduce tensions in recent years with Berbers, who constitute from one-fourth to one-third of the population, by some accommodation of Berber cultural demands. Berber-government confrontation over political rights increased during 1985, however, when members of two illegal, predominantly Berber organizations with political overtones were arrested for staging unauthorized ceremonies in several Algerian cities during the country's July 5 National Day celebrations.

The economy is Socialist and largely under state control. The private sector is, however, increasingly recognized as a valuable participant in many sectors of the economy. The development of extensive hydrocarbon resources allowed Algeria to undertake ambitious industrialization programs in the past two decades. The current 5-year plan (1985-1989) emphasizes revitalizing agriculture, creating jobs, developing rural areas, and meeting social needs by building houses, schools, and hospitals. Major problem areas include underemployment, lack of productivity, and gaps in the supply and distribution system.

Although the Constitution contains human rights guarantees, civil liberties remain restricted and political rights, in particular, are circumscribed by the party and the Government which limit electoral choices and restrict public debate to officially sanctioned forums and issues. The favorable trend observed in previous years was continued when, in April 1985, 139 Islamic fundamentalists arrested in late 1982 and early 1983 were tried and received relatively lenient sentences. The Government demonstrated its willingness to suppress opposition elements, however, with the arrest in the late summer of 1985 of several well-known and internationally recognized Algerian activists for human and Berber rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:a. Political Killing

There were no political killings in 1985.

ALGERIA

b. Disappearance

Abductions, secret arrests, and clandestine detention are neither condoned nor practiced. There were no accusations of such practices in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and in 1985 there were no confirmed reports of torture.

Persons convicted of civil crimes are sent to provincial civil prisons, while those found guilty of more serious crimes against the State, such as treason or terrorism, or who have committed crimes which carry the death penalty, such as murder, kidnapping, or rape, are sent to one of three penitentiaries. Conditions in both types of institutions range from primitive to modern; conditions in penitentiaries are reportedly worse than those found in the more numerous civil prisons. In the primary civil prison in Algiers, prisoners are often crowded together and sanitary arrangements are poor. Better conditions are found in some outlying prisons. Although all prisons have medical facilities, and each prison has a contract with a local doctor who visits the prison regularly to treat ill prisoners, medical care is generally rudimentary. Seriously ill prisoners may be sent to local hospitals. Prisoners in both civil prisons and penitentiaries are fed a bland, starchy diet, and long-term prisoners rely on family support to augment this diet. Families are allowed to visit civil prisons once a week; it is considerably more difficult to visit prisoners held in penitentiaries. At the discretion of local prison authorities, conjugal visits are sometimes permitted in civil prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution states that no one may be prosecuted, arrested, or held except as provided by law. It also provides that detention for questioning in criminal investigation cases cannot exceed 48 hours, after which the suspect must be charged or released. The penal code provides for informing detainees immediately of charges against them. Algerian law does not include a bail system. Lawyers are allowed 24-hour access to their clients. Meetings take place under visual supervision of a guard.

Despite these constitutional safeguards, military security has held suspects up to a month before releasing or charging them. In 1985, several members of an illegal group, the Sons of Martyrs of the Revolution, were arrested during the July 5 National Day celebrations. Many of them were detained for several days, in one case several weeks, before being charged.

In addition to military offenses, military security is authorized to investigate cases involving internal security and espionage. In cases that involve subversion, military security may also investigate civil crimes.

Once charged, an individual may be held under preventive detention while his case is investigated. This detention can last years: 139 Islamic fundamentalists arrested in late 1982 and early 1983 were not brought to trial until April 1985.

ALGERIA

Individuals arrested for the expression of views, critical of or different from those of the Government, are generally charged with disturbing the public order, associating with illegal organizations, or, in extreme cases, threatening state security. Recent sentences of persons convicted of these crimes range from 1 year to life imprisonment. Amnesty International has noted its concern about cases of prolonged incommunicado detention. There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Defendants have free access to counsel and there is no harassment of defense counsel. As far as is known, defendants are made fully aware of the charges against them at the time they are bound over for trial. Trials are public, although not generally publicized, and defendants have the right to appeal. The judicial system is divided into three parts: civil courts, military courts, and the State Security Court. There are no Islamic courts in Algeria.

The civil courts are generally independent of executive or military control. Military courts deal directly with espionage and with offenses committed by military personnel. The State Security Court at Medea is not in permanent session but has jurisdiction over cases that are deemed "to endanger the national security." At least a ministerial-level decision is required to refer a case to the State Security Court which generally provides procedural protection similar to that of civilian courts. Interested observers are allowed to attend trials held in this court.

All political prisoners arrested prior to February 1979, including former President Ben Bella, have been released since President Bendjedid took office. Three exiled advisors of former President Ben Bella returned to Algeria in February 1985 under a general amnesty granted on November 1, 1984. While the Government has encouraged additional supporters of Ben Bella to return, Ben Bella himself prefers to remain abroad and involve himself in opposition activity. Fourteen prisoners held for their connections with the illegal Sons of Martyrs of the Revolution organization claim that they are political prisoners and have demanded to be treated as such. Algerian law does not recognize political prisoners.

The State Security Court trial of the aforementioned 139 Islamic fundamentalists lasted 22 days, after which the court acquitted 46. Fifty-six were sentenced to prison terms ranging from 1 to 3 1/2 years and 32 received 4 to 12 years. Five people were tried in absentia, with 2 receiving 20 years and 3 condemned to life imprisonment.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Membership in political organizations is not required, except for senior government and military officials who must be members of the party. Occasionally, foreign publications are seized, but otherwise the Government does not interfere with the private lives of Algerians.

Inviolability of the home is guaranteed by the Constitution and generally is honored in practice except in rare cases involving military security. Police may not enter a house without a warrant from the local prosecutor or investigating magistrate, nor may they enter a residence during night hours.

ALGERIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights. Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of expression, it also states that such freedom may not be used to "undermine the foundations of the Socialist revolution." All print media are published either by the Government or the party and all journalists are government employees. The distribution of foreign newspapers and magazines is controlled, but such publications are available in small quantities. The French-language weekly Jeune Afrique is proscribed, and the French daily Le Monde is occasionally seized. Radio and television stations are also government controlled. The Government does not permit criticism of its authority, of socialism, or of the one-party system. However, criticism of specific domestic programs and policies as well as the performance of government utilities and state enterprises is allowed.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All nongovernment associations must be approved by state authorities who have traditionally refused to recognize groups with political, economic, or social views that differ from those of the FLN. There is only one legal political party and one labor union, the General Union of Algeria Workers (UGTA). These and other mass organizations for youth, women, farmers, veterans, and professional groups are all tightly controlled by the party and constitute the primary government-recognized associations. They play key political roles in mobilizing popular support for various government programs and elections and maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields, such as the International Labor Organization.

Workers and employers do not have the right to organize independent unions. Strikes are illegal in the public sector, but workers have successfully used strikes and work stoppages, without sanction of the national union, to win more pay and protect benefits. Most labor-management disputes, however, are solved by union representatives and Labor Ministry inspectors meeting with managers. While collective bargaining in the strict Western sense is not practiced, the UGTA does engage in industry-wide negotiations on behalf of workers under its umbrella.

Individuals are free to assemble, although security personnel watch public gatherings closely, and all nonparty associations must receive government recognition to exist legally. In 1985, members of the Sons of Martyrs of the Revolution, a mostly Berber illegal organization founded in 1984, were arrested for laying wreaths at the tombs of revolutionary heroes without authorization during July 5 National Day celebrations. On June 30, 1985, another predominantly Berber organization, the Algerian Human Rights League, was created to monitor human rights practices in Algeria. It applied for, but has not received, official recognition. Many members of the Sons of Martyrs movement arrested in July were also founding members of the Human Rights League.

In December, the State Security Court in Medea handed down prison sentences ranging from 6 months to 3 years for 23 Algerians accused of belonging to illegal organizations. The defendants were members of the Human Rights League and Sons of Martyrs organization and were accused, among other charges, of "an attack on state authority by inciting a change in regime." The court later began a second trial of some 40 persons accused of planning an armed insurrection.

However, limited political opposition, such as student demonstrations, is tolerated. Opposition political tracts are sometimes circulated, almost certainly with official knowledge, but persons caught with them may be subject to arrest.

c. Freedom of Religion

Legally an Islamic state, Algeria protects the rights of the very small Christian and Jewish minorities to worship in their churches and synagogues. There is little evidence of individual prejudice. Proselytizing is not permitted. The Christian clergy directs its activities to the non-Muslim expatriate community.

The Islamic "clergy" is government-trained. Friday sermons are not formally censored, but government monitoring constrains the clergy's freedom of expression. Religious travel such as the pilgrimage to Mecca is government-organized. Fundamentalists were implicated in an August attack on a police academy outside Algiers during which one policeman was killed and some small arms were stolen. The fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood is banned and its members are reportedly subject to police harassment. This group is rooted in a centuries-old tradition of North African mysticism and has been used as a vehicle for propagating fundamentalist ideas such as the creation of an Islamic state in Algeria that would subordinate secular authority to that of religious leaders.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom to travel within Algeria and abroad and to emigrate is guaranteed by law and generally is respected in practice. One of the first acts of the Bendjedid Government was to remove the exit visa requirement. Government permission is necessary, however, to travel to Morocco. Men who are 19 years or older must have proof of completion of mandatory 2-year military service and employees of state organizations who are paying back educational scholarships through work must have valid leave papers to leave the country. Passports may sometimes take months to acquire, although this situation is improving. The amount of hard currency which Algerians may carry abroad (the equivalent of $200) remains the primary limitation on foreign travel.

Except for foreign diplomats, who must apply for permission to travel farther than 50 kilometers from Algiers, travel within Algeria is generally unrestricted. Visitors must register with the police if they are staying overnight in a locality. Gendarmerie checkpoints in the countryside routinely inspect vehicle registrations and, occasionally, search vehicles.

The Constitution provides for the right of political asylum. Perhaps 165,000 refugees from the Western Sahara conflict live in camps in southwestern Algeria. There also are about 45,000 Sahelian drought victims from Mali and Niger located in four border camps. The Government contributes to the support of all the Saharan refugees and Sahelian drought victims as does the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Major political decisions are made by the top leadership of the party, Government, and military, all three headed by President Bendjedid. The political process is confined to the single party, which significantly limits deviation from the path prescribed by ruling authorities. Basic policy decisions are not strictly questioned, although there is considerable airing of popular aspirations and grievances within the party organization. Some diversity of views is also evident in the National Popular Assembly, the provincial and local councils, and the government-controlled press.

There is universal adult suffrage. All candidates for public office are nominated by the party, but voters usually have a choice among two or more candidates.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Algerian Government does not readily discuss its human rights problems with outside governmental or nongovernmental organizations. For the first time since independence, a nongovernmental organization calling itself a human rights league was established, but as yet has not gained government approval. It applied for official recognition on June 30, 1985. Its reported purpose is to monitor and investigate, independently, human rights practices in Algeria. Several of its members, including its president and vice president, were arrested in early July in connection with their support of, or membership in, the illegal Sons of Martyrs organization. A representative of the French chapter of the International League of Human Rights visited Algeria in August 1985 to investigate charges that these prisoners and detainees were being ill-treated and tortured. He determined that the charges were unfounded.

Algeria supports human rights initiatives in the U.N. and regional forums but usually does not take the lead. Freedom House rates Algeria "not free." In its 1985 report, Amnesty International expressed its concern about long-term detentions without trial, prolonged incommunicado detention, and reports of ill-treatment of detainees.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Algeria's population of 22,100,00 is growing at the rate of 3.2 percent a year. Per capita gross national product (GNP) in 1984 was $2,075.

The Algerian economy is largely Socialist, with the main sectors run by increasingly decentralized state enterprises. The 1981 party Congress officially endorsed a larger role for the private sector and, in 1985, a law was passed easing private sector access to imported goods. At present, about half of the arable land remains with independent herders and farmers, most retail businesses and service firms are privately owned, and there are several thousand small private industrial firms in operation. About 16 percent of the active working population was unemployed as of 1983. A 1977 estimate put the urban population living below the absolute poverty level at 20 percent. The rate of investment of GNP is high, reflecting a conscious government policy, and the rate of real growth was estimated at 5.7 percent in 1984.

The Government controls most food supplies, although the private sector is increasingly important. One-third of the nation's food must be imported because of inefficient agriculture, but the 1985-1989 5-year plan recognizes this deficiency and emphasizes increased agricultural production to reduce the need for food imports. While food supplies are adequate, the cost is high and supply is irregular.

The fertility rate of 7.2 (1982), leading to rapid population growth, makes it difficult to meet all nutritional and social needs and to provide full employment, but minimum vital needs are being met. Housing is in extremely short supply. Most health care is rudimentary but free and widely available. Life expectancy was 57.9 years in 1985, compared with 47 in 1960. Infant mortality is 101 per 1,000 live births. Although most of the population has access to safe water, waterborne diseases remain a serious problem, especially for young children and inhabitants of rural areas.

Education is free through the university level and is compulsory between the ages of 6 and 16. Educational facilities have been vastly expanded since independence but are still insufficient in both rural and urban areas. The literacy level in Arabic or French (or both) is approximately 52 percent of the population over 9 years of age (40 percent for women, 65 percent for men). It is steadily increasing as the large majority of children, 81.7 percent in 1984-85, now attend school.

Algeria's 1978 general workers' statute provides for a normal work week not to exceed 44 hours, a full 24-hour rest period, and a minimum wage. It prohibits employment of persons under 16 years of age. The statute also sets out minimum worker safety standards and standardizes pay according to the work performed. Although the law has not yet been fully implemented in all economic sectors, most of its provisions are respected.

Women enjoy equality under the law and their status is improving, but tradition and culture make it difficult for women to follow an independent path. The great majority remain in traditional roles, although their participation in public life is growing. Ten women are delegates in the National Popular Assembly, two are members of the party's central committee, one is a state minister, and women serve in the armed forces. During municipal elections in December 1984, however, less than one percent of the candidates were women, and few of them were elected to office.

An effort has been made to close the gap separating women from men in education. According to government statistics, 72 percent of all school-age girls were enrolled in 1985. Algeria also has launched a nationwide program encouraging "birth spacing" as a means of safeguarding a mother's health, improving infant care, and reducing the high population growth rate. The program provides free access to contraceptives and counseling on a voluntary basis. Abortion is illegal.

ALGERIA

In the last few years, there have been demonstrations by the large Berber population, sometimes leading to violent clashes. The Government has shown more concern in recent years about reconciling its policy of developing Algeria's Arab identity with Berber desires to preserve their own culture and language, while retaining French as a language of work and education. The Government has given extra attention to building houses, schools, and municipal infrastructure in Berber regions. Berber particularism, however, remains an area of concern, as evidenced by continuing government confrontations with largely Berber organizations.

BAHRAIN

Bahrain has been ruled since the late 12th century by the Al-Khalifa extended family, which dominates society and government. Bahrain's Constitution of 1973 remains in effect, but some of its provisions have been suspended by decree, including those relating to the National Assembly, which was disbanded in 1975. In practice, there are few judicial checks on the authorities. The Constitution confirms the Amir as hereditary ruler.

Bahrain's leadership seeks to foster the open social and commercial environment needed to attract international business, while protecting the ruling family's preeminence, preventing potential sectarian violence, and thwarting externally inspired subversion. Bahrainis are divided between Shi'a and Sunni Muslim religious communities. Precise figures are not available, but estimates are that over two-thirds of the population is Shi'a. The ruling family is Sunni, and the Sunni community generally tends to be more wealthy and influential than the Shi'a, although there are conspicuous exceptions. While extreme poverty is rare, and the Government makes great efforts to assure full employment, the Shi'a are disadvantaged as a group, a situation which adds to the potential for externally inspired subversion. Some of the more militant Shi'a have been drawn into two clandestine political groups with links to Iran. Political activity remains strictly controlled.

There was little change in the human rights situation in 1985. There were, however, a number of arrests for political activities. The Islamic Enlightenment Society, a Shi'a group, was banned in 1984, and the trial in December 1984 and sentencing of its leaders closed what had been an avenue for Shi'a political and religious expression. In January, worker representatives to joint worker/management committees were elected, but they have limited scope for representation of worker interests, and cannot be considered trade unions in the full sense.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known instances of political killing in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of permanent disappearance at the hands of the security forces. Some persons detained by the security forces for investigation of suspected illegal political activity have not been accounted for until some time later.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is evidence that persons suspected of security offenses are sometimes physically abused during arrest and interrogation. It is not known what happens during detention in security prisons (where questioning may continue after sentencing) since visits by nongovernment persons are not allowed. Medical examinations by nonprison doctors have also been denied. There is no evidence of a systematic policy of physical mistreatment of criminal offenders.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Political activity is severely controlled by the security forces, and individuals are sometimes detained on suspicion of antiregime political activity. Periods of incommunicado detention can be lengthy, but relatives are usually able to find out if and where the detainee is being held. Activities of a political nature which can bring arrest include suspected membership in "subversive organizations" or expressions of antiregime opinion in a public setting. Examples of acts that could lead to arrest or questioning include painting antiregime slogans on the walls, joining antiregime demonstrations, possessing or circulating antiregime writings, or harboring persons committing such acts. Reliable estimates indicate that between 50 and 100 persons are now being held for antiregime political activity, including 19 who were arrested in connection with the banning in 1984 of the Islamic Enlightenment Society.

The Government in recent years has expelled Bahraini residents of Iranian origin, some of whom were from families that had lived in Bahrain for generations. It is believed such expulsions numbered under 25 Bahrainis in 1985.

The use of any form of forced or compulsory labor is prohibited.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

A person arrested may be tried in either a civil court or the security court. Civil trials provide procedural guarantees, including open trial, the right to counsel (including legal aid for indigents), and the right of appeal. Security cases, however, are tried directly by the Supreme Court of Appeal sitting as the Security Court. Trials are held in camera, there is no right of habeas corpus, and the court is exempted from adhering to the procedural guarantees of the penal code. Sentences imposed by the security court can, at the discretion of that court, be referred to the Amir for clemency, a procedure not customarily allowed in civil court cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

The Interior Ministry can authorize entry of private premises and places of employment in security cases without reference to judicial authorities. Telephone calls are subject to monitoring, and the police sometimes open mail. Police informer networks exist.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Bahrainis are not free to challenge the legitimacy of the regime in speech or in writing, but criticism of government policies and programs in such areas as municipal services and education is tolerated and commonly seen in the press.

BAHRAIN

The Information Ministry exercises wide powers over the local media and the press generally follows official policy closely. In the past, minor deviations have brought closure of the offending newspapers but there have been no closures since 1980, primarily because editors fully understand the rules and abide by them. In 1985 there was one expulsion of a foreign journalist, the AP-Dow Jones correspondent. The British newspaper Financial Times was banned for several weeks as a result of articles that displeased the Government. Many other foreign publications continue to be sold without being subject to censorship.

All radio and television stations are state-owned, although newspapers are privately owned. The editor of the largest paper is a former Information Ministry official, and his publication is regarded as semiofficial.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public political demonstrations are prohibited in Bahrain.

While the Constitution recognizes the right of workers to organize, trade unions are illegal. However, the Government has encouraged the formation of elected workers' committees in 12 major companies. Worker representatives are empowered to discuss wages and working conditions with management, but not to engage in collective bargaining, and there is no right to strike. Ten percent of the work force is now represented by these committees, which in turn choose members of a national committee. This body represents Bahrain in international labor organizations. Expatriate workers, about 60 percent of the work force, are effectively denied even these limited trade union rights.

A number of professional organizations exist, including groups of lawyers, physicians, engineers, and businessmen. There are also a number of social and sports clubs that traditionally have been significant for political discussion. These organizations are generally small and limited in scope and the Government monitors their activities closely.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although there are notable exceptions, membership in the Sunni sect tends to confer a more favored status on Bahraini nationals. Sunnis are given preference for employment in the security services, the police, and the army. Shi'a religious assemblies are subject to government control and monitoring, but there is no interference with Shi'a worship as such. The leaders of the Islamic Enlightenment Society, a Shi'a group with about 1,500 members, were arrested, tried, and sentenced in December 1984 for periods ranging from 5 to 7 years on charges of antiregime activity. Public religious events, particularly marches by members of the Shi'a community, are closely watched by the police to prevent their becoming antiregime demonstrations.

The population is overwhelmingly Muslim and Islam is the state religion, but several Christian denominations maintain places of worship and enjoy considerable freedom to practice their religion. Christian publications are readily available in book stores, but proselytizing is not permitted.

BAHRAIN

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Bahrainis are free to move within the country. There are restrictions on the number of Bahrainis permitted to make pilgrimages to Shi'a holy sites in Iran. Refugees are not repatriated to countries they have fled, but are obliged to depart Bahrain immediately. Passports can be denied on political grounds, but there were few instances of this in 1985. Some persons living abroad and suspected of political offenses upon return to Bahrain may face imprisonment by security courts without public trial.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: the Right of Citizens to Change Their Government.

Bahrain is ruled by the Al Khalifa family, headed by the Amir. There are no elections for government positions. The average Bahraini is able to influence government decisions only by means of informal contact with senior officials and by attending the Amir's public audiences. No political parties are permitted.

There are two clandestine political groups with ties to Iran which attract younger militant Shi'a: the Islamic Front for the Liberation of Bahrain, the group responsible for a 1981 coup attempt, and the Islamic Call party. Both advocate overthrow of the Government and the establishment of an Independent Islamic Republic. There are also two underground leftist groups, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Bahrain and the National Front for the Liberation of Bahrain, which have ties with revolutionary Arab regimes in the area and some Soviet support. The groups also call for violent revolution and probably have several hundred members each.

Bahrain has not been the subject of resolutions or investigations by official international human rights organizations. No private human rights group is known to have visited Bahrain in 1985. The last indication of the Government's attitude toward such investigations was in 1982, when Amnesty International sent a team to observe the trial of those accused of plotting the violent overthrow of the regime. The team was able to meet with government officials and defense counsel, but was not allowed to attend the closed trial. There are no nongovernmental organizations established to protect individual liberties.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International expressed concern about the detention of political prisoners as well as allegations of torture and ill-treatment of political detainees. Freedom House rated Bahrain "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Bahrain's population is 427,000, of which about 32 percent is non-Bahraini. The population growth rate for the native population is 3.5 percent. According to the World Bank, per capita gross national product was estimated to be $10,510 in 1983 but distribution is unequal.

There is no significant domestic taxation. Although statistical data are not available, it is generally recognized that there is some poverty at the village level and among some foreign temporary workers. The Government, faced with declining oil revenues, receives financial assistance from Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the United Arab Emirates. From the 1984-85 budget, 10 percent was allocated to education, 6 percent to health, 10 percent to housing, and 35 percent to social services.

The right to private property is protected. While foreigners other than citizens of Gulf Cooperation Council countries are not normally permitted to own real estate in Bahrain, their rights to possess other personal property are protected under law.

The Government continues to emphasize Bahrainization of most sectors of the economy, but currently both menial and high-skilled positions tend to be held by expatriates. The Government plans to train 10,000 Bahrainis in the present decade in order to replace foreign workers holding skilled jobs, but this effort is undermined by employers who prefer foreign workers who can be paid less and are more docile than Bahrainis.

Life expectancy is about 69 years, and the infant mortality rate is 34 per 1,000 live births. Food and safe drinking water are available in adequate supply to the entire population, and an ongoing sewerage project promises to improve public sanitation. The prices of basic food items are subsidized by the Government. Approximately 73 percent of Bahrainis between the ages of 4 and 19 attend primary or secondary schools; 48 percent are female. The adult illiteracy rate is estimated at 36 percent. The Government has begun a campaign to eradicate illiteracy.

Free public health care is available to all residents. Free education and subsidized housing are available only to Bahrainis. The Government's social insurance plans and protection against unfair labor practices primarily benefit Bahrainis.

The minimum age for employment in Bahrain is 14 years. Juveniles between the ages of 14 and 16 receive special protection under the labor laws. They may not be employed in hazardous conditions or at night and may not work over 6 hours a day or on a piecework basis.

Bahrain's labor law provides for acceptable conditions of work for all adult workers. In practice, however, expatriate workers, who account for about 60 percent of Bahrain's total work force, are seriously disadvantaged by the requirement that all foreign workers must be sponsored in order to work. Under this system, sponsors can cancel the residence permit of any person under their sponsorship and blacklist individuals so that they cannot obtain entry or residence visas from another sponsor. Such power contains the inherent potential for exploitation, and foreign workers are often unwilling to report abuses for fear of enforced repatriation. Bahrain's labor law does not recognize the concept of equal pay for equal work. Asian workers are often paid less than Bahraini or Western expatriates with the same qualifications, and women are generally paid less than men.

BAHRAIN

Many legal rights of concern to women are subject to Islamic law. Women have rights to their own property, but daughters receive less inheritance than sons, and widows must share their husband's estate with their own children. Although a wife may divorce, she must specify grounds. Women must obtain the permission of the male head of the household in order to obtain a passport. Nevertheless, with the development of the Bahrain economy, women have increasingly taken on job roles previously reserved for men. Women now constitute over 12 percent of all Bahraini workers. The Government has encouraged the trend toward equality, has enacted special laws to encourage female entry into the work force, and is itself a leading employer of women. Most of these positions are clerical, but a small number of senior positions are held by women. Labor law grants women 60 days paid maternity leave and nursing periods during the working day. The status of women is a continuing subject of debate. Many women voluntarily adopt socially conservative roles under the influence of traditionalist interpretations of Islam.

BANGLADESH

Bangladesh is governed by a Martial Law Administration (MLA) headed by President H.M. Ershad. Ershad, a General in the army who also holds the posts of Chief of Army Staff and Chief Martial Law Administrator, took power through a bloodless coup d'etat in March 1982 and became President in December 1983. In the coup, the military suspended the Constitution, dissolved the Parliament, and dismissed an ineffective, if popularly elected President. Martial law regulations give powers to General Ershad and to a three-level structure of martial law courts which are beyond judicial challenge in civil courts.

In the exercise of these powers, the Martial Law Administration has generally been more restrained than its initial verbal assertion of unchecked powers would imply. As the military Government has become less preoccupied with eradicating corruption and more concerned with the normal chores of governing, encouraging economic development, implementing administrative decentralization and reform, and attracting civilian political support, the actual use of heavy-handed martial law measures has declined; abuse of individual rights by the security forces overall has been minimal. The regime is committed to holding elections and restoring constitutional government.

Bangladesh is one the poorest and most densely populated agricultural countries in the world. Since an estimated 70 percent of Bangladeshis subsist below an absolute poverty level, the MLA's avowed priority is economic development. Its key programs aim at increased agricultural yields, reduced population growth, administrative decentralization, and private sector development. An important goal in implementing its policies is the eradication of corruption and inefficiency. However, reports persist of widespread corruption within the MLA itself.

The gradual liberalizing trend of 1984 continued into the early months of 1985 as the regime sought the cooperation of the major opposition parties in its plans to hold national elections. Negotiations between the Government and the parties had broken down three times during the course of the previous year, each time on the issue of the type of government which would be in place while elections are held; the parties have insisted that the MLA step aside to permit a "neutral" government to hold elections; the regime insists that martial law--suitably liberalized--be maintained until the elected government is available to take control. Following the third breakdown in negotiations, and to forestall threatened violent protests, the regime reimposed a harsher version of martial law than had been in force for the previous year. All political activity was banned from March 1 to October 1, martial law courts were reestablished, writs against the Government prohibited, censorship tightened, and--from March to July--the university closed.

In a new effort to begin the process again of liberalizing the political system preparatory to elections, the Government relaxed many of these measures again on October 1, permitting the resumption of political activity so long as it was "indoor" (no mass meetings, processions, etc.). Following the summit meeting of South Asian leaders in Dhaka in early December, there was a further announcement that the ban on political and trade union activity would be totally relaxed on January 1, 1986 amid renewed speculation that elections will be announced for the spring of 1986.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Killing for directly political motives is not common in Bangladesh, although violence between factions, gangs, and economic adversaries sometimes assumes political coloration. Several persons were killed during confrontations among students, opposition political elements, and government security forces in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no confirmed reports of disappearance resulting from official action.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Police treatment of common prisoners is often rough, up to and including abusive interrogations and beatings. Fatalities from such mistreatment are rare. Incidents of police brutality are reported in the press regularly and Amnesty International, in its 1985 report, expressed concern about allegations of torture. Punishment of police and jail officials involved in mistreating a prisoner takes place in cases where the victim or his friends and family can attract publicity, but most mistreatment of obscure victims goes unpunished. Organized, systematic government-instigated violence against individuals is not characteristic of Bangladesh.

Bangladesh's overcrowded jails reflect the country's extremely poor living conditions. In at least the larger prisons, the conditions under which prominent persons and political prisoners ("Class A" prisoners) are held are markedly better than those afforded ordinary criminals. In April 1983, a commission to study penal reform with an eventual goal of improving facilities and evolving from a penal to a correctional system was constituted. Due primarily to resource constraints, prospects for rapid implementation of prison reforms are slight.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In general, whenever participation in demonstrations or other political activity has prompted the MLA summarily to arrest or detain individuals, authorities have sought to notify families expeditiously of the detained and arrested individuals' whereabouts. Such demonstrators and activists are seldom held for long. Opposition leaders arrested during the ban on all political activity in 1985 were held variously from several weeks to several months without trial, and then released; the total number of detainees during this period may have reached more than 1,000. Two of the most prominent detainees were Begum Khaleda Zia, leader of the Bangladesh Nationalist Party, and Sheikh Hasina Wazed, leader of the Awami League. Observers estimate that the number of persons in custody for offenses other than common law ones does not exceed 100.

Martial law regulations authorize arrest on reasonable suspicion that the suspect has committed an offense and do not provide for habeas corpus. However, the suspension of habeas corpus is in practice only partial, and it is now possible in limited circumstances to bring writs against the Government. Offenses under these regulations include criticism of martial law, creation of panic, political activity, interference with the defense service, corruption, and smuggling.

The Special Powers Act of 1974 remains in effect. Under this law, persons may be detained without charge for 24 hours, held with the consent of a magistrate for 30 days, and held indefinitely with government approval.

During the past year, Bangladeshi legal and human rights organizations have exposed several cases of people arrested on minor charges who have remained in jail without trial, forgotten for 5 to 10 years. In the past, over half of the prison population was reportedly undergoing or awaiting trial.

There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

While several special martial law courts still exist, most civil and criminal cases are heard by civilian courts in public trials in which the right to counsel is respected. Processing cases can be both time-consuming and expensive, working a hardship on the vast majority of litigants and discouraging many from seeking redress through the courts. However, fair public trials do not appear to be intentionally denied.

Under new regulations which apply to civilian courts, if investigation has not been completed and charges have not been filed in an ordinary case within 90 days, the case must be dismissed and the prisoner freed. To accomplish the goal of speedy justice, these regulations also broaden the powers of the police and lower courts and limit appeal rights in minor cases. There are no indications that these enlarged powers and more summary procedures have been misused by the police or lower magistrates. It is not clear, however, how widely they have been implemented.

The Martial Law Administration has undertaken the dispersal of magistrate courts to the newly established Upazilla (subdistrict) level of government, and administrative decentralization of the high court appellate judiciary benches which currently sit in six cities outside Dhaka.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Bangladesh authorities do not normally engage in arbitrary invasion of the home. For the civil court system, a judicial warrant is required before authorities enter a home, and courts require evidence of a reasonable basis of suspicion of involvement in a crime before issuing a warrant. Martial law regulations provide for entry and search of the home under the same conditions but extend these powers to both military and police authorities. MLA officials have been known to enter the homes of opposition leaders without warrants; individuals have been detained and premises searched. This practice was especially prevalent during the early days of the martial law crackdown from March 1 to October 1, 1985. Wiretaps are not widely employed, although they are believed to be used selectively. It is also believed that the authorities occasionally monitor the correspondence of selected individuals. The Government maintains civilian and military intelligence services which concern themselves, in part, with domestic events, and whose influence and capability, although not pervasive, may be growing.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government owns and operates all radio and television facilities and owns and controls one of the four English-language dailies, two vernacular dailies, and one weekly. Most of the many Bengali-language periodicals and newspapers are privately owned. A number of nongovernmental newspapers are supported by political parties and reflect various political views. Major papers carry a balance of news from the Government and the opposition. The Bangladesh news media avoid explicit criticism of the Government on topics perceived as particularly sensitive. The Government has detained and tried journalists for writing articles critical of martial law (an offense under martial law regulations), but all such persons eventually have been released.

The Government exercises authority to ban foreign and domestic publications. A lengthy ban on the Bengali-language newspaper Dainik Desh was lifted in May 1985 after its owner joined a political party faction aligned with the MLA. In September 1985, Jai Din, a weekly of political analysis and commentary opposed to the MLA, was banned. Jai Din joins two other publications, Ittehad (banned in October 1984) and Jooi Jatra (banned in August 1984), that are still prohibited from publishing.

On March 1, 1985, when it banned all political activity, the Government also closed all the universities. The universities were reopened in July. In September 1985, repeated clashes between progovernment and antigovernment students at Dhaka University prompted the Vice Chancellor to request police intervention. Eighty-nine nonresident students and outsiders were arrested. Periodic violent clashes between rival student groups are common.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The original martial law regulations prohibited any activity by a political party, any meeting of a political nature, and any gathering of over 100 people with the exception of cultural, literary, or religious events. The Government relaxed this ban in 1983 by authorizing indoor political gatherings. It later lifted the remaining restrictions and allowed free political activity, which culminated in a series of general strikes and demonstrations in the fall of 1984.

In 1985 this pattern repeated itself. On March 1 all political activities were again banned in connection with the presidential referendum and Upazilla elections. The Government's justification was that the voters should decide the issue in a calm atmosphere free of agitation and disruption. The ban on political activity was progressively relaxed throughout the summer of 1985. The opposition parties began to hold indoor meetings, and reports of the meetings appeared in the press.

The ban on political activity was officially loosened to allow "indoor politics" again beginning October 1, and further loosened to allow full political activity as of January 1, 1986. Elections will possibly be held in the spring of 1986.

Workers in Bangladesh normally enjoy the right to associate freely, to organize, and to bargain collectively. A ban on trade union activity instituted in March 1985 was lifted on January 1, 1986. Because of a low level of industrialization, labor unions represent no more than five percent of the work force. Although only a small portion of the work force is unionized, unions are powerful and important in certain key sectors--jute, tea, the railroad, and the national airline. Unions are heavily involved in politics; of 17 trade union federations, only 1 claims no political affiliation. Most unions are urban-based and serve as fronts for political parties. These unions participate actively in the general strikes and rallies mounted by the country's political parties. Bangladesh has a progressive labor law, but it is often ignored by both management and labor. Unions need no prior permission from the Government to form; however, the Government does supervise union elections, which gives it the power to influence those elections should it choose to do so.

Unions are free to draw up their own constitutions and rules, elect their representatives, and formulate their programs. There are no restrictions on joining confederations and affiliating with international organizations. Individuals do need government clearance to travel to international labor conferences and attend programs sponsored by foreign labor institutions; such clearances are routinely granted. Under Bangladesh's labor law the Government can suspend or dissolve individual unions; in 1983 the National Registrar of Trade Unions withdrew recognition from a number of trade unions for noncompliance with technical provisions of the labor law. In theory, Bangladeshi workers have participatory rights in all union business; in practice, that right is often violated by both employers and union leaders. In theory, unions and their members are fully protected against antiunion discrimination; in practice, employers regularly fire workers for union activities and harass union activists and leaders. Antiunion discrimination is especially prevalent in the garment industry, most of whose workers are young women. Employers, through connections in the Government and the military, often have any legal actions that unions might file against them forgotten or quashed. Reportedly, this is especially true in the garment industry where many factories are owned by active and retired army officers.

A coalition of 14 trade union federations (SKOP) led a 48-hour general strike in December 1984 with the support of the major political parties after the Government failed to implement fully an agreement on wages and other benefits reached by the SKOP in May 1984. Talks between SKOP and the Government were concluded on February 18, 1985, with agreement on amendments to the Industrial Relations Ordinance and the Employment of Labor Act. On March 1, 1985, the Government banned all trade union and political activities. A number of trade union leaders who actively supported political parties were arrested; nearly all were released by year's end. On January 1, 1986 political parties as well as trade unions were again permitted a full range of activity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Bangladesh is predominantly Islamic. Conversion from one religion to another is permitted. Proselytizing by Bangladeshi citizens is allowed under Article 41 of the Constitution, subject to law, public order, and morality. Proselytization is largely directed toward minority groups such as Hindus and tribals. There is strong social resistance against efforts to convert persons from the majority Muslim religion. Certain Islamic organizations continue to voice concern over Christian missionary activities and the conversion of Muslims to Christianity. All Bangladesh governments have pledged equality of treatment and freedom of worship to Hindu, Buddhist, and Christian minorities, who combined constitute approximately 17 percent of the population. Although this policy is substantially respected, the numerical predominance of Muslims and South Asia's history of communal violence and discrimination contribute to minority concern.

Members of minority religious groups are disadvantaged in practice although not by law in their access to government positions and political office. Members of some minorities, principally Hindus, have lost or had serious difficulty retaining their properties as a result of prejudicial administration of vested property laws which provide that property belonging to persons who left Bangladesh between 1965 and 1971 shall be managed by the Government. The Government is authorized to use and to sell this property, which it has sometimes done to the disadvantage of former owners. In October 1983, the Government announced the establishment of three religious welfare trusts for the Hindu, Buddhist, and Christian communities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Bangladesh citizens are free to move within the country, but there are designated "protected areas" near the borders and certain other locations from which all nonresidents may be banned. Bangladeshis are generally free to visit or emigrate abroad, subject to foreign exchange controls. In some instances, persons deemed to be security risks have not been allowed to travel abroad. Civil servants must obtain "no-objection certificates" from the ministry in which they are employed before traveling abroad, and citizens going overseas to work must register with the ministry responsible for manpower export. The right of repatriation is observed.

Although the Government has no stated policy on refugee and asylum matters, in 1979 it provided temporary asylum to sizable groups of Arakanese Muslim refugees from Burma.

Approximately 250,000 non-Bengali Muslim Biharis or "stranded Pakistanis" remain in Bangladesh, pending resettlement in Pakistan. After independence in 1971, these non-Bengalis opted for Pakistani citizenship. Pakistan has agreed to take them back provided financing for resettlement costs, estimated at $500 million, is made available from outside sources. A Saudi-based Islamic social organization is actively seeking to raise the money. Camp dwellers may seek employment and conduct other activities, but face disadvantages as noncitizens. Some Biharis have lost property as a result of laws confiscating Pakistani holdings, but those Biharis who chose to become Bangladeshi citizens in 1971 are entitled to full rights of citizenship.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The average Bangladeshi citizen has little opportunity to exercise the right to self-government. Such elections as are held are held at the pleasure of the Government, not by the authority of a constitution. In those elections the Government determines the issues and the terms under which political parties can participate.

Throughout the year, the Government displayed a continuing commitment to hold elections and restore constitutional government. Twice the government has scheduled national elections--in December 1984 and April 1985--and twice the main opposition political alliances refused to participate, fearing that the Government would use martial law powers to influence the process. Following the ban on all political activity, the Government held a referendum on March 21 which endorsed the Government's policies and permitted President Ershad to remain in power until national elections are carried out. The opposition boycotted the presidential referendum and carried out an unsuccessful campaign of violence and intimidation to disrupt the polling. Although the referendum was a victory for the President, the turnout was far lower than that claimed by the Government. On May 16 and 20, the Government held nonparty elections at the local level for Upazilla (subdistrict) chairmen, postponed the previous year because of an opposition boycott. The opposition boycotted again, but failed, despite a second campaign of violence, to prevent nomination and polling. The election was marked by reports of substantial vote tampering, but much of this appears to have been done by individual candidates, and not by the Government. Progovernment candidates won a majority of the seats. President Ershad has indicated that national elections may be held in the spring of 1986.

After independence in 1972, and again between 1976 and 1982, members of Bangladesh's elite endeavored to establish a democratic form of government by framing a constitution and experimenting with parliamentary and presidential systems. Nonetheless, Bangladesh has spent 8 of its 14 years since independence under martial law, both contributing to and reflecting the weakness of its political institutions, the staggering magnitude of its economic problems, and a belief among the military that it is the only national institution able to bear responsibility for national affairs.

Several international nongovernmental human rights organizations, including Amnesty International, the International League for Human Rights, and the International Commission of Jurists, are represented in Bangladesh. The Government has not obstructed independent outside investigations of alleged human rights violations.

BANGLADESH

In its 1985 report, Amnesty International noted that several hundred political prisoners were released during 1984 but that government opponents engaged in nonviolent protests continued to face arrest and detention, and it expressed concern at reports of the torture of criminal suspects in police custody, the ill-treatment of detained students, and extrajudicial executions by law enforcement personnel in the Chittagong Hill Tracts. Freedom House rates Bangladesh "partly free." Several Bangladeshi organizations and individual lawyers are active in defending human rights through publicity designed to inform people of their rights, the provision of legal aid to the poor, and challenges in the courts. The majority of cases brought to and handled by these organizations involve the rights of pretrial prisoners and the treatment of women.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In Bangladesh, efforts to induce economic growth confront serious obstacles. The 100 million people live in 55,000 square miles, making Bangladesh the most densely populated agrarian country in the world. The population growth rate is about 2.8 percent per year. Nearly half the population is under 14 years of age. With the exception of natural gas and fertile alluvial soil, the country lacks natural resources. Annual per capita income amounts to only about $130 per year. Funds for investment, as well as the transportation and communications infrastructure, are extremely limited. In fiscal year 1985 approximately 75 percent of the development budget came from foreign aid; this figure is projected to increase to as high as 84 percent in the fiscal year 1986.

Bangladesh's agricultural sector accounts for approximately 74 percent of employment. The share of agricultural production in the gross domestic product (GDP) has fluctuated from 47.1 to 45.7 percent over the last four years. The economy is highly susceptible to fluctuations in the world market, commodity prices, and especially the vagaries of nature. The low-lying land and dependence on monsoon rains, combined with extremely simple farming methods, mean that a tropical storm or a few weeks variation in rainfall patterns can change subsistence into famine in a particular locality. After near record floods in 1984, the country was hit by a tidal wave in 1985 that killed thousands and displaced hundreds of thousands. The difficulties presented by the nature of the land and climate are compounded by social factors. Approximately one-half of the rural households are effectively landless. The average farm size is approximately 3.5 acres, typically with several plots, widely separated from one another, constituting a single holding. Gains in food production have been offset in large part by population growth, and Bangladesh still has an annual food deficit.

Bangladesh's industrial and service sectors are small, employing approximately 10 percent of the labor force and contributing about 9 percent to GDP. While no accurate measurements of unemployment and underemployment exist, both are pervasive and are estimated as high as 40 percent nationally. Women are virtually absent from the cash work force, except in the export-oriented garment industry. Their wages lag behind those of men, even for the same work.

In addition to its large development program, which includes agricultural modernization, road building, rural electrification, and delivery of family planning and health services, the Government has instituted industrial and tax policies to strengthen the private sector in an effort to encourage the growth of productive industry. Despite government inducements, relatively few industries have located in rural areas because the basic infrastructure of transportation, communication, and electrification is inadequate. The poverty of Bangladesh is evident in the poor health and nutritional standards of the country. Life expectancy at birth is 50 years. The infant mortality rate is approximately 140 deaths per 1,000 live births. Only 35 percent of the population has access to safe water. On a per capita basis, nutritional intake indicates a downward trend over the last 15 years.

Literacy appears to be declining overall, and exhibits a marked disparity between males and females and between urban and rural dwellers. Despite the Government's commitment to expand primary, secondary, and technical schooling, broad-based modern education is far from a reality and rapid population growth is overwhelming those facilities which do exist. The technological level of capital and human assets is rudimentary, and the exodus of educated and trained persons, given the meager base, is substantial.

Bangladesh's labor law stipulates minimum ages for various types of employment; in industries where unions are strong these minimums are enforced, but the poverty of the country is such that children are regularly engaged in any line of work they can get, especially fieldwork. In general, regulations regarding minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health are not strictly enforced.

Underlying attitudes and social barriers circumscribing the participation of women in activities beyond the home are strongly entrenched and show few signs of weakening. For the approximately 86 percent of Bangladeshi women who live in rural areas, early marriage, high child-bearing rates, and long hours of household labor leave little opportunity for nonfamily interests or outside employment. No culturally acceptable alternative to marriage exists for women (or men), and childlessness is viewed as a personal catastrophe. Even in urban areas and among the affluent, the traditional social system makes women economically dependent on their husbands or other male relatives.

By custom and by Islamic tradition, women occupy a subordinate place and receive unequal treatment before the law on a widespread basis. The ability of a family to seclude its women is a symbol of middle or high social status; poverty forces a grim equality of the workplace. The daily press testifies to a pattern of domestic violence (murder, rape, torture), breach of matrimonial contract, denial of inheritance rights, and desertion which victimizes women and which is particularly acute among the poor. The rate of suicide among women is reportedly almost three times higher than among men. In October 1983, the Government promulgated a stringent ordinance to deter such cruelties to women as murder, kidnapping, abduction, and trafficking in women. The ordinance brings together the various statutes applicable to women and stiffens the penalties for abuse. It provides the death penalty for those directly responsible for a "dowry killing" or for killing a woman in the course of a rape, although it does not address the abuse of a woman stopping short of murder or rape or taking place within the family or home. "Dowry killings" usually share a common theme: the bride's family has not made full payment of a supposedly promised dowry, so the husband or his family attacks and sometimes murders the bride.

A simmering guerrilla movement bred of social disruption, economic decline, and spiritual demoralization continued through 1985 among the approximately 400,000 tribal people who inhabit the Chittagong Hill Tracts, a geographically and socially atypical part of an otherwise homogeneous country. The predominantly Buddhist tribal population has been alienated by the Government's claim to land which the indigenous people regard as tribal property. Over the past decade, successive governments have settled close to 300,000 ethnic Bengalis in that territory, radically altering the ethnic balance in the area from 90 percent tribal in 1947 to 54 percent tribal in 1981. This population shift is continuing, although no longer officially encouraged. Sporadic clashes pitting police, army, and border patrol units against tribal insurgents continue. Although the number of deaths is believed to be low, no reliable statistics are available.

Conditions in the Chittagong Hill Tracts lend credence to charges of human rights abuses by the army and Bengali settlers. Contact between tribals and foreigners traveling in the area is actively discouraged by the Government. In an attempt to end the insurgency, the Government announced in October 1983 an amnesty for all guerrillas effective through February 1985. The program has since been extended. In May 1985, over 200 members of one of the guerrilla factions surrendered to government forces. Although the Government considers its new policy generous, the antigovernment tribal leadership continues to demand the preservation of the autonomous culture of the Chakmas and other tribes rather than integration into Bengali Islamic culture. In particular, the guerrillas continue to call for an end to Bengali settlement in the Chittagong Hill Tracts.

BHUTAN*

Bhutan has been ruled by the Wangchuck dynasty of hereditary monarchs since 1907. Isolated in the Himalayas between India and Tibet, the people of Bhutan have been able to escape domination by any external power since the 10th century. It was not until the reign of King Jigme Dorji Wangchuck (1952-72) that a Bhutanese leader tried to move the Kingdom out of its centuries of medieval seclusion toward a more representative political system and better integrated, more productive economy. Although he retained strong executive powers, he created several important institutions such as the National Assembly (1953), the Royal Advisory Council (1965), and the Council of Ministers (1968) to provide broader participation in the Government. Serfdom was abolished, land reform introduced, codification of laws begun, and the judiciary separated from the executive.

The present monarch, Jigme Singye Wangchuck, has continued Bhutan's social and political evolution, although progress has been slow due to serious limitations in Bhutan's administrative capacity and resources. Bhutan is the poorest country in South Asia and one of the most traditional and least developed countries in the world. The vast majority of the population is illiterate and rural, following traditional agricultural and pastoral pursuits in a largely barter economy.

The human rights situation in Bhutan is changing only very slowly. Most observers agree that it suffers few of the problems of disaffection and repression that afflict many Third World countries in the throes of rapid change.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is no evidence of cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment or treatment. Serious crimes are a rarity, although there has been a trend toward more criminal activity in recent years with the introduction of a large foreign labor force with no ties to Bhutanese society. Most crimes are punished by fines or imprisonment. Mutilation was outlawed in 1965, and capital punishment was retained only for treason.

*Bhutan and the U.S. do not maintain formal diplomatic relations, and U.S. officials rarely travel there. Information on Bhutanese practices in connection with human rights matters is, therefore, neither readily available nor complete.

BHUTAN

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no special or preventive detention, and arrests can be made only under legal authority. As far as is known, neither exile nor forced labor are employed as forms of punishment.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Bhutan has no written constitution or bill of rights. Criminal cases and a variety of civil matters are adjudicated under an 18th century legal code which has been revised in recent years. Familial questions are governed by the traditional religious norms of the two major groups in the country: Buddhist law governs the majority of Bhutanese, and Hindu law is applied in areas where individuals of Nepali ethnic origin are predominant.

Although the Kingdom's legal system does not provide for juries, the right to be represented by legal counsel, or due process in the Western sense, trials are generally expeditious and public. There is no prosecutor and no defense attorney because there are insufficient lawyers in the country to serve in these capacities. Judges, appointed by and accountable to the King, are responsible for all aspects of a case, including investigation, filing of charges, prosecution, and judgment of the defendant. Qualified observers report that the system conforms to the local population's concept of impartiality and justice.

In 1968-69, a separate judiciary was established which provides for local, district, and national courts with original and appellate jurisdiction. Final appeals may be made to the King.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There are no written guarantees of privacy in the Bhutanese system, but tradition has bolstered the concept. In practice, the Government does not intervene arbitrarily or unreasonably in the lives of the people.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

With a literacy rate around 5 percent, Bhutan's adult population is relatively unaffected by the print media. The only publications currently produced are a weekly and a monthly government journal and a weekly private newspaper. Indian and other foreign newspapers and publications are also distributed in Bhutan without apparent government control. There is a single national radio station, built a decade ago by the National Youth Association. Criticism of the King is permitted in the National Assembly.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

No written guarantees of these freedoms exist, but Bhutanese generally enjoy the freedom of peaceful assembly and association. There are no private voluntary social, communal, or economic associations, and no professional or trade organizations.

BHUTAN

Bhutan has no labor unions, and hence no collective bargaining, and no legislation addressing labor-related issues.

c. Freedom of Religion

Buddhism is the state religion of Bhutan. Not only does the Government directly subsidize monasteries and shrines, but the Buddhist monastic establishment enjoys statutory representation in the National Assembly and the Royal Advisory Council and an influential voice on public policy. Citizens of other faiths, who are mainly Hindus of Nepali origin, enjoy freedom of worship. Foreign missionaries are not permitted to proselytize in the Kingdom.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement within Bhutan for Bhutanese citizens and no bar on emigration or foreign travel. Permanent residence for Nepalis and Indians in Bhutan (except those in government service) is restricted to the southern hill region. A policy introduced in the 1950's, which prevented the exiled leaders of an outlawed Nepali Bhutanese political party from returning to the country, has been liberalized to allow them to return at their own request.

Bhutan traditionally has welcomed refugees and exiles from other countries in the region. Some 6,000 Tibetan refugees sought refuge in Bhutan after 1959, joining approximately 4,000 Tibetans already in the country. Because it perceived threats to national security resulting from the Tibetan refugees' lack of allegiance to Bhutan, the Government in 1979-1980 required that they either accept Bhutanese citizenship or face expulsion. When India and other countries initially refused to accept them, Bhutan's policy raised the possibility of forcible repatriation. However, the Government decided not to carry out its threat. Although most Tibetans in Bhutan have accepted Bhutanese citizenship, they have been assured by the Bhutanese Government that they will always be free to return to their homeland.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Bhutanese political system is a traditional monarchy, with sovereign and wide-ranging power vested in the King. In this highly elitist system, decisionmaking is very narrowly based--centered in the palace and involving only a small number of officials in the civil and religious establishments. Political parties do not exist and their formation is discouraged. Local administration is carried out by centrally appointed government officials. Villages, however, have the traditional right to elect by consensus their own headmen, who form the lowest rung of the administrative hierarchy.

The 150-member National Assembly is composed of 110 members elected by limited franchise (heads of family in Hindu areas, village headmen in Buddhist regions), 10 members representing the monastic establishment, and 30 high-level officials of the government administration. Its principal functions are to enact laws, approve senior appointments in the Government, and advise on all matters of national importance. Voting is by secret ballot and only a simple majority is needed for passage of a measure. Government officials may be interpellated by the body, and ministers can be forced to resign by a two-thirds vote of no-confidence. The King cannot formally veto legislation passed by the Assembly, but he can refer bills back to it for further consideration. The Assembly occasionally has rejected royal recommendations or delayed their implementation, but the King undoubtedly could persuade the Assembly to approve any legislation he considers essential or withdraw any proposed legislation he opposes.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international agency or group is known to have sought entry into Bhutan to investigate human rights conditions. Amnesty International does not report on Bhutan; Freedom House calls the country "partly free." No nongovernmental human rights groups are known to exist in Bhutan, nor do human rights appear to be a subject of domestic political debate.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

On its land area of about 18,000 square miles, Bhutan has a population of about 1,400,000 which is growing at a rate of 2 percent a year. By all standard indices Bhutan is one of the poorest, least developed countries of the world. Its per capita gross national product in 1982 was only $132. Given the low level of monetization of the economy, however, such statistics can be misleading. Bhutan enjoys a relatively favorable land/population ratio by South Asian standards. The traditional, essentially feudal landholding system has undergone great changes in the last few decades. Although the size of landholdings still varies considerably from family to family, and tenancy still exists, most families who rent land are also landholders in their own right. Most (except perhaps those in southern Bhutan) have about as much land at their disposal as they can cultivate, using traditional production. In 1970 the Government abolished traditional payments in kind by the populace to the monasteries and set land taxes in cash low enough not to burden even small landholders.

Within the limits set by the traditional character of Bhutanese society, the influence of the Buddhist clergy, and the underdevelopment of the Bhutanese economy, the monarchy has been promoting modernization. Under a series of five-year development plans begun in 1961, Bhutan has improved its agriculture, internal transport and communications, hydroelectric power supply, education, and public health. The amount of money allocated to these development plans has grown exponentially as Bhutan has established assistance relationships with increasing numbers of foreign countries and international organizations. Life expectancy at birth has risen from 36 years in 1960 to over 44 years. The infant mortality rate is 122 per 1,000 live births. Programs have been launched to control malaria, tuberculosis, leprosy, and goiter.

Adult literacy stood at only 5 percent in 1970 and may not be much higher today. Mass education became an official objective of the Government as early as 1952, but progress has been slow due to deficiencies in basic infrastructure (a lack of trained teachers, for example) and limited public resources. Although primary education is free and enrollment quadrupled between 1960 and 1979, the ratio to the primary school-age population was still only 22 percent in 1983. A new education policy was introduced in 1975, with "self-sufficiency" in the supply of qualified personnel for key administrative and economic positions as one of its priority objectives. Recognizing that it will be decades before indigenous institutions of higher education attain the necessary quality, the Government plans to send a relatively small number of students abroad for advanced training. This strategy does not make it possible for every young Bhutanese who aspires to join the country's technically educated elite to receive a higher education, but it is consistent with the Government's determination to avoid the social disruptions caused by educating youth for jobs which do not exist. Although access to state scholarships for foreign education is still strongly influenced by family background, admission to the prestigious civil bureaucracy is now more based on merit than it has ever been before.

Bhutan has no minimum wage laws or other labor legislation governing its very small industrial labor force. The shortage of labor in Bhutan is such that the larger industrial establishments, all of which were established relatively recently, are organized along modern lines and incorporate a considerable amount of labor-saving technology. No industrial plant employs more than 60-70 workers, and most of these are guest workers from Nepal. Apart from the few large plants, the entire industrial sector of Bhutan consists of home-based handicrafts and some 60 privately owned small or medium-scale factories producing consumer goods. Children are not employed in industrial labor.

There are few social and economic indicators available on the status of women. Boys tend to outnumber girls by about two to one in primary schools, but no distinction is made between the status of men and women in Bhutanese law. As compared with some of its neighbors, Bhutan has not developed a rigid caste system or customs which sequester or disenfranchise women. Official Bhutanese policy is to discourage the observance of caste distinctions among the Hindu population.

The potentially most divisive issue in Bhutan is how to accommodate the large (estimated at 20-30 percent) segment of the population of Nepali Hindu origin. The country's ethnic Tibetan majority has long been concerned about being overwhelmed by immigrants from Nepal. In the past, the central Government responded to this concern by tightly limiting immigration and by restricting residence and employment of the Nepali population to the southern part of the country. The Government did not try to impose its official language on the minority but neither did it try to facilitate interaction between the two ethnic communities. More recently, however, Thimpu's policy toward the Nepali minority has been liberalized. Inter-marriage between the communities is officially encouraged, southerners are allowed to own property and establish businesses in the north, and vice-versa. Nepali Bhutanese also are being absorbed into the administration at a much higher rate than in the past. More liberal policies with respect to land ownership and taxation in southern Bhutan have also been introduced, modifying the discriminatory system which sometimes led Nepali Bhutanese to describe themselves as second-class citizens.

EGYPT

Egypt is a republic in which the President and his party, the National Democratic Party (NDP), are the major political forces. The NDP commands a large majority in Parliament, but opposition parties play an important role. The Cabinet is headed by a Prime Minister responsible to the President. The parliamentary institutions are the People's Assembly and the Shura (consultative) Council.

Vice President under Sadat, Hosni Mubarak was elected President in 1981, following Sadat's assassination. The NDP retained its majority in the hard-fought People's Assembly elections in May 1984. One of the five opposition parties also won seats; another, although failing to qualify at the polls, was subsequently awarded several seats through discretionary presidential appointment. The governmental and legal systems are based on Egypt's Muslim and Arab heritage, as well as the experience of the 1952 revolution. Western influences are also present, reflected in the country's Napoleonic legal code.

The state of emergency proclaimed after Sadat's assassination has been maintained through extensions decreed by President Mubarak, with the approval of the People's Assembly. Under it, the President and designated officials can suspend certain constitutional and legal safeguards normally associated with the protection of civil and political liberties. The Government has used its emergency powers sparingly, but evidence suggests that they were invoked in July 1985 to detain radical Islamic figures.

The Government has permitted Islamic militants to pursue their cause through such legitimate channels as the People's Assembly, the judiciary, and the press. Proponents of the full implementation of Islamic law, for example, aired their views extensively in the press and, to some extent, in an assembly debate last May. Muslim fundamentalists have also gone to court on various occasions over Islamic-law issues. At the same time, the authorities have cracked down on activities seen as threatening public order and security. In June, the Government banned Sheikh Hafez Salaama's proposed "green march" in support of Islamic law and subsequently took over mosques suspected of being centers of radical, antigovernment activity.

The Government has given priority to economic development and liberalization while continuing its policy of trying to safeguard living standards in the face of worldwide inflationary pressures. The primary vehicle for this policy has been a massive subsidy system that, in fiscal year 1984/85, cost about $2.4 billion--11 percent of total government expenditures.

Egypt's human rights record in 1985 reflected the steady progress toward political liberalization achieved under Mubarak's leadership, although government restrictions on certain political activities and the expression of dissent remained. Some members of the Christian minority are concerned over the potential threat to their rights posed by resurgent Islamic forces, but the Government has generally demonstrated its commitment to protecting minority rights. Coptic Pope Shenouda III has performed his papal functions without official interference following the President's decree on January 1, 1985 restoring his full papal authority. However, there were reports that legal action continued against 39 members of the Baha'i faith who had been detained in February and subsequently released. The action against them apparently stemmed from some Muslims' conviction that the Baha'is are apostates of Islam.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

With the exception of one terrorist assassination, there were no political killings in 1985. In August an Israeli diplomat was killed in Cairo. An unknown group calling itself "Egypt's Revolution" claimed responsibility, as it had for an earlier, unsuccessful assassination attempt in 1984 against another Israeli diplomat. As of January 1986, the case remained unsolved, but the investigation was continuing. "Egypt's Revolution" also claimed credit for the hijacking to Malta of an Egypt Air jet in November which resulted in the death of over 60 passengers.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment are forbidden by the Constitution and by law. Persons claiming to have been tortured have redress in the courts, which have awarded financial compensation to various torture victims. Information gained through torture is not admissible in court. The law provides that police and security officials convicted of torture are subject to imprisonment and lesser sanctions, but known cases of officials being penalized are rare. On occasion, detainees and prisoners have claimed they were tortured and have appealed for redress to the courts or to the public prosecutor. These appeals, which generally lead to investigations by legal and medical authorities, sometimes end with the Government's denial of the alleged torture. More often, the Government fails to reveal the findings of investigations.

In November 1984 the public prosecutor initiated a major investigation of torture incidents revealed by the Supreme State Security Court in the Al-Jihad case that ended in September 1983. The court had cited torture as a factor in its decision to acquit 190 out of 300 Al-Jihad defendants and reduce prison sentences for others. According to the opposition press, former Interior ministers and still active senior police officers were among the numerous security officials suspected of involvement in the torture. The results of the investigation had not been announced by year's end.

Torture allegations continue to surface periodically in the opposition press. In March, for example, the Socialist Labor Party's publication, Ash-Shaab, mentioned a hunger strike by 17 students protesting police beatings while in detention for questioning, and there were several other such reports during the year. In August riots broke out in the Delta town of Fawa, sparked by the death of a local resident while in police custody. The authorities attributed the death to natural causes, while the opposition press accused police officers of beating the detainee to death. In October, the New Wafd Party's weekly, Al-Wafd, reported that two policemen were being held for questioning in connection with the incident.

In its 1985 worldwide survey, Amnesty International noted that it had not received any substantiated reports of torture in 1984. In its separate report "Torture in Egypt 1981-1983," published in August 1985, Amnesty International reviewed medical authorities' forensic records on torture victims for that period and found a "disturbing and consistent pattern of torture or ill-treatment of political detainees," including Islamic militants linked to the Al-Jihad organization, and some left-wing elements. The report mentioned Cairo's Citadel prison as a reputed site of torture activities. This prison was subsequently closed.

During the year there were several reports in the opposition press of hunger strikes by convicted Al-Jihad members in protest over mistreatment by prison authorities. There was also evidence that prison guards beat inmates and struck them with rifle butts to discipline them. Prisons vary as to living conditions and treatment; some facilities appear to be overcrowded and lacking adequate medical and sanitary facilities. Others, however, have better living conditions and programs for inmates' recreation and vocational training.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest, detention, and exile are forbidden by law. As a rule, arrests follow investigations, and arrested persons are charged with violations of specific laws. With some exceptions, preventive detention is not practiced. Arrested persons have the right to a judicial determination of the legality of detention and there is a system of bail. The law states that a detained suspect must be brought before a magistrate and formally charged within 48 hours of his arrest or else be released. By and large, there is careful observance of constitutional and legal safeguards of due process in the arrest and pretrial custody stages. Arrests occur openly and with warrants, and the accused are brought before an independent judiciary. The Government does not appear to practice incommunicado detention.

Exceptions to these arrest and detention procedures exist under the state of emergency provisions. The Constitution and the Emergency Law of 1958, as amended, empower the President, when security or public order are in peril, to invoke emergency powers authorizing the arrest and detention of persons suspected of being dangerous to state security, irrespective of provisions of the penal code. Under the emergency law a person may be held without charge for renewable 30-day periods, up to 6 months. After each 30-day interval, the detainee is allowed to petition the state security courts for release. If the court approves the petition, the President may exercise a one-time veto over the decision, keeping the detainee in custody for another 30 days. In the past few years, the emergency powers of arrest and detention have been circumscribed, and detainees have been accorded greater rights of appeal, as well as prompt redress, including judicial review, against improper treatment.

By the beginning of 1985 all those arrested under the emergency law in 1981 had been released, except for the 100 or so Islamic extremists serving prison sentences handed down in the Al-Jihad trial that ended in September 1984. According to press reports, the emergency law was invoked occasionally in 1985 against members of banned leftist organizations and suspected Islamic extremists, including some former Al-Jihad defendants. In July, the Government arrested several groups of radical Islamic activists totaling 46 persons, among them Sheikh Hafez Salaama and former Al-Jihad defendant Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman. By mid-August most detainees had been released. Subsequently, the Middle East News Agency (MENA) reported the Supreme State Security Court's decision to free Abdel Rahman and 12 other persons, apparently the last of the July detainees still under arrest. It remains unclear whether formal charges were filed against the 46 detainees; the authorities spoke of "investigating" them for various offenses but have not stated whether arraignment and trial proceedings were carried out. The number of detainees currently being held under the emergency law is probably 20 to 30, based on press reports and other sources.

There have been no reports of the use of forced labor, which is legally prohibited.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Egyptian law provides for public trial and equal treatment before the law, and these legal safeguards appear to be observed. Persons accused of espionage, plotting to overthrow the State or similar crimes, however, are tried in state security courts, sometimes in closed session. These courts handled the al-Jihad trials, at which all defendants were present and represented by lawyers actively defending them. Civilians arrested for certain crimes may be tried in military tribunals as well as state security courts. A military tribunal conducted the trial of civilian Soliman Khatr, the border policeman charged with the shooting deaths of seven Israeli tourists and wounding two others in the Sinai in October. The jurisdiction of the military court was challenged by the defense, but an administrative court ruled that the emergency law allowed the President to give jurisdiction to the military courts. On December 28, Khatr, who was represented by civilian lawyers, was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment at hard labor. On January 7, 1986, Khatr was found hanged in his prison hospital room, an apparent suicide.

There are no public statistics on the number of persons serving prison sentences (as opposed to detainees on trial or awaiting prosecution) for acts of violent protest or membership in proscribed organizations espousing terrorism or the violent overthrow of the State. However, based on the convictions in Al-Jihad proceedings plus reports of trials in the opposition press, their number may reach 150 to 200. The conviction and sentencing of "prisoners of conscience" or other nonviolent dissenters appear to occur rarely, if at all. The emergency law provides ample authority to detain people believed to be planning violent acts against the Government.

The judiciary enjoys an unprecedented degree of independence. In 1984, the Government sponsored legislation that extended judicial immunity to members of the office responsible for investigating and prosecuting police charges against suspects. The effect of this immunity is to protect such officials from police pressures during investigations. Also in 1984, the People's Assembly, at President Mubarak's initiative, reinstated the High Judicial Council, which Nasser had dissolved. The Council is empowered to override decisions by the Ministry of Justice regarding judicial appointments, promotions, and other personnel matters. In 1984 the law concerning the Council of State, a court system having jurisdiction over disputes between private citizens and government agencies, was amended to separate the Council from the Ministry of Justice and to establish safeguards against arbitrary dismissal of council members.

In 1985, the courts demonstrated their autonomy. In April, they ruled that it is illegal to dismiss an employee solely because of his political views; dismissal is warranted only if the employee has violated the law. In August, authorities released Sheikh Hafez Salaama from detention after the state security courts ordered them to do so; the Government chose not to challenge the court's action.

Two judicial institutions criticized by the opposition and others as superfluous and potentially dangerous to the judicial system are the Court of Ethics and its investigating agency, the Office of the Socialist Public Prosecutor. Created in 1980, the Court is charged with trying offenders of "socialist values." In 1985 the Court focused primarily on cases of corruption and illegal business activities, in contrast to its use by Sadat to prosecute opponents of the Government. The Office of the Socialist Public Prosecutor functions as investigator and prosecutor for the Court of Ethics. Its other tasks include approving candidates for elective positions in the trade union movement and performing security checks on appointees to senior government positions.

Article 2 of the Constitution states that Islamic jurisprudence is the principal source of law. However, the literal application of Islamic law is limited to the so-called Family Status Courts, which have jurisdiction over such matters as divorce and inheritance for Muslims. In addition to Islamic law, these courts apply the codes of other religions in family matters if the parties are non-Muslim. In May 1985, the People's Assembly debated proposals for the implementation of the Shari'a (Islamic law). By a large majority, the Assembly voted to conduct a law-by-law review of all statutes in order to change those conflicting with Islamic law. The review process is expected to require years to complete.

The judiciary also issued an important decision in May in the area of Islamic law. The preeminent Islamic institution, Al-Azhar University, had challenged civil code statutes permitting commercial interest payments, arguing that interest constitutes usury under Islamic law and should be prohibited under Article 2 of the Constitution. In ruling against Al-Azhar, the High Constitutional Court stated that Article 2 cannot be applied retroactively, thereby apparently establishing the principle that the constitutional provision for the primacy of Islamic jurisprudence does not supersede the body of law predating the Constitution and still in effect.

EGYPT

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Freedom from arbitrary interference by the State or by political organizations in private life is guaranteed by the Constitution. The Government does not appear to interfere, except where actual crimes are involved or where the State believes there is evidence that persons may be engaging in potentially violent political activity. Except as allowed by the emergency law, police must obtain a warrant from the State Security Prosecutor before undertaking arrests, searches, or seizures. The warrant need not specify the material being sought in a search, and the material seized can be presented as evidence during trials. On occasion, the courts have dismissed cases when they considered that warrants were issued without sufficient cause. Police officials who conduct searches without proper warrant are subject to criminal penalties, but there were no reports of officials being so penalized in 1985.

Monitoring of correspondence or telephones does not appear to take place without the legally required authorization beforehand from the State Security Prosecutor.

The emergency law empowers the President to authorize searches of individuals or premises without regard for the code of penal procedure. Since the aftermath of Sadat's assassination in 1981, there have been a few reports in the opposition press of warrantless searches being conducted in connection with investigations of extremist organizations, both Islamic and leftist. The Government has not confirmed any of these reports, but some of them appear factual. Also there have been several reports by opposition papers that their premises were entered and searched by unknown persons after working hours.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. The Government's respect for these freedoms is reflected in the debate of national issues and criticism of government officials in the media. Much debate appears in the so-called "national press"--the major government-owned dailies and news magazines--but the weekly opposition party newspapers and publications of Islamic groups are especially critical. Although the emergency law can be used to ban publications, the Government has not invoked it for this purpose.

There is a widely held view, which extends to opposition circles, that the Egyptian press has never been freer. Nonetheless, the Government occasionally exercises influence on the national press, whose editors-in-chief are appointed and can be dismissed by the NDP-dominated Shura Council, the upper chamber of the Parliament, which has responsibility for press supervision. The Council theoretically exercises its supervision through the Government's ownership of major nonparty newspapers and magazines and through its role in the Higher Press Council. The latter, a 45-member body chaired by the Speaker of the Shura Council and composed of senior press figures, is not designed to serve as a vehicle for imposing press censorship, nor does it appear to be a very active body. One of the Higher Press Council's functions, though, is to approve applications for new publications; on a few occasions applications to publish independently owned journals have been rejected or delayed for lengthy periods. This approval, however, is required only for publications appearing regularly on a set schedule. Items appearing irregularly are published without the Council's certification.

Overt censorship does not exist, but journalists and editors working for government-supported newspapers are "guided" by officials on occasion about the treatment of specific issues. Since Mubarak assumed the presidency, there have been no confirmed reports of government action to silence press critics. No censorship was applied regarding press coverage of the arrests of Islamic extremists in July and other sensitive stories during the year. No journalists have been arrested on political grounds. The courts overturned an attempt to confiscate an edition of an opposition newspaper in 1984. No attempt at confiscation was made in 1985. Two of the five Muslim and Coptic religious publications suspended by the Sadat Government in 1981 have yet to reappear, despite a 1982 court decision canceling the suspensions. The two publications are the Muslim brotherhood's Al-Dawa and the Coptic Al-Kiraza Al-Murqassia.

A wide variety of foreign reading matter in both Arabic and other languages is readily available. In 1985, authorities banned a few issues of certain foreign publications, including the London-based newsmagazine Al-Majallah, as well as Newsweek and Time.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Under the emergency law, the Government can place limitations on the constitutionally guaranteed right of assembly. Permission is required from the Interior Ministry to hold public meetings, mass political rallies, and protest marches. Despite its emergency authority to restrict gatherings of government opponents, the Government has allowed opposition parties to hold numerous meetings and rallies, usually stipulating that they be held indoors. At the same time, the Interior Ministry has moved against radical Islamic elements, banning, in June 1985, Sheikh Hafez Salaama's proposed "green march" to the presidential palace in support of full implementation of Islamic law. Salaama asked the Administrative Court to lift the ban, but the Court upheld it, citing a 1923 law empowering authorities to prevent public meetings or demonstrations deemed threatening to public order or security. Subsequently, in July, the courts ruled in Salaama's favor when he filed suit challenging a second ban by the authorities of a public meeting proposed at Cairo's Abdin Square. However, Salaama canceled the meeting when the Interior Ministry specified a different site for the event.

In October, following violent protest demonstrations by university students, the Interior Minister announced a ban on such activities. He stated that citizens have the freedom to express their views but should do so through "legal channels" --the media as well as political party and trade union forums. Earlier in 1985 there had been occasional protest demonstrations by students and others; police forcibly intervened when they became disorderly. Despite the Interior Minister's ban, students at Zagazig University reportedly staged protest demonstrations in December; both the progovernment papers and the opposition press reported clashes between demonstrators and police, resulting in some arrests.

EGYPT

About 20 to 25 percent of the work force is unionized, and there are no restrictions on workers' freedom to organize. Every 50 workers in a given activity can form a committee, which operates as a local union. These locals are affiliated with national unions, all 23 of which are required to affiliate with the sole labor federation, the Egyptian General Trade Union Federation (EGTUF). There have been complaints to the International Labor Organization (ILO) that the requirement that all unions must join a single national federation is an infringement of the workers' right of freedom of association. In response to these complaints, the Government established a commission to study the possibility of amending the labor laws to bring them into conformity with the ILO freedom of association conventions.

The trade unions' principal function is to defend the rights of the membership in dealing with management on such issues as wages and working conditions. Labor defines its interests on these issues and pursues them with considerable freedom. However, there are restrictions. Setting wages through collective bargaining is not permitted. Instead, management consults closely with unions in fixing wages. The labor code also provides for a system of arbitration to resolve wage and working condition issues, but it omits any reference to the right to strike. Answering ILO criticisms, the Government points out that strikes do occur and there is no legal ban against them. In practice, strikes are discouraged by both government and trade union leaders, but in 1985, as in the past, there were occasional reports of work stoppages. These incidents apparently lasted a few days at most and focused on local bread-and-butter issues. In most cases, the strikes reportedly ended with management's pledge to act on workers' grievances; in a few cases the authorities intervened to restore normal operation.

After the September 1984 workers' riots at the Delta textile center of Kaffar Al-Dawwar, police arrested, among others, about 20 union members suspected of orchestrating the disorders. Textile union leaders hired a team of lawyers for the arrestees' legal defense. By early 1985, according to reliable sources, all of the detained union members had been freed under court orders obtained by the lawyers.

Professional associations, in particular the bar association and the press syndicate, criticize government policies in their pronouncements and occasionally sponsor protest activities. The associations also operate largely free of government interference. In 1985 the bar association and the commerce and engineers syndicates held elections for their respective governing boards; by all accounts the balloting was fair and competitive, with no intervention by the authorities.

EGTUF adheres to the principle of nonmembership in international labor organizations, except for the Organization of African Trade Unity, the Arab Labor Organization, and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions. However, the latter suspended Egypt's membership in 1978 in reaction to the Camp David accords, as did the Arab Labor Organization in 1979. Despite EGTUF's prohibition, some individual unions have affiliated with larger international trade union organizations. EGTUF itself has signed various international cooperation agreements, one of them with the AFL-CIO. There appear to be no restrictions on the international affiliations of professional associations.

EGYPT

c. Freedom of Religion

According to the Constitution, Egypt is an Islamic state which guarantees freedom of religious expression and equality before the law regardless of religion. Egypt has a tradition of religious toleration, and the authorities generally uphold the rights of religious minorities. Islam and Coptic Christianity are the two major religions. While most Egyptian Jews emigrated many years ago, those few who remain appear to practice their faith without restriction or harassment. Various Protestant sects operate, some with significant Egyptian membership, while others have a small following largely among expatriates. All organized religions may maintain links with coreligionists abroad. Proselytizing of Muslim Egyptians is prohibited. Conversion from Islam, while officially not restricted or penalized, is discouraged by the Government.

In February, the Government arrested 39 adherents of the Baha'i faith; within a week they had reportedly all been released. The press reported in June that the State Security Prosecutor had declined to try the Bahai's because their ostensible offense, belonging to an apostate religion, is not a crime under Egypt's penal code; instead, he transferred the case to another court for prosecution under statutes forbidding the use of religion to promote seditious ideas and for the violation of a 1960 law outlawing organized activities by Bahai's. Subsequently, foreign press reports indicated that Cairo's Abdin Court had postponed issuance of a verdict in the case until February 3, 1986. In November, following a judicial investigation, the authorities deported, in lieu of prosecuting, 19 foreigners, some of them American citizens, linked to the "Children of God" cult. The deportees were accused of using religion to spread socially harmful ideas.

All faiths can, in principle, establish places of worship, run schools, and train numbers of clergy adequate to serve believers. Under a law dating back to the Ottoman era, non-Muslims must obtain numerous official permits, not required of Muslims, to build places of worship. Obtaining authorization can take years. In 1985, as in previous years, authorities approved permits for several new churches. Permits are not required for the restoration of existing churches but are needed to enlarge the structures.

Coptic Christians are the most significant indigenous religious minority and constitute an estimated 10 percent of the population. Copts work in all career fields, occupying many leadership positions in the business and professional communities. Copts seem by and large to enjoy equal access with Muslims to public employment, although there appear to be instances of discrimination. They are sparsely represented at the highest levels of Government; two of 33 cabinet ministers and 9 of 458 Peoples Assembly deputies are Copts.

University officials have denied allegations that general admissions procedures were revised in the fall of 1984 in order to discriminate against Copts. Nevertheless, allegations continue of anti-Copt discrimination in admissions to some fields of medical study. Copts and other non-Muslims also are not permitted to enroll in Cairo's Muslim religiously oriented Al-Azhar University or Al-Azhar's nationwide primary and secondary school system. The Government has denied a request to establish a Coptic university.

EGYPT

Though many Copts may face prejudice and individual acts of discrimination from Muslims, there is no evidence that these acts are officially inspired. President Mubarak has emphasized publicly the full equality of Copts and other religious minorities. The courts' application of Islamic law to family matters in the Muslim community (marriage, inheritance, personal property)--and the Islamic influences elsewhere in the legal system--have not touched the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms of Copts and other minorities as well as Muslims themselves.

Since reaching a peak in the period preceding Sadat's assassination, reports of persecution and physical attacks on Copts by Islamic extremists have diminished sharply, although the Government continues to take substantial measures, such as posting security forces near Coptic churches, to guard against violence from Islamic militants. In an October interview with Al-Ahram, Pope Shenouda praised the spirit of national unity prevailing among Egyptians and said that "sectarian violence" is an expression alien to Egypt. His publicly stated view that Muslim-Copt relations have improved greatly appears to be widely shared in Coptic circles.

During 1985 virtually all of the estimated 26 Coptic bishops and priests still barred from resuming their former positions for fomenting sectarian strife in 1981 were allowed to return to their dioceses. An undetermined number of Islamic prayer leaders in this category are still barred from the mosques, reportedly on instructions of the state security investigations agency. Other prayer leaders have been displaced since July by a campaign to nationalize private mosques suspected of being centers of radical Islamic activity. Among those now affected was Hafez Salaama, whose Al-Nur mosque in Cairo was closed by the authorities, ostensibly for completion of the half-finished structure.

Political activity along religious lines is forbidden, and various Islamic and Coptic societies are legally proscribed. Although the Muslim Brotherhood (MB) is technically banned, its activities are tolerated so long as they do not threaten state security or foster sectarian tensions. In the May 1984 elections for the People's Assembly, eight MB adherents were elected on the New Wafd Party's slate. In May 1985 the courts ruled that mere membership in the MB is not a criminal offense. The MB has a suit pending in court to seek restoration of its legitimacy.

In July, the Government banned the placing on automobiles of religious stickers, both Muslim and Coptic. The stickers had been appearing with increasing frequency on automobiles, allegedly causing sectarian tensions.

Egyptian law prohibits the use of places of worship to criticize the State. The courts have not yet ruled on a challenge to the constitutionality of this restriction. In May, Sheikh Salah Abu Ismail, an opposition People's Assembly deputy, reportedly proposed legislation that would grant Muslim prayer leaders immunity from prosecution for antigovernment sermons. Although the Government maintains that sermons by Islamic and Coptic religious figures are not censored, Muslim prayer leaders are occasionally detained and questioned for delivering allegedly inflammatory declarations in their mosques.

EGYPT

Pope Shenouda III, whose recognition as Coptic Orthodox Patriarch was revoked by the Government in 1981, remained in government-enforced seclusion for over 3 years until his release by presidential decree on January 1, 1985. There appear to be no conditions attached to his return to public life and full papal responsibilities. In April, elections postponed by the Pope's seclusion were held for the Coptic Melli Council, a 24-member lay body that oversees some church administrative matters.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Egyptians are guaranteed freedom of movement except in well-defined military districts; additional restricted areas apply to travel by foreigners. Except for limitations affecting males who have not completed compulsory military service, freedom of foreign travel and emigration is also guaranteed. Citizens who leave the country have the right to return. Some who left for political reasons have returned since President Mubarak assumed office. There are no known cases of citizenship being revoked for political reasons. Egypt has a liberal policy on political asylum, and the extradition of political refugees is prohibited by law. In September, the Interior Minister testified to People's Assembly committees that there were 3,000 political refugees from other Arab countries in Egypt.

Under the state of emergency, the Prime Minister has authority, which he may delegate to the Interior Minister, to restrict foreign or domestic travel. The opposition has alleged use of this emergency authority to prevent suspected Islamic militants from leaving the country. In April, the Interior Minister announced the restoration of full travel rights to 3,471 persons, identified as members of the Al-Jihad organization, by removing their names from the "black list" of individuals not permitted to go abroad. According to another ministry official, there remained fewer than 500 persons subject to travel restriction (in contrast to 45,000 in the Nasser era), all by judicial order as provided by the penal code and most having criminal cases pending. Following his release from detention in August, radical Islamic preacher Hafez Salaama was permitted to leave the country for the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Egypt's political system is characterized by a strong presidency. The President heads the National Democratic Party (NDP), which wields a substantial majority in the People's Assembly, but opposition parties organize, publish their views, and, in some cases, represent their followers in the People's Assembly and on the local level.

The largest and most influential of the five legally constituted opposition parties is the New Wafd, a revival of the Wafd, one of the major political parties before the 1952 revolution. The New Wafd resumed activity in 1983, following court decisions that restored the leaders' political rights and affirmed the party's legal status.

Restrictions on the formation of new parties are embodied in a 1977 law which prohibits the formation of parties based on religious or class lines, as well as new parties whose platforms duplicate those of existing ones or include opposition to the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty. The law also established the so-called "Parties Committee," whose approval is required to form a new party. When the Committee rejects an application to form a new party, the applicants are entitled to challenge the decision in court. In 1985, the sponsors of a proposed Nasserist party filed suit when the Committee turned down their application. In its May ruling on the suit, the Administrative Court referred the case to the Supreme Constitutional Court, where it remained pending. The Court also stated that provisions of the 1977 parties law may be unconstitutional because of contradictions with citizens' political rights and freedom of expression.

The People's Assembly comprises 458 members, of whom 10 are appointed by the President. Half of the elected seats are reserved for worker and peasant representatives, and 31 for women. Following the most recent elections in 1984, the NDP controls the People's Assembly with 395 seats. The New Wafd has 58 seats (including 8 from the Muslim Brotherhood) and other parties have 5 (all appointed), giving the opposition greater representation than in the previous Assembly. Both NDP and opposition deputies can and do strongly criticize the Government. Cabinet Ministers appear before critical assembly committees. Assembly members call for parliamentary investigations into government actions or policies, requiring testimony of government officials. In voting, there is some crossing of party lines.

An electoral commission drawn from the judiciary is designed to insure that voting is conducted fairly and legally. It supervises parliamentary elections and is present in each district on voting day. Election voting can be invalidated if irregularities are found. Each party in the election may have observers at the polling places.

In the hard-fought 1984 campaign, the NDP and the four participating opposition parties together fielded over 2,000 candidates. The elections, in which 43 percent of Egypt's approximately 12 million voters cast ballots, are regarded as the freest and most competitive since the 1952 revolution. A number of losing opposition candidates filed court cases, still pending, challenging the election results. The indications are that the improprieties were random occurrences and that there was no systematic effort to rig the elections.

A major opposition complaint centered on the July 1983 electoral law which had replaced the previous system of single-member constituencies with a party list system. In each of the 48 electoral districts, assembly seats were awarded in proportion to the number of votes for each party's list, subject to the requirement that a party receive at least 8 percent of the total vote. The opposition parties criticized this "8 percent" proviso on the grounds that it was excessively high and they have filed court suits challenging the constitutionality of the law on the grounds that it infringes upon equal rights provisions of the Constitution.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Egypt has signed the Organization of African Unity's African Human Rights Charter and has reaffirmed its commitment to the

EGYPT

U.N. Human Rights Declaration and respect for related international conventions. The Government is responsive to queries from Amnesty International and other international groups about human rights concerns, including requests for visits. Within the Government, primary responsibility for international human rights matters rests with the Foreign Ministry's Legal Office and Office of International Organization Affairs.

Human rights groups in Egypt are increasingly active in promoting domestic and foreign human rights issues. Their activities cover such areas as prisoners' welfare and women's rights; some groups are also trying to mobilize public support on certain political issues. In May the medical syndicate reportedly formed a committee to investigate physicians involved in torture incidents. Women's rights groups actively lobbied for the passage of the new family status bill enacted by the People's Assembly in July. The Government does not appear to interfere with these organizations.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern about prolonged pretrial confinement of accused persons in political cases, curbs on defendants' right of appeal in state security courts, inadequate safeguards against torture and ill-treatment, and the now-ended restrictions on Pope Shenouda. Freedom House rated Egypt as "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Egypt's population of about 49 million is growing at an annual rate of 3 percent, and its per capita gross national product was $700 in 1983.

Egypt enforces strict laws limiting the size of landholdings in an attempt to guarantee equitable income and production opportunities in rural areas. The limit in "settled lands" (the Nile Valley and Delta) is 100 feddans (one feddan equals 1.04 acres) per family. Larger holdings are permitted and encouraged in "new lands," the desert areas being brought under cultivation through irrigation. Despite these policies, an expanding population living on a limited natural resource base has contributed to restricted growth of per capita income.

Most of the Government's massive subsidy program goes to subsidize bread, rice, tea, edible oil, butane gas, meat, and corn. As a result of this program, caloric intake for the average Egyptian exceeds minimal nutritional requirements. It also assures ample supplies of basic necessities at fixed and affordable prices. Aware of the strain on the budget and the distortions this system introduces into supply-and-demand relationships, the Government is moving to reform it through such measures as raising prices for bread and other commodities, stiffening eligibility requirements for subsidized items, and raising some energy tariffs. To meet the acute housing shortage, the 5-year development plan, currently in its fourth year, includes an ambitious program of public housing.

Education and health services are free and available to the majority of Egyptians. Infant mortality is estimated at about 105 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy is 58 years. As of 1980, 88 percent of the urban population and 64 percent of rural residents had access to safe water. About 44 percent of adults are literate; 86 percent of male youth attend primary school, but only 62 percent of school age females are enrolled. In rural areas, owing to tradition and economic circumstances, some children are kept from school to work on family farms. University education is free to anyone who passes the secondary school completion exam. Assignment to faculties is based on score rather than a student's own choice, except for those with top scores.

Employers are required by law to provide acceptable terms and conditions of employment for their workers; the minimum wage is approximately $22 a month, and the regular workweek is fixed at 48 hours for factory workers. Employers are legally required to meet worker safety and health norms, which are modeled on the ILO's suggested standards. There are special provisions for female workers. Employers who violate wage, hour, and safety and health provisions face civil and criminal penalties, and independent sources confirm that the courts occasionally impose fines on offending companies.

The minimum age for full-time employment is 12, which is also the minimum school-leaving age. However, there is evidence that the traditional practice of using underage children to perform full-time jobs continues. In the latest survey (1981) of the labor force, the Government's central statistics agency reported that over half a million children aged 6 to 12 were regularly employed, a majority in the agricultural sector.

By law, and in many respects in practice, there is equality of the sexes. Women vote, work outside the home, and can serve in the military. Women are represented in medicine, law, and education and serve in the People's Assembly and the Cabinet. They are generally free to travel, though a married woman must have her husband's permission to obtain her initial passport. A husband may subsequently rescind his permission and request that his wife's passport be canceled, though such cases are rare. Under Islamic law, female heirs are entitled to one-half the amount of inheritance that male heirs can receive. In rural areas and within more traditional communities, prevailing cultural values make it more difficult for women to pursue careers outside the home. In such households, by custom and tradition, women occupy a subordinate and dependent role.

Reinforcing the legal basis for equality of the sexes is the new family status law enacted in July 1985. The statute preserved largely intact women's right to divorce and divorced women's child custody and property rights spelled out in the 1979 act it replaced. The latter had been declared unconstitutional in May on narrow technical grounds by the Supreme Constitutional Court. Although the 1979 statute provided that a husband's second marriage was automatically grounds for the first wife to obtain a divorce, the new version states she must prove that the second marriage has caused her material or psychological harm. On the other hand, the new law also requires the husband to declare second and subsequent marriages, with failure to do so constituting grounds for divorce by the first wife. The successor law retains the controversial provision that, in case of divorce, the woman has the option of retaining possession of the family residence or of receiving financial compensation.

INDIA

India follows a multiparty democratic system based on the British parliamentary model, with an independent judiciary and a free press. Free elections take place regularly, with the most recent national parliamentary elections held as scheduled December 24, 1984, only 7 weeks after the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi.

The Congress (I) Party headed by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi holds nearly 80 percent of the seats in the lower house of India's Parliament. Congress (I) also controls the largely ceremonial upper house, as well as the legislatures of 13 of the 22 states. Another state's coalition government is led by Congress (I). Other parties (in two states with Congress (I) support) control the eight remaining states. Punjab and Sikkim, which were under direct control by the central Government ("President's Rule") at the beginning of the year, elected state and parliamentary representatives in 1985, as did Assam where elections had previously been postponed because of the unsettled communal situation.

India's economy is mixed, with banks, air and rail transport, public utilities, and much heavy industry in government hands. The agricultural sector, the manufacture of consumer goods, and the supply of services are largely privately held. The Government has relaxed regulation of private business activity in recent years.

India is a secular state. Although 83 percent Hindu, India has a large Muslim population (about 80 million, or 11 percent). There are also sizable populations of Sikhs, Christians, Jains, Buddhists, and Parsis. In some outlying regions, there are locally important minorities or tribal groups, such as the Nagas. The new Punjab state government has also helped settle in Punjab a large number of Sikh families who fled there following the 1984 riots.

The upheaval in the Sikh-majority state of Punjab remained India's most serious human rights concern in 1985 although the situation improved markedly compared to 1984. In 1984, the Government, in response to Sikh-separatist agitation, sent army units into the Golden Temple in Amritsar, the Sikhs' most holy shrine. Prime Minister Indira Gandhi was assassinated by two of her Sikh bodyguards in apparent revenge for the attack on the temple. Over 2,000 persons, mostly Sikhs, died in postassassination rioting and many others lost their homes. Most of those Sikhs whose homes were destroyed during the postassassination violence have since been resettled, generally in the same urban areas where they previously lived.

The release from detention of Sant Harchand Singh Longowal and other prominent leaders of the Akali Dal (the primary Sikh political party) in March and April helped create a climate in Punjab conducive to discussions between the Government and the Akali Dal. An agreement between the two sides was announced on July 24 following meetings between the Prime Minister and Longowal. The accords, which contained provisions for settling the major points of contention between the Sikhs and the Government, appear to be broadly acceptable to the majority of Sikhs as well as to Indian citizens of other religions.

Other incidents of communal violence were reported in several parts of India in 1985. There were clashes both between religious communities (generally Hindu-Muslim) and between castes of different economic levels, particularly attacks on untouchables by higher-caste Hindus.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The Government does not engage in political killing. Communal or caste differences, exacerbated by the competing economic and political goals of various religious and ethnic groups, often result in intercommunal and intercaste violence, increasing the occurrence of politically motivated killing. There are allegations that some of these deaths occur at the hands of various security forces, but there is no evidence that the government sanctions such violence.

Both Hindus and Sikhs were murdered in violence related to the unrest in Punjab in 1985. Victims included prominent politicians working for Hindu-Sikh unity as well as several allegedly involved in the anti-Sikh rioting of November 1984. The head of the Akali Dal, Harchand Singh Longowal, was assassinated on August 20 by Sikhs opposed to the accords reached between the Sikh leadership and the Government in July. There were other terrorist incidents not aimed at specific targets. In early May, Delhi and other northern Indian centers witnessed a spate of random bombings when terrorists rigged small transistor radio bombs to explode on buses, trains, and in other public places.

In response to these incidents, Parliament passed the Terrorists and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act. Human rights activists voiced concern that this law might allow undue government interference in the legitimate activities of citizens. To date the Government has not invoked this Act.

In April, the Government charged a judicial commission with the investigation of the 1984 anti-Sikh riots in Delhi. The commission's mandate was extended under the terms of the Punjab Accords to include investigation of riots in other north Indian cities.

Communal riots and violence based on caste considerations are longstanding problems in India. In 1985, such incidents took place in widely separated parts of India. The 4-month long agitation over the minority "reservations" issue in Gujarat, where higher-caste groups agitated against expanded quotas for lower caste students in the state's professional schools, was the most serious and violent of these disturbances, resulting in over 200 deaths. The situation came to a head when police attacked newspaper offices and journalists who they suspected of exacerbating communal and intercaste tensions. The Government then called in the army to restore law and order.

b. Disappearance

Some Sikhs dispute government assertions that all those arrested in Punjab following the June 1984 army operation in the Sikh Golden Temple are accounted for. The number of such disputed cases is small, and it is possible that those involved are either underground in Punjab or have left the state.

INDIA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government does not condone torture or cruel treatment, which are prohibited by law. Indian case law, extending over many decades, excludes from admission in court any confessions or information extracted through the use of force or torture.

Police brutality against prisoners and suspects was reported by the press in 1985 in a number of states. Police are sometimes accused of staging mock "encounters" with suspects to conceal the fact that the victims had previously died in police custody, or of attributing deaths of suspects in police custody to causes such as "suicide," "disease," "shock," or "injuries received prior to arrest." One such incident occurred in 1985 when a Sikh suspect arrested in connection with the May "transistor" bombings in New Delhi died in police custody, although he reportedly had only minor injuries when arrested the day before. The postmortem showed that his death was due to physical abuse. Two others arrested at the same time also showed signs of physical abuse when they appeared in court. There is no evidence that the state or central governments condone police brutality. At the same time, there have been few official inquiries into allegations of police brutality.

Prison facilities are crowded and pretrial detention may last for months or years. Press accounts report the use of convicts for domestic work by jail officials in contravention of regulations, sexual abuse of some prisoners, and lengthy detention "for their own protection" of some women who had reported rapes to police.

According to a classification system dating from the colonial period, prison authorities grant varying privileges to prisoners of different social status. Foreign nationals and political prisoners are entitled to larger or less crowded cells, better food, and other amenities than ordinary prisoners; some middle-class prisoners are segregated from other prisoners and given more privileges.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that a person in custody be told of the grounds for arrest, be given the right to be represented by counsel, and be brought before a magistrate within 24 hours of arrest. At his initial appearance, the accused must be either remanded for further investigation or released on bail. These provisions are generally respected.

The Constitution permits the enactment of preventive detention laws against threats to the public welfare and to the national security. Such laws provide for limits on the length of detention, generally not to exceed 12 months, and for review of such detention. Two preventive detention laws are currently in force. One, rarely used, permits the arrest of suspected "economic offenders." The other is the National Security Act (NSA), intended to permit the detention of security risks, which stipulates that the courts, in order to release a detainee, must determine that all grounds for detention are invalid, rather than simply any one of them. When a detention order expires, another can be issued, extending detention by up to another 12 months. If authorities add new grounds for detention for each extension, a detainee theoretically can be held indefinitely through a series of extensions.

The NSA has been used in Punjab but, according to official government sources, Punjab's newly-elected state government revoked detention orders against 224 of the 233 people held under this law. The remaining nine detainees have been accused of spying, espionage, and seditious activity. Central government authorities have given the Punjab government responsibility for deciding whether to continue detention of these individuals.

Except as permitted by the Terrorist Affected Areas Act, which still applies to Punjab and Chandigarh, incommunicado detention is not practiced. The right of habeas corpus is available so that a detainee or his representative can petition for the detainee's release.

Exile is not a legally sanctioned punishment in India; there is no evidence that any Indian citizen was exiled in 1985.

Although there is no specific law in India against "forced labor," Article 23 of the Constitution dealing with the fundamental rights of citizens includes the "right against exploitation"; under its terms, forced labor is prohibited.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There is no constitutional guarantee of public trial. The criminal procedure code provides for open trial, but also permits the judiciary to close the proceedings under relatively narrow circumstances. For example, the Official Secrets Act permits closed proceedings on the plea that publication of any evidence or statements would be prejudicial to the safety of the State. The Act requires, however, that the passing of sentence take place in public.

The 1984 Terrorist Affected Areas Act amends the Evidence Act in areas declared "terrorist affected" by placing the burden of proof of innocence on the accused. Terrorist affected areas are defined as areas where there have been extensive disturbances of public peace for more than 1 month, and where violence was directed against peacekeeping forces. Trials under this act are held in camera. A few special courts were set up under provisions of the Act, trials were held, and convictions made. Many of those convicted were later released after the Akali Dal government came to power in Punjab in September 1984.

In 1985, courts martial and other judicial procedures have continued to deal with those Sikh military members--some 2,733 according to Defense Ministry sources--who deserted their units after the June 1984 military action against the Golden Temple in Amritsar. Some Sikhs have argued that these deserters were following their religious dictates and had acted to protect their religious freedom. In some cases these soldiers have been sentenced to up to 14 years imprisonment. The Punjab Accords provide that Sikh soldiers discharged from the army (presumably following their desertion) will be "rehabilitated."

As a general rule, Indian legal procedures assure fair trial. Defendants have the right to choose counsel, and effective appeal channels are available at each stage of the judicial process.

INDIA

The Indian bar is independent of government at all levels. Judges of the state high courts and the Supreme Court are selected by the Law Ministry, following consultations with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The central Government since 1983 has reversed previous practice and now generally appoints chief justices in states other than their states of residence. Although there was some apprehension among high court justices that the new practice could be used to remove judges who had given verdicts unfavorable to government, there has been no indication of any such abuse.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Indian law requires warrants for searches and seizures but also permits the police in a criminal investigation to institute searches without warrant if otherwise there would be undue delay. The officer must state in writing the grounds for making the search without a warrant and specify the object of the search. There is no indication that this provision has been abused.

The authorities continued to invoke special powers during 1985 in the "disturbed areas" of Assam and Punjab, although "disturbed areas" legislation on Assam was lifted in July. Under the provisions of law governing disturbed areas, civilian authorities down to the rank of subinspector of police, and military authorities down to noncommissioned officer, are given exceptional authority, including to search and arrest without warrant and to shoot to kill in some circumstances.

The press has reported allegations of the tapping of telephones and interception of personal mail. Such surveillance is authorized by law "on the occurrence of any public emergency or in the interest of the public safety or tranquility." These terms are not specifically defined and thus lend themselves to a broad interpretation. Censorship of mails under certain circumstances, such as public emergency, is legal. Aside from these instances, the Government does not routinely interfere in the private lives of its citizens.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and, by extension, of the press. However, material which, in the view of government authorities, may incite religious or communal hatred is proscribed from print. A booklet published by a human rights group entitled "Report to the Nation: Oppression in Punjab" was banned in this manner. A 1984 case registered against an Indian journalist remains unresolved. The journalist, who reported that some Sikhs arrested during the army's assault on the Golden Temple in Amritsar in 1984 were summarily executed, was charged with provoking riot and disaffection among communal groups. By late 1985, the journalist's passport had been returned, but his press credentials had not been renewed and the case against him was still pending.

A film censorship board reviews all films before they are licensed for distribution. The board excises material deemed overly violent or offensive to public morals or to religious and communal sentiment. Radio and television are government monopolies, and opposition parties often accuse both of favoring the ruling party.

Opposition viewpoints enjoy wide dissemination in the print media, and many political parties control their own newspapers or journals. The press in general is lively and free, and there are no restrictions relating to criticism of the Government. Press censorship, imposed in Punjab following the Army action in June 1984, is no longer in force.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution protects the right of peaceful assembly and the right to form associations and unions. These rights are respected in practice. For reasons of crowd control, authorities sometimes require permits and notification to police prior to demonstrations, parades or similar gatherings. There are no prohibitions against Indians joining any association, union, and professional or social welfare organization.

The right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike is recognized in the Industrial Disputes Act of 1947 (as amended) and the Indian Trade Union Act of 1926. However, the Essential Services Maintenance Act (ESMA), renewed in 1985, permits government intervention to ban strikes and immediately to institute conciliation in 16 industries identified as essential for the public welfare. The National Security Act empowers the central Government to curb strikes in the same 16 industries. In September, Parliament enacted legislation which denies employees of intelligence agencies the right to organize and strike. In 1985, the Government invoked ESMA during the agitation in Gujarat when the entire state government work force went on a 72-day strike over the issue of "reservations," i.e., the percentage of promotion and employment opportunities set aside for backward classes. The Government also invoked ESMA when electricity and waterworks employees and the employees of the Food Corporation of India threatened to strike. Under ESMA the Government provides for alternate resolution of disputes through conciliation, mediation, or, ultimately, referral to arbitration or adjudication.

India's unions claim a membership of approximately 14 million or about 5 percent of the total work force. This claimed membership represents approximately 50 percent of the workers in the "modern sector" of the economy. Four-fifths of the labor force is in the rural sector, where unemployment and underemployment are endemic and where organization into effective unions is difficult. Employer associations and trade unions, as well as government labor officials and mediators, play a prominent role in developing industrial relations norms in both the private and public sectors.

There is heavy emphasis on political activity by unions representing the relatively few workers in the economy's modern sector. The labor movement wields influence disproportionate to its numbers because of its organization of strategic sectors of the economy such as government, transportation, and basic industries, and because of the unions' association with various political parties.

INDIA

The political parties exercise strong influence on their trade union wings but, except for the Communist unions, India's national labor centers exercise considerable independence in their internal affairs and in the representation of worker interests.

Unions and professional bodies are free to maintain contact with international bodies. The Indian National Trade Union Congress and the Hind Mazdoor Sabha are affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The All-India Trade Union Congress is affiliated with the Soviet-supported World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) and the Center of Indian Trade Unions attends WFTU meetings as an observer.

Indian trade unions have complained several times in recent years to the International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee on Freedom of Association, charging violations in India of ILO conventions and recommendations. The two Marxist trade unions usually have presented these complaints. According to ILO documents, the Government has cooperated in the Committee's investigations.

c. Freedom of Religion

All religious groups are allowed to worship freely and government policy favors no one religious community. However, communal tensions and violence based on religious differences continue as a serious social problem. The Government limits the number of foreign Christian missionaries, but there is no legal bar against proselytizing by Indian Christians.

Although Sikhs generally are treated equally under the law, Sikhs, particularly young males, were subjected in 1985 to more rigorous security precautions than others in certain circumstances (e.g., airport security).

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is full freedom of movement within India for all citizens with the caveat that travelers to certain sensitive border areas must obtain special permits. Foreign travel and emigration are without political restrictions. More than 3 million Indian citizens now live abroad. There are no special restrictions of movement applied to women or other groups. In mid-1984 the Government tightened visa requirements for foreigners coming to India so that virtually every non-Indian must now have an entry visa. Foreigners are also not allowed to travel to a number of sensitive border areas. Punjab has been off-limits to foreigners without special permission since mid-1984, although the restriction was lifted for foreign journalists in July 1985.

Since independence in 1947 India has admitted millions of refugees. Most who wanted to remain have been granted citizenship and integrated into the society.

A large number of Bengali-speaking people moved from Assam into West Bengal in 1983 as a result of violent agitation in Assam against alleged migrants from Bangladesh. West Bengal authorities report that the 23,000 people who had been in relief camps had returned to Assam by early 1985.

INDIA

An estimated 100,000 Tamils have entered India from Sri Lanka since 1982. Most arrived since the current ethnic disturbances in Sri Lanka began in mid-1983 and have remained in the state of Tamil Nadu. The Government provides them shelter and subsistence. The Government has denied Indian press reports that it has also provided training to members of certain Sri Lankan armed Tamil separatist groups.

Several thousand Afghans have entered India since the Soviet invasion in 1979. Many have since departed to other countries. Although India does not formally recognize these Afghans as refugees, there has been very little evidence of forcible repatriation. The 1984 World Refugee Report listed two cases of United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees-mandated Afghan refugees, who had left India for third countries (Sweden and Saudi Arabia), being denied admission to India upon their return. Failing admission to India, each was returned to Afghanistan by the responsible airline. The passengers' destination was determined by the airline, not by the Government of India.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution grants universal adult suffrage to all citizens over 21. Regular elections are held at every level. By law, Parliament can be constituted for no more than 5 years.

The election law was amended in 1985 to provide that the death during an election campaign of a candidate not representing a major political party would no longer annul that election.

The Constitution empowers the President to declare an emergency or "President's Rule", on the advice of the Prime Minister in the event of war, external aggression, or internal disruption; collapse of the constitutional machinery in any state; or the financial breakdown of the federal or any state government. President's Rule, in effect in Punjab since October 1983 and in Sikkim since May 1984, was lifted in both states during the year. The return to representative government in Punjab followed state elections there on September 25 in which the Akali Dal (the primary Sikh party) won a massive victory, securing nearly two-thirds of the state assembly seats and a majority of Punjab's parliamentary seats. The elections were peaceful and the turnout high.

A multitude of state and national parties are in active opposition to the Congress (I) Party, which holds power at the national level and in the majority of India's 22 state governments. The parties represent every shade of the ideological spectrum and freely contest elections at all levels. No social, religious, or linguistic group is denied political participation or suffrage.

There are no legal barriers to female candidates, although their numbers have remained small since independence. The late Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi, was a woman. There are 44 women in the lower house of Parliament, and 24 in the upper house (of authorized memberships of 544 and 244 respectively).

INDIA

No international investigations of the human rights situation in India are known to have been conducted since 1978. India is a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

There are several independent Indian human rights organizations, including the People's Union for Civil Liberties and the People's Union for Democratic Rights. These organizations periodically send study teams to report on specific situations. In September, the Citizens for Democracy (CFD) released a booklet, "Report to the Nation: Oppression in Punjab." The document, billed as a response to the 1984 government White Paper on the army operation against dissidents in the Sikh Golden Temple, was banned the day after its release. Several members of the five-person study team who provided interview material for the booklet, as well as the owner of the printing press involved in its publication, were arrested on charges of sedition and "spreading disaffection among the communities." All were later released on bail pending trial. Both the media and some opposition politicians have condemned the Government's harsh response.

Several women's groups monitor the status of women and were active in 1985 in agitating against "dowry deaths". Both women's groups and human rights groups welcomed the Supreme Court's decision that divorced Muslim women are entitled to maintenance and support from their former husbands despite the constraints of Muslim personal law. But the Muslim community as a whole resented the Supreme Court judgment, decrying it as interference in the Muslim personal law. Some of these groups have also recommended that Muslims be covered under a nationwide civil law for all communities.

The Parliament and press continue to be the most significant channels for reporting human rights violations. In 1985, the press focused attention on human rights violations against Sikhs; violence against women, including "dowry deaths", rape and other physical violence; police brutality; conditions in jails; and exploitation of low-caste, harijan (untouchable), or tribal people in rural areas.

In its 1985 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the detention of prisoners of conscience and about large numbers of political detainees held without trial under preventive detention legislation or awaiting trial under special legislation permitting trial in camera; allegations of torture; reports that alleged extremists were shot dead by security forces after capture; and judicial executions. Freedom House calls India "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

India's population is estimated to be 767,768,000 with an annual growth rate of approximately 2 percent. Per capita gross national product was $260 as of 1983.

The Indian Constitution calls on the Government to minimize inequalities in income, facilities, and opportunities for all citizens. Indian economic policies have been defined in a series of 5-year plans since 1950, which have sought to establish a framework for realization of these objectives. In

India's mixed economy, the private sector produces 80 percent of the gross national product (GNP) and accounts for 93 percent of employment.

Life expectancy at birth is 56 years, and the infant mortality rate is 101 per 1,000 live births. Adult literacy is about 36 percent. Only 41 percent of the population have access to safe drinking water. The ratio of calorie supply relative to nutritional requirements is 89 percent. In both health services and education, there are great differences between rural and urban areas. The difficulty in providing adequate health, nutritional, and family planning services in the countryside continues to be a serious constraint to reducing both mortality and fertility rates among the rural poor.

Education and literacy have expanded rapidly since independence. Primary school enrollment, which was 43 percent in the 1950-51 school year, rose to 69 percent in 1980. School enrollments are higher for males (78 percent) than for females (55 percent), and are lower for children from disadvantaged groups such as scheduled castes and tribes.

Although proscribed by law, both child labor and bonded labor persist in India. Employment of children (i.e., under 15 years of age) is exacerbated by poverty and the absence of compulsory education. A survey conducted by the Labor Ministry estimates that every fourth child between the ages of 5 and 15 is employed, i.e., approximately 44 million children. Child labor is extensive in rural areas (approximately 90 percent according to government estimates), particularly in agriculture and cattle tending and in such activities as carpet weaving, wool cleaning, and the manufacture of matches and fireworks. In the modern manufacturing sector, child labor is virtually nonexistent. The Labor Ministry has blamed the persistence of child labor on economic realities--the cheapness of such labor for employers and economic necessity for parents.

Bonded labor, although prohibited under the Bonded Labour System Act of 1976, continues despite efforts to eliminate the practice. Bondage typically arises when an individual borrows money, at usurious rates, and is unable to repay the debt. Most vulnerable are landless, unemployed rural workers hired by small enterprises, particularly in the construction industry. The workers are placed in debt and are kept there by revolving loans from employers. Under these circumstances bondage can last a lifetime. Estimates of the number of affected laborers vary between 500,000 and 2.5 million, depending partly on the definition used. The central Government has repeatedly urged the states to detect, release, and rehabilitate bonded laborers; the Government has also offered matching contributions to meet financial outlays for the purpose. As of December 31, 1984, according to Ministry of Labour statistics, 173,814 cases of bonded labor had been identified, of which 131,407 had received rehabilitation assistance. A 1982 Supreme Court decision defined the term "forced labor" to include labor or service to another for remuneration which is less than the minimum wage. In this context, "forced labor" occurs throughout India, particularly in rural areas.

India has no national minimum wage. Minimum wages, under the Minimum Wages Act, are established by the various state governments through tripartite minimum wage advisory boards for the "nonmodern" sector of the economy, i.e. stone-breaking, agriculture, edible oils. As a result, minimum wages in these sectors vary widely from state to state. In the agricultural sector, day wages range from 7 to 12 rupees ($1=12.2 rupees); in the edible oils industry, from 4.25 to 9 rupees. Enforcement of these rates is poor. In urban areas, where unions are more common, wages are set through collective bargaining or the supply and demand mechanism.

The Factories Act of 1948 prescribes minimum standards for safety and occupational health and established the 8-hour day and 48-hour workweek. Industrial health and safety standards are enforced and accepted as good management practice in the more modern sector of the economy that includes steel plants and petrochemical complexes. Enforcement of minimum standards is exceedingly poor in the older, less cost-effective plants involving textiles and chemicals. Safety standards are generally flouted in the small-scale sector, i.e., businesses having less than 400 workers, due in part to the growth in this sector together with an inadequate number of trained inspectors.

There has been a steady decline over many decades in the ratio of women to men. Women die earlier than men, and the female infant mortality rate is higher. Both phenomena may reflect the greater economic value associated with males, especially in northern India, and consequent nutritional and health-care neglect of females in poorer homes.

Although women are guaranteed equal rights and protection under the law in India, longstanding cultural biases cause them, in practice, to have fewer educational and career opportunities. In 1985, public attention was again focused on "dowry deaths," the death under suspicious circumstances of women whose parents have been unable to pay a supplementary dowry demanded by the husband's family after marriage. Most reported cases of "dowry deaths" occurred in northern India, in lower middle-class urban families. There has been increasing agitation for legal protection, but most suspected cases of dowry deaths are investigated as accidents by the police rather than as murder. Lobbying by women's groups on this issue led Parliament to pass an amendment to the Dowry Prohibition Act which became effective in October and provided stringent punishment for those convicted in dowry death cases.

Certain castes and tribes are "scheduled" for the purpose of assigning benefits of governmental action to relieve disadvantages resulting from social factors. Scheduled castes make up 15 percent of the population. The tribal people are an estimated 7 percent. The Government has met only modest success in its efforts to improve the positions of these groups, and some programs have had the unintentional effect of mobilizing the upper castes against efforts to benefit the disadvantaged. These programs include a quota system in educational enrollment, preferences for housing and government jobs, and reserved seats in Parliament for members of the scheduled groups.

Violence directed against scheduled castes or scheduled tribes persists. The basis of such violence is often economic, involving perceived threats to the economic position of higher castes by lower economic groups demanding legal minimum wages or land tenancy. The Government attempts to provide legal and physical protection to victimized groups, and in the last 3 years the judiciary has taken a harder line, including the handing down of death sentences, against those accused of participating in mob violence against harijans.

The report of the Backward Classes Commission, released in mid-1982, remains under consideration at both state and national levels. The report covers not only the scheduled castes and tribes, but a number of other communities considered "backward." A number of castes are trying to be included on the growing list of "backward" communities in the hope of obtaining special government compensation and consideration for jobs. The Commission's main recommendations involve more than doubling the number of reserved seats in education and government employment from the 22.5 percent provided under the Constitution to 49.5 percent.

IRAN*

Iran is officially an Islamic Republic under the leadership of Ayatollah Ruhollah Musavi Khomeini. Its formal system, based on the Constitution approved in 1980 by popular referendum, follows a parliamentary pattern with a legislature, the Majles, and a president elected from among multiple candidates by universal suffrage. However, only candidates meeting highly restrictive religious and political criteria are permitted to contest elections, and the choice offered to voters is limited. The regime's hold on power is reinforced through arrests, executions, and other forms of intimidation.

The regime is dominated by a political elite composed of a group of Shi'a Muslim clerics who support Khomeini and of laymen aligned with these clerics. The regime, however, is not monolithic, and there are major differences on theology and on economic issues such as private property ownership, government versus private control of foreign trade, industrial policy, and strategy for the war with Iraq.

The war with Iraq, which began in September 1980, continues with little hope for an end in the near future, given the Iranian regime's lack of interest in negotiating a settlement. The war has been costly to both sides. Iran claims that over 100,000 of its soldiers have been killed and that the war has created about 1 million refugees. Missile and bombing attacks have caused considerable damage to civilian areas and loss of civilian life. An insurgency in Kurdish areas began about 6 years ago and continues. Urban terrorists cause civilian casualties and property damage in often random bomb attacks.

Nearly 7 years after the 1979 ouster of the Shah and the advent of the Islamic Revolution, the Iranian regime still considers itself revolutionary but must grapple with the need to revive the economy and operate political and social institutions, both new and old, in a productive manner. Iran is an oil-rich developing country. The disruptions of the revolutionary period caused serious economic deterioration. After improving somewhat in the preceding 2 years, the economy again declined in 1985. Inflation and unemployment are high, and corruption and black market activities flourish.

Although the trend is toward greater adherence to constitutional guarantees of human rights, particularly since December 1982, Iran's human rights record continues to show serious abuses.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

Reliable statistics are not available on the number of people killed for political or religious reasons. Due to the lack of procedural safeguards for defendants tried in revolutionary courts, which handle virtually all political cases, most of the hundreds of executions ordered each year by such courts amount to summary executions. It is difficult to separate

* Because of the absence of a United States Mission in Iran, this report draws heavily on unofficial sources.

cases of executions for actual participation in violent activities or narcotics trafficking from cases of executions based purely on the defendants' beliefs, statements, or associations, given the regime's practice of cloaking the latter category with trumped-up charges from the former category, but the number of purely political executions in 1985 reportedly includes dozens of persons arrested during demonstrations and summarily executed. At least 6 Baha'is were killed for religious reasons in 1985.

Amnesty International's 1985 annual report recorded an estimated 6,108 executions for all causes in Iran between February 1979 and the end of 1984; the report noted, however, that "Amnesty International believed the true figures were much higher, as former prisoners and relatives of prisoners consistently testified that large numbers of political prisoners were executed in secret."

Political killings were also perpetrated by opposition groups, including the Mojahedin-e-Khalq, a terrorist organization sometimes known as the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran. The Mojahedin have claimed responsibility for assassinations with firearms, and dozens of innocent persons, including a 4-year-old girl, were killed in 1985 by bombs exploded in public places. The Mojahedin are also believed responsible for bombs delivered, and in some cases exploded, at Iranian diplomatic missions in other countries.

Killings related to the insurrection in the Kurdish area also continue. Although there are no reliable statistics, many deaths have resulted not only from fighting between dissident Kurdish groups and the regime and from regime forces' summary executions of Kurds in captured territory, but also as a result of internecine fighting among Kurdish groups.

Disappearances are seldom permanent in Iran. People are arbitrarily arrested or carried off, they are held without charge, and some are summarily executed; the society, however, is not tightly controlled, so a persistent relative can usually determine who was responsible for the arrest and locate the detainee. Although many relatives are not officially informed of executions, they seem to find out and can often confirm rumor by checking burial records at Tehran's cemetery.

There are, however, some cases of long-term disappearance. One report obtained by Amnesty International stated that sometimes opposition members are listed as "killed while resisting arrest" when in fact they are still alive and in jail. Most such arrests are believed to be the work of the Revolutionary Guard and to be sanctioned by the regime.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Stories of torture in Iran's prisons are rampant and cover a wide range of inhuman practices, particularly in Evin Prison in Tehran, Iran's largest and most notorious. Mock executions are a favorite method of torture there, along with blindfolding and solitary confinement. Beatings of all kinds appear to be common. Prisoners are beaten on the soles of their feet until they can no longer walk. Others have had damaged kidneys as a result of being kicked and beaten.

This torture occurs in government prisons or in government houses in which prisoners of special interest are held for questioning. Presumably it takes place with the sanction of top officials. Many of these reports come from individuals who themselves were in the prisons and who, in some cases, experienced the torture.

The regime continues to revise Iran's civil code to conform more closely with its interpretation of Islamic law. In January the Government announced the development and inauguration of a new machine for surgical amputation of the hands of convicted thieves. As interpreted in Iran, this punishment consists of amputation of the four fingers of the right hand. There were subsequent announcements of the occasional use of this device. Death by stoning reportedly has been reinstated as a punishment for certain crimes against morality, at least in the city of Kerman. There are many reports of floggings, both as a means of torture and as a formal punishment for sexual offenses.

The jails are grossly overcrowded. Toilet facilities are inadequate or totally lacking. Medical treatment is not available, unless the guards believe a prisoner will break and "confess" if enticed by treatment of his wounds. Food is inadequate and sometimes full of dirt and bugs.

In its report, "Torture in the Eighties," Amnesty International expressed concern that torture has become a routine practice in at least some Iranian prisons and noted in particular two kinds of ill-treatment of prisoners: the officially sanctioned punishment of prisoners by whipping, and the torture of prisoners held in incommunicado detention during interrogation to extract confessions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests for expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government have decreased during the past 3 years, in part because of the widespread fear of arrest. If there is a formal accusation, the charge is usually subversion, antiregime activities, or treason. There is also evidence that some persons are arrested on trumped-up criminal charges (for example, on drug charges) when their actual "offenses" are political; the lack of fair trials and other procedural safeguards encourages such a practice. Political arrests are made by members of the Revolutionary Guard or, less commonly, by Komiteh members. Regular police and gendarmes are normally not involved in arrests made on political or morals charges. In political cases, there normally are no warrants for arrest. There is no judicial determination of the legality of detention in Iranian law. Detainees are frequently held for long periods without charge and in some cases have been tortured, only to have the mullah (Muslim cleric) who supervises the prison apologize subsequently for the mistake. For political crimes, no access to a lawyer is permitted; such cases are heard, if at all, by the revolutionary judiciary. Bail is not permitted in political cases.

Although the Constitution does guarantee many basic human rights, including rights related to due process (e.g., the right to be informed in writing of charges immediately after arrest, the right to legal counsel, the right to trial by jury in political cases), the revolutionary court system ignores these provisions in practice. There are no reliable estimates of the number of persons arbitrarily arrested in 1985, but the number is probably in the thousands.

Persons suspected of involvement in antiregime activities are all subject to the same procedures. They are arrested by Revolutionary Guard or Komiteh members. Those suspected of minor offenses are held for questioning at local Revolutionary Guard offices. Sometimes they are released after several hours or several days, a process that may be repeated two or three times before the authorities decide the detainee is innocent or that he is guilty and should be jailed. Other suspects are taken directly to one of the prisons where they may be held for weeks, months, or even years prior to being released or executed. Some who have been released report being called for questioning on several different occasions. In some cases a mullah is involved, in others unidentified questioners, sometimes including torturers. It is also unclear whether this questioning constitutes a trial by a revolutionary court or whether it is part of the investigative process.

Information as to whether forced labor is used in Iran is unavailable.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Most of those arrested have a trial of some sort, but, although so-called trials of major opposition figures are sometimes telecast, no trial by a revolutionary court can be called fair or public. If the trial is given publicity, it is generally because the prisoner has already been forced to confess to crimes. Restraints on arbitrary actions of the revolutionary courts were reportedly severely weakened in 1985 by a decision to limit the review authority of the Supreme Court. Formerly, all cases decided by the revolutionary courts were subject to review by the Supreme Court, permitting improper decisions to be overturned, but under the new decision the Supreme Court can only examine those cases which are recommended for review by the Supreme Judicial Council, which consists of the Chief Justice, the Prosecutor General, and three mullahs.

For common criminal offenses, many elements of the prerevolutionary judicial system survive, and the accused often have the right to a public trial with benefit of lawyers of their own choosing, assuming they can afford the fee. Even this judiciary is not fully independent. Many of the former judges were retired after the revolution, and new judges selected. One criterion for new judges is grounding in Islamic law, and political acceptability is an absolute requirement for any government position. Assignment of cases to regular rather than revolutionary courts is haphazard and apparently occurs mainly when arrests are made by regular police. Favorable verdicts reportedly can often be "purchased" from the judges serving on civil and criminal courts and to a lesser degree from judges of revolutionary courts.

IRAN

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government is attempting to remake Iranian society according to Khomeini's interpretation of Shi'a Islam. It rejects the Western distinction between a public sphere which the Government may control and a sphere of private life (religion, culture, thought, and private behavior) which the State may not properly control. The regime defines itself as Islamic and attempts to enforce a way of life asserted to be Islamic.

Since Khomeini's eight-point decree of December 1982, Iranians have enjoyed greater freedom in their private life. One of the eight points was that no one had the right to enter private homes without a warrant. An exception was made for suspected hideouts of opposition groups. The decree did say that if Revolutionary Guards entered a home believing it to be an opposition hideout and found they had made a mistake, they were to depart, even if they had found evidence of un-Islamic activities such as the presence of alcoholic beverages. The decree also stated that mail should not be opened nor telephones tapped unless there was good reason to suspect antiregime activities. Homes are still entered, mail is still opened, and phones are still tapped, but much less so than previously. Moreover, Iranians now have a decree by Khomeini on which to base complaints. A Headquarters for the Enforcement of the Imam's Decree was set up, as were a number of provincial and local offices. These offices, which may still be in operation, received thousands of complaints about violations of rights of privacy.

Special Revolutionary Guard units check on social activities. Women whose clothing does not completely cover the hair and all of the body except hands and face, or who wear make-up, are subject to arrest. If they are, in the words of the Prosecutor General, "reformable," they may be lectured and released. If considered defiant, they may go to jail.

The schools are reportedly used by the regime to assure that students' families behave in an "acceptable, Islamic manner." Children are asked about the habits of their parents, and un-Islamic behavior is reported to Revolutionary Guard units.

Neighborhood Komitehs, which originally acted as "block wardens," monitoring activities of residents, seem to be less active now. There have been efforts to disband them and many may have in fact disappeared.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution states that "publications and the press may express ideas freely, except when they are contrary to Islamic principles, or are detrimental to public rights." In practice, most publications are controlled by the Government or by the Islamic Republican Party, and the remaining independent publishers run the risk not only of press shutdowns and confiscation of publications and equipment but of arrest and summary punishment if they are overly critical of the regime. Examples of such punishments were sufficiently numerous in past years to retain a chilling effect. All books are required to be submitted to the Ministry of Islamic

IRAN

Guidance for censorship before they can be published. Publishers, authors, and printers also engage in substantial "self-censorship" before submitting books to the Ministry, due to the substantial penalties, including economic losses, incurred when books are rejected.

Closure in June of the radical daily newspaper Azadegan was extensively criticized by the press, and the paper's publishers were later permitted to publish a new daily, Abrar. While there are competing newspapers in Iran, and officials and policies of the Government are often subjected to public criticism, newspapers must be supportive of Khomeini's concept of the Islamic Republic, and they do not criticize Khomeini or key policies. Nevertheless, some independent publishers out of favor with the regime continued to survive in 1985, and some books and pamphlets critical of the regime were published without reprisal. All broadcasting facilities are government-owned.

Academic freedom has increased in the last 3 years. Universities have reopened and are under looser constraints. The regime remains committed, however, to the elimination of all un-Islamic influences, and textbooks are reviewed to determine their acceptability. Foreign books, newspapers, and magazines either are not permitted or may be imported only after review.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association.

Although the Constitution permits unarmed assemblies and marches "provided they do not violate the principles of Islam," the only ones permitted in practice are those sponsored by the Government, such as Friday prayers and sermons and parades on official occasions. As in the past, there were numerous cases during 1985 of outbursts of public protest, but these were forcibly dispersed, and hundreds were arrested and dozens reportedly executed during the year for taking part in such demonstrations. The Constitution permits parties, groups, professional associations, and both Islamic and minority religious associations, but most independent organizations have either been banned or are moribund. Restrictions on freedom of speech and assembly discouraged the participation in the 1984 parliamentary elections of any party other than the semiofficial Islamic Republican Party (IRP). Only IRP candidates were permitted to run in the 1985 presidential election, although at least two other legal parties exist.

There were until recently no legal labor unions, although some unauthorized unions had been organized and were active. However, a new national labor union, the "Islamic Union," was reportedly created in late 1985 under a law enacted by the Majles. All economic concerns with a minimum of 50 employees are permitted to have a branch of the new union, whose goal is said to be to protect workers' interests and further their professional development. Nominally independent, it reportedly will be controlled by the Labor Ministry.

It is also believed that there are officially sanctioned "Islamic workers councils" in some factories. These, however, are more instruments of government control than bodies that represent workers' interests, although they have frequently been able to block layoffs or firings of workers. Several short-lived strikes in 1984 were dealt with severely. The leaders of a soft-drink plant workers' strike were reportedly arrested and executed. Other major strikes, involving steel workers in late 1984 and petroleum refinery workers in late 1984 and early 1985, reportedly were settled peacefully.

c. Freedom of Religion

Iran terms itself an Islamic republic, and religion is closely intertwined with government. Grand Ayatollah Khomeini is recognized as the supreme leader, and this position is viewed as having something akin to divine sanction. The President and many other top officials are mullahs (religious leaders), as are the Speaker of the Majles and nearly half the Majles deputies.

Approximately 90 percent of Iranians are Shi'a Muslims. Aside from slightly over 1 percent who are non-Muslims (Baha'is, Christians, Zoroastrians, and Jews), the rest are Sunni Muslims. The Sunnis, who are mostly non-Persians--Kurds, Arabs, Turkomans, Baluch, and other ethnic minorities--tend to be located in remote tribal areas. Their political influence is very limited. The Constitution declares that "the official religion of Iran is Islam and the sect followed is Ja'fari Shi'ism," but it also states that "other Islamic denominations shall enjoy complete respect." Although Sunnis have encountered religious discrimination on the local level and in many cases persecution based on ethnic origin, the regime has made efforts to reduce Shi'a-Sunni antagonism.

Tests of Islamic knowledge and orthodoxy, required in the early postrevolutionary years for public or semipublic employment and enrollment in higher education, have been dropped in recent years on the grounds that they conflict with the constitutional provision that "the interrogation of people regarding their beliefs is forbidden." This provision is ignored, however, in the treatment of members of the Baha'i faith.

The Baha'i religion is not recognized in Iran, and since the revolution the Baha'is, Iran's largest non-Muslim minority (300,000-350,000 members), have suffered severe persecution, mainly government-directed and aimed at the religious leadership. Baha'i property has been confiscated, shrines demolished, businesses disbanded or confiscated, and known Baha'is denied public-sector employment. These measures effectively deny employment to most urban Baha'is. Much of the Baha'i religious leadership has been arrested, as have many ordinary Baha'is. Charges are vague; "crimes against God," "corruption on earth," "warring against God," and "Zionism" are among the most frequent. The real reason for the arrests seems to be advocacy of Baha'ism. As of December, 1985, 767 Baha'is were in jail. Approximately 200 Baha'is have been executed or have died following torture since the beginning of the revolutionary period, at least 6 during 1985.

In August 1983, the Prosecutor General issued an order that effectively bans all Baha'i religious activity and provides the legal foundation on which virtually all members of the faith could be charged with crimes. Participation by Baha'is in social welfare organizations is forbidden, their businesses are outlawed, and teaching of the faith, even by parents to children in the home, is not permitted. Although the Baha'i national leaders dissolved the community's organizations in obedience to the Prosecutor General's edict, they were subsequently arrested, and at least some were executed.

The small Christian, Jewish, and Zoroastrian (the pre-Islamic religion of Iran) populations are concentrated mainly in urban areas. Their religions are recognized by the Constitution, and they elect representatives to seats reserved for them in the Majles. They are permitted to practice their religions, to instruct their children, and, although with a great deal of disruptive interference, to maintain schools. There continue to be reports of officially sanctioned discrimination against these minorities, particularly in the areas of employment and public accommodations, and of severe discrimination by the Government against Muslims who have converted to Christianity.

The Constitution states that recognized religious minorities shall be free in matters related to teaching and that the teaching of ethnic-language literature is permitted. Armenian schools, closed during much of 1984 due to the Government's insistence that they could not use the Armenian language for instruction, reopened in late 1984 after an informal compromise was reached, but their status remains precarious.

Jewish groups report fewer such problems because the language spoken in Jewish homes and informally among Jews is Farsi. Jews, however, are subject to travel restrictions which are not applied to members of other recognized religious groups. In parts of Iran, Zoroastrians reportedly are considered "unclean" and are required to warn barbers, launderers, and restaurant owners that their service will be for "unclean" people, so that they can decide whether to serve such clients.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Iranians may travel to any part of Iran, except for the war zone on the border with Iraq and, in times of heavy fighting, some Kurdish areas. Such limitations as exist are for purposes of military security. Persons may also change their place of residence without obtaining permission.

Travel outside Iran is considerably easier than before the spring of 1983. Khomeini's decree of December 1982 included the right to travel abroad. Prior to that time passports and exit visas had been difficult to obtain. Males of draft age are not issued exit visas except for approved courses of study, and Iranians who are politically suspect, such as some retired military officers and high level public officials under the former regime, may not be able to leave. Also denied exit visas are persons who have not repaid loans obtained from development banks under the old regime. Reportedly some Iranians, particularly those with skills in short supply and who were educated at government expense, are required to post bonds to obtain exit visas. Jewish Iranians are permitted to obtain passports and to travel, but they are normally denied the multiple-exit visas given to most Iranians and must make a fresh application (with a fresh fee) for each planned trip. Permission is not normally given for all members of a given Jewish family to travel outside Iran at the same time. Baha'is are not permitted to obtain passports or to leave the country.

With the exception of some with close ties to the former regime, Iranians are generally able to return after long periods abroad without reprisal. Not all citizens who leave, however, are guaranteed the right to return. Iranians suspected of close association with the old regime have encountered problems obtaining new passports, and there are unconfirmed reports that a few were arrested in 1985 on their return. However, numerous other immediate relatives of persons wanted by the regime seem able to live in Iran, travel outside, and return without undue difficulty, and in recent years many who fled at the time of the revolution have returned and have sought, through the Iranian judicial system, the return of their properties.

Iranian passports have always been stamped "not valid for emigration," but the Government does not make a clear distinction between legal residence in another country and emigration. According to the regulations, Iranians with a legal residence outside Iran may be issued passports and advance exit visas by the Iranian embassy, consulate, or interests section in their country of residence. Iranians who have acquired U.S. citizenship are considered Iranian (in effect dual nationals) unless they have formally renounced their Iranian citizenship in accordance with Iranian law. Dual nationals have complained that the Iranian Interests Section in Washington, D.C., will neither give them visas in their U.S. passports nor issue them Iranian passports and exit visas on the grounds that their residence in the U.S. is not legal because, according to Iranian law, they emigrated illegally. Although such services may be denied, there are no known instances of the denial of Iranian citizenship to Iranians who left Iran, or to those who have remained there.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Iran is ruled by a group of religious leaders and their lay associates who share belief in Ayatollah Khomeini as the supreme leader of the revolution and in the legitimacy and desirability of a theocratic state based on his interpretation of Shi'a Islam. Of Iran's political parties, only the Islamic Republican Party is represented in the Government, and most high-level government officials belong to it. Roughly half the winning candidates in the 1984 Majles elections were members; the remainder were elected as independents.

Beginning a year after the Shah's departure, the revolutionary regime has held elections at fairly regular intervals for President, Majles deputies, members of the Council of Experts (responsible for choosing Khomeini's successor), and members of local government councils. All elections have been hard fought, generally with several candidates for every position. All candidates must be approved by the Council of Guardians, however, and only those meeting the Council's vaguely described political and religious criteria may run. In practice, only supporters of the theocratic state are accepted. There has, however, been considerable diversity of opinion among candidates on economic and social questions.

A presidential election was held in 1985, but the Council of Guardians denied certification as candidates to 51 of 54 applicants. Only the incumbent President, Hojjatollah Ali Khamenei (Secretary General of the IRP), and two fellow members of the IRP were permitted to run. The President was reelected with a reported 87 percent majority, with both his majority and the level of voter participation lower than in the 1981 election.

IRAN

The independence of the Majles is enshrined in the Constitution and exists to a large degree in practice. While Majles deputies are typically allied with various powerful political and religious officials, they may speak and vote independently and may shift from one faction to another. The Majles holds genuine debates, normally broadcast live on radio, on a wide variety of issues but not, however, including central issues such as the war or the fundamental character of the Islamic Republic. In some cases, laws proposed by the Government have been voted down. Prime Minister Musavi was heavily criticized before and after the presidential election, and there were public calls for his replacement. Following Khomeini's expression of support for Musavi's continuation in office, the Majles voted to reconfirm him, but 40 percent of the deputies voted against him or abstained. In October, after Khomeini convoked Majles deputies and informed them of his desire for the rapid approval of Musavi's new Cabinet, the deputies voted independently on the proposed ministers, approving 22 ministers by widely varying margins but rejecting 2 incumbent ministers. On several previous occasions the Prime Minister's nominees to fill ministerial vacancies were rejected. Rejection of bills and officials by the Majles is accepted by the executive branch.

The Constitution provides for a Council of Guardians composed of 12 members, 6 clerics unilaterally appointed by Khomeini, and 6 lay members well-grounded in Islamic law who are nominated by the head of the Judicial Council subject to the Majles' approval. The Council of Guardians must certify all bills passed by the Majles as being in accordance with Islamic law and the Constitution. If bills fail to be certified, they are sent back to the Majles for revision. They cannot become law until passed by the Majles and certified by the Council. The Council has rejected various important bills and portions of bills passed by the Majles, including legislation on land reform, foreign trade, private enterprise, the press code, and reform of the civil code.

The regime in Iran is disdainful of foreign human rights groups, government-sponsored or independent. A team of experts appointed by the U.N. Secretary General investigated conditions in prisoner-of-war (POW) camps in Iran and Iraq in January. There have been no other visits by any humanitarian group in recent years aside from the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which has also visited Iraqi POW's and has assisted in several small-scale POW exchanges between Iran and Iraq. There are no internal human rights groups. At its 1984 and 1985 sessions, the U.N. Human Rights Commission voted to appoint a special rapporteur on the human rights situation in Iran. The Government has refused to allow him entry to prepare his reports.

The ICRC has had access to some POW's, but not to all of those believed held in Iran. In a special appeal to the Permanent Representatives to the United Nations in Geneva in November 1984, President Hay of the ICRC stated that "...the repeated and systematic nature of the Iranian violations of the Third Geneva Convention is so serious that the ICRC feels that if it did not have recourse to this exceptional measure, it would jeopardize by its silence not only the lives of tens of thousands of men, but also the very future of humanitarian law." The U.N. Secretary General's report issued in February criticized conditions in prison camps in both Iran and Iraq.

Iran was the subject of a critical paragraph in the 1985 report of the International Labor Organization's Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Focusing on the treatment of Baha'is and others, the committee expressed concern over Iran's continued failure to comply with the Convention on Discrimination in Occupation and called upon the Government to ensure a policy consistent with the convention.

Amnesty International has written to Iranian officials, including Khomeini, protesting violations of human rights in Iran, but has received no reply. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern over the large number of executions, allegations of torture and other forms of ill-treatment of prisoners, the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, denial of fair trial to political prisoners, and religious persecution, particularly of Baha'is. Freedom House rates Iran "partly free" and explains this upgrading of its rating previous to 1984 in terms of the improvement in the electoral and parliamentary processes and in the right to privacy.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

There are no reliable statistics for the postrevolutionary period. The following World Bank economic and social indicators should be taken as rough estimates based in large part on statistics from the mid-1970's. In 1985, the population was about 45.2 million with a population growth rate of 3.1 percent. The gross national product (GNP) in 1982 was estimated at $66.3 billion, $1,620 per capita. This represents a sharp drop from the 1977 GNP of $77.8 billion and per capita GNP of $2,160, particularly when inflation is taken into account. The economy improved modestly in 1983 but stagnated in 1984 and declined in 1985.

Nearly all export income comes from petroleum. Oil exports averaged about 1.6 million barrels per day for most of 1985, approximately the same as in 1984 but significantly below the average of 1.9 million barrels per day in 1983. This amount was sufficient, in combination with a major drawdown of foreign currency reserves, to permit the import of food and other essential civilian items and of enough war materiel to maintain the war against Iraq. Acute and worsening shortages of foreign exchange nevertheless prevented adequate imports of industrial raw materials, machinery, and spare parts and contributed to a decline in industrial production, already at less than half the prerevolutionary level. Luxury items are often difficult to find, and there are still shortages of essential items, but most items are available, at inflated prices, on the black market. Support for the regime comes mainly from the urban lower classes, and the Government has attempted to see that the basic needs of this group are met. While all classes have suffered from electricity and water shortages in the cities, economic problems have been more severe for the middle- and upper-income groups who formerly enjoyed lives of comparative luxury.

The Iranian labor law, which exempts agriculture, domestic service, family businesses, and, to some extent, other small businesses, forbids employment of minors under 12 years and places special restrictions on the employment of minors under 18 and of women. Under the law, women and minors may not be used for hard labor or, in general, for night work. The labor law also establishes a 6-day work week of 48 hours maximum (except for overtime at premium rates), with 1 day of rest (normally Friday) per week as well as at least 12 days per year of leave with pay and a number of paid public holidays. Legal provisions have also been made for minimum wages and regarding health and safety in workplaces. Given the large segments of the economy exempted from the labor law, the State's still unresolved administrative disorganization resulting from the revolution, the effects of the war with Iraq, and the general lack of labor unions which are both legal and effective, it is unclear to what extent the provisions of Iran's labor law actually affect most of the labor force. Despite the war, unemployment is high, probably in the 30 percent range.

Life expectancy at birth is 61.1 years, and the infant death rate is 112 per 1,000 live births. The adult literacy rate was 36.2 percent in 1976. The primary school enrollment ratio in 1982 was 81.3 percent (93.7 per cent for boys but only 68.3 percent for girls). Universities were closed in 1980-81 but have reopened, with attendance reportedly at record levels in 1985.

Ultraconservative dress, entirely hiding the hair and all of the body except the face and hands, is now an absolute requirement for all women, regardless of their religion, national origin, citizenship, or diplomatic status. Women are harassed, detained, or physically attacked if they appear in public in clothing which official or self-appointed guardians of public morality deem insufficiently modest. Harassment of women intensified in Tehran during two weeks of demonstrations in April by radical supporters of the regime demanding stricter enforcement of the Islamic dress requirements. The President, reacting to spreading violence, ordered the demonstrations to cease. Employment opportunities for women are more restricted than was the case under the Shah. Women are legally barred from being judges. Although there are cultural barriers making employment in professional level positions difficult to obtain, women do work as lawyers, physicians, and statisticians, and in other professions in both the public and private sectors. Four women serve as deputies in the Majles.

The Family Protection Act, passed under the Shah, was revoked by the Islamic Government and replaced by a civil code reflecting Islamic law. A bill passed in mid-1983 did, however, give women the right to divorce their husbands, and regulations announced in 1984 substantially broadened, to 12, the number of grounds for which a woman may seek divorce. A husband may still obtain a divorce without having to state a reason or go to court. The new marriage regulations provide for improved financial settlements for wives whose husbands divorce them.

IRAQ

Iraq is governed by the Arab Ba'ath Socialist Party (ABSP) of Iraq through a Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) which has both executive and legislative authority under the provisional Constitution of 1968. Saddam Hussein holds decisive power as President of the Republic, Chairman of the Council, and Secretary-General of the Regional Command of the AESP.

Iraq contains many disparate groups, most notably Shi'a and Sunni Arab Muslims, Kurds, Turcomans, and various Christian sects, predominantly Assyrians and Chaldeans.

In 1985 the war with Iran continued into its sixth year. A major Iranian offensive in March severely tested the Iraqi southern defenses before being defeated. Iran continues to reject Iraqi and international calls for a cease-fire, and to use both military action and terrorism in efforts to overthrow Iraq's secular political system. Tight domestic controls imposed by the Iraqi regime in the name of national security remain in effect, including a decree which prescribes the death penalty for anyone who damages the country's military, political, or economic position. Wartime travel restrictions, which prevent most Iraqis from departing the country, also remained in force. Iranian prisoners of war (POWs) in Iraq are estimated at approximately 10,000. Most are believed to be registered with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which visits the camps. In the past, POWs in Iraq were believed to have faced instances of physical mistreatment and inadequate diet, but the ICRC reported that treatment in 1985 was improved.

The Ba'ath Party's ideological commitment to increased social, labor, and educational opportunities for women and to the protection of religious minorities continues to be translated into practical action. Iraq has continued to abjure support for terrorist groups and to state its opposition to terrorism. It has said that support for the Palestinian cause does not signify that it condones actions such as the Achille Lauro hijacking. On the other hand, political and individual rights are sharply limited. The news media are subject to censorship. Antiregime activity is dealt with harshly, often by extralegal means employed by a large and feared internal security police force and the intelligence services.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Execution has been an established method for dealing with perceived political and military opponents of the Government, particularly members of the outlawed Da'wa Party (fundamentalist Shi'a Muslim) and the Communist Party. In July 1985 Iraq confirmed to Amnesty International the execution of 16 individuals: 6 members of the banned Kurdistan Democratic Party for committing acts of sabotage, and 10 members of the prominent Hakim family for organizing an opposition political movement and suspected involvement with the Da'wa Party. There have been unconfirmed reports of the execution without trial of three members of the Iraqi Assyrian community for nationalist political activity. Members of the political elite have also been executed as a result of factional conflict, although no such executions are known to have occurred since 1982.

In 1983 and 1985, the military conducted aerial attacks on Kurdish villages suspected of supporting Iranian military incursions into Iraq or harboring antigovernment guerrillas, resulting in unknown numbers of casualties. From time to time there have been reports of executions of military deserters.

After the March 1985 Iranian offensive, Iran renewed charges that Iraq had used chemical weapons, allegations denied by Iraq. In March the State Department spokesman condemned Iraqi use of chemical weapons. Iraq is a party to the 1925 Geneva Protocol banning use, but not production, of lethal and incapacitating chemical weapons. There are indications that Iraq continues to stockpile lethal agents.

Iraq is believed to have withdrawn its support in 1983 from such terrorist groups as the Black June Organization led by Sabri Al-Banna, or "Abu Nidal," and the May 15 organization under Husayn Mohammed Al-Umari, or "Abu Ibrahim." Recent reports surfacing in the wake of the Achille Lauro hijacking indicate that Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) Executive Committee Member "Abu Abbas" of the Palestinian Liberation Front presented an Iraqi diplomatic passport when detained by Italian officials. The Iraqis maintain that the passport was issued to him in recognition of his official position as a member of the PLO Executive Committee and not to facilitate the execution of terrorist acts. The Iraqis themselves were the victims of several terrorist acts in 1983, 1984, and 1985 supported by Syria and Iran.

Iraqi emigrants have reported that some suspects, particularly those detained by the security police for subversion, disappear following detention. It is difficult in such cases to ascertain whether the suspect has been executed or has died while incarcerated. In October 1983 Amnesty International submitted to Iraq the names of 114 people whose whereabouts remain unknown since their abduction between 1979 and 1982. Subsequent reports from Amnesty International indicate other instances of disappearance, among which is the alleged disappearance in 1984 of 153 Assyrians.

Antigovernment Kurds in Northern Iraq occasionally kidnap foreign workers and businessmen. Ransom demands have included money, a halt to Western economic cooperation with Iraq, and support for the release of prisoners in Iraq. Victims generally have been released following negotiations involving overseas Kurdish representatives, the victims' employers, and Iraqi security organizations.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture and prescribes stiff punishment for it, and the Government rejects charges that it practices torture. Nevertheless, reliable reports make clear that both physical and psychological torture are used by the authorities, especially the security police. Given the rigid chain of command within the Government and security services, it is unlikely that torture could be practiced without the authorization of senior officials.

IRAQ

According to former prisoners, persons detained by the security police for political or security-related matters are frequently tortured and mistreated. Treatment is reported to be worst immediately following arrest and during the period of interrogation and investigation, which can last for months. Torture and brutal treatment are not limited to political cases. Security-related offenses include such routine criminal matters as currency violations.

The security forces' methods of torture, often to extract confessions or information about the suspect and his colleagues, reportedly include beatings with fists and rubber truncheons, electrical shocks to the genitals and other parts of the body, and the extraction of fingernails and toenails. A Tunisian, who was detained for 10 months by Iraqi security forces and released in 1984, alleged torture while in custody. Subsequent medical examinations in Paris under the auspices of Amnesty International concluded that the signs of physical and mental trauma were consistent with the allegations.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution and legal code guarantee the rights of citizens and place checks on police powers in such areas as arrest, detention, imprisonment, and search. These guarantees are generally respected in criminal cases but have little weight in political or national security cases. Security police not only make arbitrary arrests but also secretly detain suspects, whose fate sometimes has become known only after execution. Charges have included espionage, treason, and conspiracy against Iraq or the party and revolution, often in collaboration with unnamed foreign foes.

In the past, Iraq expelled large numbers of Iranians and Iraqis of supposed Iranian descent. These deportations have ceased; however, those remaining often live under the fear of deportation or incarceration. Many "Iranian" families have been in Iraq for generations. Some say their forebears were not from Iran but claimed the nationality to evade Ottoman military conscription. Citizens considered to be of Iranian origin bear special identification, often precluding desirable employment or impeding advancement.

Iranian military deserters and civilians who fled to Iraq during the war have been detained and sometimes mistreated. Most of these people reportedly came to Iraq, after long and hazardous journeys through Kurdistan, in response to Iraqi propaganda promising good treatment and easy access to third countries. In response to the decrease in such Iraqi propaganda, the numbers of new arrivals at refugee camps have lessened. There have been frequent allegations that some have been shot or beaten with rubber hoses and metal cables. Some Iranian refugees reportedly have been coerced to collaborate with Iraqi propaganda despite the danger to family members in Iran. When, after many months, these emigres are designated "political refugees," their treatment improves and outside organizations gain access to them.

In recent years Amnesty International has reported the imprisonment or detention of large numbers of Kurds. Many have been removed to resettlement camps. In a separate report of July 1985, Amnesty International reported the death while imprisoned of a member of a group of 90 males reported to have been in detention without charge or trial since their arrest in May 1983.

Following the replacement of the head of the general intelligence directorate in late 1983, it is believed that the number of political prisoners and arbitrary arrests declined. The Da'wa Party, a violent dissident Shi'ite Group, is still proscribed, and its members are subject to incarceration and execution, as are members of other parties believed to be cooperating with Iran.

There is no indication that Iraq uses forced labor. Apart from the expulsion of thousands of residents of Iranian descent in 1980 and earlier, exile is not resorted to as a means of punishment.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials in civil, criminal, and religious courts are open. Defendants are entitled to counsel. A lawyer is provided if a defendant cannot afford one. Charges and evidence are available for review. Appellate courts hear cases not under the jurisdiction of the revolutionary courts. The revolutionary courts, which usually hold closed trials, deal with espionage, treason, smuggling, and drug trafficking. The right of defense in such courts reportedly is severely restricted.

The "special courts" constituted by the Revolutionary Command Council for specific incidents, such as the reported conspiracy against the regime in 1979, are also closed. These special tribunals are apparently exempt from constitutional safeguards of defendants' rights. The right of defense is proscribed; defendants are held incommunicado, and confessions extracted by torture are used against defendants. Appeals can be taken only to the Chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council. However, the availability of this appeal may be questioned, since there are reports that executions take place shortly after trial.

Political dissidence in Iraq is taken by the authorities to encompass a wide range of activities and, in an environment where no public acknowledgement is made of arrest or imprisonment, it is extremely difficult to gauge the number of political prisoners. Amnesty International received reports of "several hundred people" being detained for political reasons in 1984. Undoubtedly the practice has continued in 1985.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides protections for the inviolability of the home, and strong cultural values reinforce these protections. Police must obtain a search warrant before entering the home of a criminal suspect. Warrants are not required for the arrest of security suspects. Although most arrests occur outside the home, there have been reports of forced entry and arrest by the security police, particularly of suspected members of the outlawed Da'wa Party.

In late 1985, Iraqi government forces reportedly conducted large-scale searches of homes in at least one city in a predominantly Kurdish area and detained a number of people.

IRAQ

There is no legal protection against the monitoring of telephones, which many Iraqis believe to be a common practice. Likewise, all mail is believed subject to review by censors. Government security services and the Ba'ath Party are generally assumed to maintain pervasive networks of informers.

Membership in the ruling Ba'ath Party is viewed as a key to advancement inside and outside the Government. Although the Ba'ath is an elitist party, recruitment can be aggressive. Some emigrants have claimed that they joined the party to avoid beatings or harassment or to enhance career prospects.

Certain ethnic and religious groups within Iraq traditionally reside in particular areas of the country. Kurds, for example, have strong roots in the north. The Government has sometimes tried to force changes in settlement patterns. Most relocations of Kurds took place in the mid-1970's. More recently, families and villages of the Barzani tribe were forcibly resettled following the participation by tribe leaders and members in Iran's 1983 invasion of northern Iraq. Rather than allow Iranian Kurdish refugees displaced by the war to remain in the northern mountainous terrain to which they are accustomed, the Government is holding this large population in detention camps elsewhere. One such camp, located in the desert west of Baghdad, is believed to contain up to 25,000 people. The Iraqis also provide shelter to thousands of displaced ethnic Arabs from Iran's Khuzistan Province.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government views political dissent as a security threat, and controls exercise of the rights of speech, press, and assembly. The Constitution prohibits "any act aimed at undermining the national unity of the people, providing racial, sectarian, and regional bigotry, or violating gains and achievements of the country." Nonetheless, the use of minority languages is unrestricted. Kurdish, an official language, is used in schools and media in Kurdish areas.

The Government owns and operates the press, radio, and television. The media do not criticize the Government and news reporting is strongly biased. Opposition viewpoints are not heard. Few foreign periodicals reach Iraq, and Western newspapers are not sold. Foreign visitors' newspapers, magazines, and cassettes can be confiscated at the airport. To control the dissemination of political leaflets, typewriters and photocopying machines must be registered.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings are organized only under the auspices of the Government or Ba'ath Party. Nonreligious free association and demonstrations without government approval have met severe repression. Professional organizations are subject to control by the Ba'ath Party Central Vocational Bureau.

Union workers do not represent a significant part of the total work force, comprised mostly of agricultural workers, shopkeepers, and government employees. Industrial workers, the most unionized, are only a small portion of the work force. Workers are organized in the Federation of Trade Unions under the control of the Ba'ath Party Central Labor Bureau. Unions may operate only under officially approved guidelines. Elections are held for union executive councils, which in turn select officers from among the council membership. Nominees are mainly party members. The right to bargain collectively is not recognized. Workers legally have the right to strike after providing notice to the Labor Ministry, but no strikes have been reported since 1968. The unions initiate grievances, but a primary union function is to indoctrinate members with Ba'athist ideology. Union membership is a prerequisite for employment in some sectors.

c. Freedom of Religion

Iraq is an ethnically and religiously diverse society. Many non-Muslims, principally Jews and Christians, left Iraq under previous regimes. Members of religious minorities have expressed fear that they would again face persecution if Iran were to impose an Islamic regime in Baghdad. Since its rise to power in 1968, the Ba'athist Government has enforced tolerance of religious diversity, seeking to submerge religious differences in the promotion of secular nationalism.

A 1981 law gave the Ministry of Endowments and Religious Affairs the authority to promulgate laws and regulations governing places of worship, appointment of clergy, religious literature, and participation in religious councils and meetings. However, while the Government has assumed much greater authority in Islamic religious affairs since 1981, the law has not been invoked against Iraq's Christian sects. Religious leaders operate under close government supervision. Muslim leaders are considered government employees and receive their salaries through the Government. The Government administers the principal Muslim shrines and mosques and has increased allotments to refurbish and maintain them in an apparent attempt to win support from the devout.

The Shi'a, who make up roughly 55 percent of the population, historically have been economically, politically, and socially disadvantaged. The Government has a declared policy to raise their living standards and equalize opportunities for economic and professional advancement. In recent years, the Government and party have promoted Shi'a into prominent positions, and the economic and social status of the Shi'a has improved markedly. Nevertheless, the Government maintains a close watch against Iranian attempts to exploit dissatisfaction among Iraqi Shi'a, who share the same branch of Islam prevalent in Iran.

Over 500,000 Christians constitute nearly four percent of the population. Their freedom of worship in churches of established denominations is legally protected, but they are not permitted to proselytize or to hold meetings outside church premises. Convents and monasteries exist and some new churches are constructed, in some cases with government financial support. Although Christians sometimes allege discrimination in education and jobs, adherence to their religion has not prevented many from obtaining wealth and professional advancement. The Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, a Chaldean Christian, represented Iraq at the meeting in late 1984 of foreign ministers of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. Other Christians hold important official and private positions.

IRAQ

The Jewish community is believed to have decreased from 150,000 following World War II to about 400. It was severely persecuted in the past, but there is no evidence of recent persecution. In 1985, a Western journalist visited the last known synagogue in Baghdad and confirmed that it is still functioning.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Iraqis are generally free to travel within the country and to change their residences or workplaces. However, they are likely to be constrained by social, cultural, and religious traditions which define the areas occupied by the various ethnic and religious groups. Sensitive border and other security areas are off-limits. Civilian travel in the war zone is restricted. Curfews are in effect where Kurdish insurgents have been active. There are police checkpoints on highways and outside major towns, but most Iraqis and foreigners travel freely in nonrestricted areas. Foreign diplomats must obtain Foreign Ministry permits for travel outside of Baghdad, which are usually granted when requested sufficiently in advance.

All Iraqis and most foreigners who have remained in the country for more than two weeks must obtain exit permission. Because of the war's drain on the economy, permission to travel abroad is restricted to a few categories of Iraqis, including officials, government-approved students, and persons needing medical treatments. The Iraqi Government seeks to limit the countries an Iraqi traveler may visit and, should the traveler visit a nonauthorized country, a small fine may be levied upon his return. Iraqis who have residences abroad may depart the country provided they originally had left before the war began. In general, a married woman must have the permission of her husband to travel abroad. The Government can require a prospective traveler to post a substantial bond to assure return. According to officials of the Higher Education Ministry, although Iraqi students abroad should get permission before accepting foreign scholarships or grants, they would not be punished upon return to Iraq for failure to have done so. If students on government scholarships abroad do not return, their families must repay the costs of the education.

There is no specific ban on emigration nor special restrictions for members of minority groups; however, emigration is discouraged. Prospective emigrants have had travel permission delayed and have been harassed. Many emigrants leave behind substantial property because of the difficulty of exporting assets. Currency exchange violations are considered national security offenses, and penalties can be severe.

Alien spouses of Iraqi citizens who have resided in Iraq for at least three years are required to become naturalized or leave Iraq. Many people, including several Americans, have thus been obliged to accept Iraqi citizenship and are therefore subject to the present travel restrictions. In March 1984 an RCC resolution reduced the residency period before naturalization to one year for the spouses of Iraqis employed at government offices. The Iraqi spouse faces penalties for noncompliance, including loss of job, a fine of approximately $10,000, and repayment of the costs of education.

IRAQ

In recent years, the Government has instituted special programs to encourage the repatriation of qualified professionals. Aliens of Iraqi origin can apply for a document permitting them to enter and exit Iraq without a visa. Former Iraqis can more easily obtain visitors' visas than other aliens, who generally must have an official sponsor.

Other persons of Iraqi origin are permitted to return, including many individuals who were admitted to other countries as refugees. A number of such people, especially Assyrian Christians, have returned on temporary visits. They are free to come and go, within the limits of the present travel restrictions, since they are not considered to have violated Iraqi laws. However, those who emigrated only after the beginning of the Iran-Iraq war, including several U.S. permanent resident aliens, have been unable to depart Iraq after returning.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The elitist Ba'ath Party, dominated by the President and the Party's Regional Command, rules Iraq. The Party reportedly has some 1.5 million adherents, representing about 10 percent of the population. However, only some 50,000 "active" or full members, less than 0.33 percent of the population, participate influentially in party activities. There are two other legal political parties, both Kurdish. They and the Ba'ath Party constitute the Patriotic and Progressive National Front, essentially a vehicle of support for the Government. The two non-Ba'ath parties carry on only limited activity. Members of the military or security services may engage in political activities only within the Ba'ath Party. Association with the party is not required for appointment to senior government positions or military ranks or election to the National Assembly, but normally is necessary to attain political influence. Opposition groups, including various Kurdish groups and splinter parties, are severely repressed. The Communist Party was removed from the National Front and declared illegal in 1979. In 1982 the Government amnestied Iraqi Communists both in Iraq and abroad, but the number released is unknown.

The outlawed, Iranian-supported Da'wa (Islamic Call) Party has been a major target of persecution. It has claimed violent acts against the Government in Iraq and abroad, and was implicated in the December 1983 truck bombing of the U.S. Embassy and other U.S., French, and Kuwaiti targets in Kuwait.

In 1984, general elections were held for the 250-seat National Assembly, first elected in 1980. The Government screened all the candidates for consonance with Ba'ath party ideology. Though in theory possessing a wide range of official duties, the Assembly exercises little real authority.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Iraq denies charges that it violates human rights. The Government acknowledges Amnesty International accusations and in a letter to Amnesty International in July 1985 confirmed approximately two-thirds of the executions Amnesty International said took place in February and March 1985. The Iraqi Government contends, however, that these have not been political executions but executions carried out for crimes against national security. In the past it has offered to investigate allegations of torture if the victims, interviewed outside Iraq, returned. None is known to have done so.

IRAQ

There is no government office or official charged with investigating human rights and coordinating with other governments and international organizations on human rights. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) delegation based in Iraq has made regular visits to Iranian prisoners of war (POWs) since 1980 and has assisted in Iraq's unilateral repatriation of some of them. Iraq has received the ICRC president and other delegates several times to discuss the treatment of POWs and the protection of civilians in the Iran-Iraq war. Although the ICRC has noted that material conditions in POW camps in Iraq have improved and that authorities have taken steps to end the random acts of brutality to which the ICRC had previously called their attention, reports still circulate of sporadic outbursts of violence against POWs in the camps. In its last published report in October 1985, covering the year 1984, the ICRC expressed concern that its representatives have been denied access to some prisoners. This situation continues. After an ICRC delegation visited Iraq in December of 1984, the ICRC gained access to prisoners who had been held since the previous spring offensive. The Iraqis apparently on occasion retard ICRC efforts to register new POWs as a means of pressuring Iran to permit access to and registration of Iraqi POWs.

Since February 1984 Iraq has cooperated with the ICRC in efforts to resettle Iranian civilian refugees in third countries. Approximately 60 such refugees had left for several host countries, including the United States, by November 1985.

In its 1985 report, Amnesty International continued to express concern about widespread arbitrary arrest of suspected opponents of the Government and their prolonged detention without charge or trial; disappearances; continued detention of civilians without legal proceedings in POW camps, apparently because of their ethnic origin; routine torture of detainees during interrogation and ill-treatment and detention of their families allegedly to exert pressure to cooperate during interrogation; and a large number of executions, mostly for political crimes. Freedom House calls Iraq "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Iraq's population is estimated at just over 15 million, and its growth rate at about 3.2 percent. Per capita gross national product (GNP) almost quintupled during the 1970's, rising from $630 in 1970 to $3,021 in 1980. Much of this increase, however, represented a pro rata share of accumulated foreign exchange reserves resulting from higher oil prices. When oil earnings were cut sharply after the outbreak of war, per capita GNP declined dramatically to $1,742 in 1981. Per capita GNP probably has increased in nominal terms since then, largely as a result of price inflation and an artificially high exchange rate.

The Government exerts a high level of control over the economy. The State owns all major industries, including petroleum and banking. However, the small private sector is important in some industries. The regime has been expanding the role of the private sector in the last couple of years, particularly in agriculture.

During the first two years of the war, the Government largely isolated the people from the war's economic impact by pursuing an ambitious development program. However, the loss of Iraq's offshore export terminals and closure of its oil pipeline through Syria cut oil exports from a prewar high of 3.2 million barrels to around 650,000 barrels per day. By late 1982 Iraq's foreign exchange reserves were nearly exhausted. The Government instituted a strict austerity program and slashed civilian imports, putting Iraq on a sounder financial footing but reducing the availability of consumer goods and the varieties of food.

Petroleum accounts for 95 percent of Iraq's export revenues, and the Government has given high priority to the restoration of oil export capacity. An expansion of the Turkish pipeline completed in 1984 increased oil exports to approximately 1 million barrels per day. The October 1985 opening of the spur line to the Saudi east-west pipeline offered a potential further increase of 500,000 barrels per day but output so far has been somewhat less. Work is continuing on a new, second pipeline through Turkey which will offer an additional 1 million barrels per day export capacity.

The feudal system of land ownership came to an end with the overthrow of the monarchy. In April 1981, President Hussein abandoned a program to impose collective farms on the East European model and returned land to private ownership.

Heavy migration from rural areas has resulted in substandard urban living conditions. Large-scale public housing projects are under construction. Subsidies and controls keep the prices affordable for most food staples, utilities, and transportation while other prices are rising.

Health care is free or provided at nominal cost. From 1968 to 1980 government programs boosted the number of medical workers from 9,000 to over 40,000, and increased medical training institutions from 3 to 65. In 1980, there was 1 doctor for every 3,000 people. Serious shortages of qualified medical workers remain; recent government decrees have offered increased benefits to men and women entering nursing. Moreover, a 1985 law decreed that all female secondary school and college graduates who seek government employment must first work as a nurse for one year.

Education is free through the university level. The Government offers scholarships for advanced study abroad. The number of students studying abroad has decreased during the war. In the last 10 years, enrollment in primary and secondary schools has more than doubled, with female enrollment largely responsible for the rise. The number of students in vocational schools and universities has increased markedly. According to the Government, implementation of the 1977 Anti-illiteracy Law has raised the literacy rate to 70 percent. As of 1985, over 1,700,000 Iraqis had graduated from literary centers.

Children are frequently encouraged to work as necessary to support the family, an acceptable social practice in the Middle East. The employment of children is forbidden in state-run enterprises or other than small-scale family enterprises. The urban work week is 6 days a week, 6 to 7 hours a day for government workers; on Friday all but private vendors are closed. Wages are set by the Government for public sector workers (i.e., the bulk of the employed) and do not adhere to any fixed per hour or per day rate; salaries are generally deemed low but adequate. Wages in the small private sector are set solely by supply and demand. Occupational safety programs are in effect in state-run enterprises and inspectors make irregular visits to private establishments; enforcement varies widely.

IRAQ

The Ba'ath Party has been committed to the equality of the sexes, and a series of laws since it came to power in 1968 has steadily improved the status of women. Such laws have protected women from exploitation in the workplace; granted subsidized maternity leave; permitted women to join the regular army, Popular Army, and police forces; and equalized women's rights on divorce, land ownership, taxation, suffrage, and election to the National Assembly. In the 1970s, the Government imposed legal penalties on families that opposed sending their women to literacy schools, and on men who were seen harassing women.

The percentage of female students among students in elementary schools climbed from 37.4 percent in 1977-78 to 46.4 percent in 1982-3. Secondary school female enrollment went from 29.2 to 34.5 percent in the same period. About 32 percent of the students at universities and technical institutes are female.

Women represent about 47 percent of agricultural workers and about 25 percent of the total work force. By 1977, women were reported to comprise 39 percent of teachers, 31 percent of doctors, 30 percent of chemists, 25 percent of physicists, 15 percent of accountants, 15 percent of civil servants, and 11 percent of factory workers. The war has accelerated the Government's drive to elevate the status of women, and some Iraqis believe that it has permanently broken cultural barriers to the acceptance of women in traditional male roles. Women have become increasingly visible as architects, construction engineers, oil engineers, air traffic controllers, factory and farm managers, and Air Force pilots. Some 40,000 women reportedly were volunteers in the Popular Army in 1982.

The General Federation of Iraqi Women (GFIW) was established in 1969, the regime's first year in power, to promote the Government's policies towards women. Membership in the GFIW does not require affiliation with the Ba'ath Party. The GFIW organizes conferences on women's issues, establishes training courses for women, implements programs to eradicate illiteracy, undertakes civilian war relief activities, and administers nurseries. It drew up a four-year plan (1983-86) to encourage women to work outside the home and has opened four employment offices in Baghdad for women graduates.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES*

Israel is a parliamentary democracy which guarantees by law and reflects in practice the civil, political, and religious rights of its citizens. It has free elections, a multiparty political system, an independent judiciary, and an elected legislature (the Knesset) which may restrict the government by legislation and can bring it down by a vote of no confidence. There is no constitution; a series of basic laws define the responsibilities of government institutions. Emergency regulations, associated with the state of emergency in force since the founding of the state in 1948, are still in effect.

In 1979, as provided in the Camp David Accords, Egypt and Israel signed a peace treaty ending the formal state of war which had existed between them since 1948. Israel and its other Arab neighbors continue to be in a formal state of war. Pursuant to the Egypt-Israel treaty, Israel returned the Sinai Peninsula to Egypt over a 3-year period. Israel continues to occupy other territories (the Golan Heights, Gaza Strip, the West Bank, and the eastern sector of Jerusalem) captured in the 1967 war. In early 1985, Israel withdrew the bulk of its troops from southern Lebanon, where they had been since the 1982 war, but it still maintains a residual presence and continues to support a local militia, the "Army of South Lebanon."

Many Israelis doubt that other Arab states are prepared to accept Israel's right to exist on the basis of U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. Terrorist incidents within Israel and the absence of peace treaties between Israel and its other Arab neighbors make security a dominant concern which affects many facets of Israel's national life.

Approximately 16 percent of the population of Israel are Arabs who do not share the Zionist principles upon which the state was founded. Some Jewish communities in Israel also reject Zionism.

Israel enjoys a relatively high standard of living. It has a market economy with substantial governmental participation and subsidized prices for basic commodities. Israeli economic policy has been oriented toward social welfare. In recent years, Israel has experienced increasing balance of payments deficits, rising foreign debt, triple-digit inflation, and a declining level of foreign exchange reserves. A new economic program, initiated at mid-year, is designed to reduce the level of inflation and improve Israel's international financial position.

Israeli society is characterized by its openness and by its wide-ranging and lively public debate of all issues of popular concern. Police and internal security functions are under the control of Cabinet ministers who must answer to the Knesset concerning the actions of personnel for whom they are responsible and whose performance is subject to the scrutiny of a vigorous free press.

*Because of the sharply differing sociopolitical environments in Israel and in the Arab territories which Israel has occupied since the 1967 war, the respective human rights situations are treated in separate but parallel fashion. The report on the occupied territories follows the report for Israel.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

As in the past, the most significant human rights problems for Israel in 1985 derived from the strained relations between the Israeli authorities and the Arab inhabitants of the occupied territories. These problems were exacerbated by attacks against Israelis in those areas and by acts of violence by Jewish settlers. During the year, Israeli leaders, including President Herzog and Prime Minister Peres, expressed concern over the growth of extreme views and violent actions and their effects on Israeli society.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no indication that political killing is sanctioned by Israeli authorities.

In 1985, terrorists killed and injured a number of Israelis and residents of territories under Israeli occupation. Despite the Israeli authorities' strong efforts to preempt terrorist attacks and to bring the perpetrators to justice, the number of terrorist incidents increased by 40 percent in the first 10 months, according to the Police Minister. The Minister ascribed 50 percent of these incidents to individuals not linked to any organization.

In 1985 the Justice Ministry concluded its investigation of the deaths of two Palestinian terrorists who died during interrogation in the immediate aftermath of a bus hijacking in 1984. The Ministry reiterated the findings of an earlier commission of inquiry that the two had died under interrogation and recommended that the area military commander, who had been present during the questioning, be brought to trial. A military court subsequently cleared him of direct responsibility for the deaths. The case of the two soldiers involved has not yet been resolved.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Such practices are prohibited. Evidence or confessions obtained under duress are inadmissible in court, and the administrative codes of conduct of the prison and police authorities contain stringent sanctions against the use of force or brutality. Police officers accused of brutality or violence against prisoners or suspects may be prosecuted either in administrative courts for violation of the code of conduct or in regular criminal courts for criminal assault. Acute overcrowding remains a problem in Israeli prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Israeli law provides strong guarantees against arbitrary arrest or imprisonment. Writs of habeas corpus and other procedural and substantive safeguards are available. Defendants are considered innocent until proven guilty.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Administrative detention may be employed in security-related cases when it is determined to the satisfaction of a judge that formally charging a person would compromise sensitive sources of evidence. Any individual under administrative detention is entitled to representation by counsel and must be brought before the president of the appropriate district court within 48 hours of being taken into custody. Upon application of the Defense Minister to a district court, the right to representation by counsel may be delayed from 48 hours to 7 days in most instances and up to 15 days in terrorist-related cases. Each case of administrative detention must be submitted to judicial review at least every 3 months thereafter for the entire period of detention. The decision of the president of the district court can be appealed to the Supreme Court.

Israel does not accord prisoner-of-war status under the Third Geneva Convention to prisoners captured during and after the Lebanese conflict who were not members of the armed forces of another country. Israel has maintained, however, that such detainees are treated in accordance with the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention in all matters relating to the guarantee of humane treatment and conditions of internment. It has stated that under the Fourth Geneva Convention it has the right to intern persons who constitute a danger to the security of the occupying power.

The Israeli Supreme Court confirmed in 1984 the applicability of the Fourth Convention in Lebanon but held that, for security reasons, Israel was permitted to deny the detainees access to family members and legal counsel.

In the course of the Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon more than 1,200 prisoners brought back from Lebanon were incarcerated at the Atlit camp as security risks in violation of the Fourth Geneva Convention which prohibits forcible transfers of protected persons from occupied territory to the territory of the occupying power. The Atlit prisoners were held incommunicado until Israel responded to international urging and allowed occasional visits by the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). They were released in phases, the last group on September 10, 1985.

On May 21, 1985, under the auspices of the ICRC, Israel released 1,150 prisoners, including 879 who had been convicted of security offenses and 150 Atlit detainees, in exchange for 3 Israeli military personnel who had been captured in Lebanon. About 400 were released in the occupied territories.

There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right of a hearing by an impartial tribunal with representation by counsel is guaranteed by law. The judiciary is independent and effectively insulated from political interference. With the exception of security cases, which may be tried by military courts, all trials are open. In security cases, Israeli law provides that part or all of a trial may be closed, with the burden of justifying nonpublic proceedings falling on the prosecution. Counsel is present during closed proceedings. In security cases, the law also provides for possible restriction on the choice of defense counsel, but there were no known cases in 1985 in which this provision was invoked.

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Privacy of the individual and the sanctity of homelife and correspondence are fully protected. There are effective legal safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press, limited by security-based censorship provisions, are basic rights in Israel. These rights are protected by law and the judiciary and are broadly exercised by citizens and individuals and by an independent and vigorous press, which expresses a wide variety of political opinion.

Media censorship is based on British Mandatory emergency regulations, according to which the censor may prohibit the publication of material which, in his opinion, will harm the defense of Israel, the public safety, or public order. Censorship decisions may be appealed through the judiciary. In practice, censorship of the media is usually limited to military security matters, and journalists generally know which security-related areas are off-limits to publication. Licenses to publish newspapers are required and normally are routinely issued.

Israeli radio and television are run by the Independent Israel Broadcast Authority (IBA). The Government helps to fund the IBA and appoints its governing board but has almost no control over programming. The independence of the IBA is protected by law, subject to the censorship provisions. Radio and television programs are in Arabic as well as in Hebrew.

Movies and theater are subject to censorship if deemed pornographic or otherwise offensive to religious or social mores or likely to create a disturbance of public order. Censorship board decisions can be appealed in the courts.

Possession and distribution of literature considered hostile to the State and issued by illegal Palestinian organizations are punishable offenses.

Israeli law forbids public manifestations of support for organizations defined by the State as terrorist in nature. Proscribed acts include flying the Palestinian flag or displaying its colors, displaying Palestinian nationalist slogans, and publicly expressing support for the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). In June 1985, four Israeli Arabs received prison terms of 3 to 6 months for displaying Palestinian flags during a rally in September 1982 protesting the massacre of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Beirut.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These are basic rights in Israel, protected, along with the right to demonstrate, by law and rulings of the courts. In the case of political rallies and outdoor meetings beyond an established size, permits are required and routinely granted. Existing laws prohibit contact, deemed harmful to the State, with the PLO, its subdivisions, and non-PLO organizations classified as terrorist groups. Pending legislation would further restrict such contacts. Legislation is also pending which, if passed, would ban "racist" political parties.

Israel has a free and democratic labor movement, which plays an important role in the social, economic, and political life of the country. Israel's most powerful labor organization, the General Federation of Labor (Histadrut), and its affiliates operate the largest national health insurance program and seven retirement pension systems, as well as a number of large industrial enterprises. Over 85 percent of the working population are Histadrut members. The membership includes 60 percent of the adult Israeli Arab population. Israeli workers, including those in the public sector, make frequent use of the right to strike. Histadrut has traditionally been active in the international field; it runs a large labor assistance program and is active in a number of international labor organizations.

Israel's labor laws are modern and comprehensive; they reflect the social democratic values of Israel's founding fathers and the conditions of employment negotiated by Histadrut over many years. The Collective Agreements Law of 1957 governs trade union representation and collective bargaining.

c. Freedom of Religion

Israel was founded as a Jewish State in which all citizens are guaranteed freedom of religion by law. Muslims, Christians, Druze, and other minority religious groups make up about 17 percent of the population. The prevailing interpretation of the Jewish nature of the State has been secular rather than religious. The Law of Return of 1950, which abolished all restrictions on Jewish immigration, and the Citizenship Law of 1952, which granted every Jew the right to citizenship upon arrival in Israel, confer an advantage on Jews in matters of immigration and citizenship.

All religious groups may maintain contacts with their coreligionists outside Israel. Foreign clergy are permitted to live in Israel to minister to their coreligionists. Several thousand Israeli Muslims make the pilgrimage to Mecca each year. There is no operating Islamic seminary in Israel. Muslims may obtain such training in institutions in East Jerusalem, the West Bank, Gaza, or Egypt. The International Center of the Baha'i religion is located in Haifa.

Israel has retained the Ottoman millet system under which each religious community is governed in matters of personal status by its own religious law and not by civil law. This feature of Israeli law gives each religious community freedom to observe its own customs and religion within the area where the millet system applies, but sometimes fails to protect the rights of individuals who do not follow the dominant tradition within their religious community. These difficulties do not normally arise in religious worship but do occur in areas such as marriage, legitimacy, inheritance, or conversion. In some religious communities, the rights of women are limited.

The Government was not a party to the dispute between Ethiopian Jews, who arrived in Israel from 1983 through 1985, and Jewish religious authorities. The Ethiopian Jews protested a ruling by the Chief Rabbinate which would have required them to undergo ritual immersion before being considered Jews for purposes of those aspects of civil law (e.g., marriage and divorce) administered by the Rabbinate. The Prime Minister and Absorption Minister offered their services as mediators at various stages of the dispute. It was agreed that eligibility for ritual marriage will be reviewed on a case-by-case basis by Rabbinical authorities.

A law enacted in 1977 prohibits the offering and receipt of material benefits as inducements to religious conversion. In 1979, the Justice Minister stated that the law is not intended to restrict the religious freedom of any community or to impede any community from the pursuit of normal educational or philanthropic activities. The Attorney General has ordered that no action be taken under the law without his express permission, and the law has not been employed. It nevertheless continues to cause uneasiness among some Christian groups. Persons considered to be missionaries and purporting to belong to missionary groups have been subjected to physical attacks by private individuals and in some cases harassment by Jewish religious groups. The police have been active in protecting missionary groups. The Ministry of Religious Affairs cooperates with and gives financial support to a variety of interfaith groups which seek to promote understanding between members of different religious groups.

In the summer of 1985 some Jewish groups began to oppose publicly plans by Brigham Young University, a U.S. Mormon institution, to build a study center and expand its educational operations on Mt. Scopus. The civil authorities decided to abide by their earlier decision to allow the expansion, although an interministerial committee has been formed to review the issue.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Israeli citizens enjoy freedom of movement within the country and are free to travel abroad or to emigrate, subject to government review to determine whether military service-related obligations have been satisfied. Emergency regulations, however, provide that Israeli citizens, by military order, may be confined to their neighborhoods or villages or barred from traveling to the occupied territories. Restrictions of this nature have been applied most often to Israeli Arabs. Restrictions on travel of an Arab Anglican priest to the occupied territories, imposed in 1984, were extended by the northern military commander through January of 1986.

There are general restrictions on travel by all residents to security zones along the borders, areas around certain military bases, and areas closed for military exercises.

Since 1948 Israel has taken in over a million Jewish refugees, principally from the Middle East, North Africa, and the Soviet Union and has worked toward integrating them into its society and economy. From 1983 through 1985, the Absorption Ministry has settled some 7,000-8,000 Ethiopian Jewish immigrants. The flow of immigrants from other countries also continued in 1985. United Nations General Assembly Resolution 194 of December 11, 1948, calls upon Israel to permit Arab refugees who left their homes in the 1947-48 fighting to return if they are willing to live in peace, or to be compensated for their losses if they choose not to return. Israel has not recognized the validity of this resolution, pointing out the losses to its own citizens who fled Arab states; it did, however, take back some refugees under the principle of family reunification and has, on occasion, indicated willingness to accept some refugees in the context of a final peace settlement.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Israel is a parliamentary democracy with a multiparty system. All adult Israeli citizens have the right to vote for candidates of their choice and to participate in the political process.

The Israeli Arab community is proportionally underrepresented in the Knesset (Parliament); 16 percent of Israel's total population is Arab, but only 7 of 120 Knesset members are Arab. This may be due, in part, to poor political organization within the Arab community. Israeli Arabs are included in the parliamentary election lists of several of the Zionist parties, the non-Zionist Israeli Communist Party, and the Progressive List for Peace.

Israeli Arabs actively participate in local (municipal) elections, and Israeli Arab municipal councils serve in Arab towns throughout Israel. These municipal councils freely participate in Israeli regional councils. Complaints of lack of budget parity between Israeli-Arab and Jewish municipalities of equal size have been documented, but these differences also may be the result in part of poor political organization rather than active discrimination.

Women participate freely in the political process and account for more than 40 percent of the political party membership. Ten members of the Knesset and two of the judges of the Supreme Court are women. There are no women in the 25-member Cabinet. One woman is currently serving as a Deputy Minister.

The Government maintains an office of human rights in the Foreign Affairs Ministry, and several human rights groups in Israel work for the protection of individual liberties and women's rights. Private Israeli groups, such as the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, and Peace Now, freely criticize Israeli government actions in Israel, the occupied territories, and Lebanon. They issue statements and reports, hold press conferences, and organize demonstrations without governmental interference.

The Government permits visits to Israel by representatives of private international human rights groups, as well as the United Nations Economic and Social Council, the World Health Organization, and the International Labor Organization. The Government has generally permitted the ICRC to visit Palestinian prisoners taken in Lebanon and the occupied territories. The Government also investigates and replies to inquiries by organizations such as Amnesty International.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 report on Israel and the occupied territories, expressed particular concern regarding due process and the treatment of prisoners. Freedom House considers Israel "free"; it characterizes the occupied territories as "partly free."

ISRAEL AND THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Israel is about 4.28 million and is increasing by about 1.9 percent annually. After a decline in per capita gross national product (GNP) in 1984 to $5,022 (constant 1980 dollars) from the previous year, GNP increased in 1985 to $5,122.

Israel historically has run a balance of payments deficit in order to provide the resources to absorb large-scale immigration in the early years of statehood, maintain a high defense capability, and raise the general standard of living. Substantial financial assistance from abroad, public and private, has helped Israel cover the payments gap.

After facing record inflation of nearly 500 percent in 1984, the Government initiated a new economic program on July 1, 1985, which was designed to reduce the level of inflation and to improve its deteriorating balance of payments situation. Inflation will be closer to 200 percent for all of 1985, and less than 40 percent for the last 6 months of the year. The balance of payments is improving slowly. Outside factors, including U.S. assistance on an all-grant basis and the recent decline of the dollar vis-a-vis European currencies, have assisted the Israeli economy.

Budget cuts have reduced both consumer and export subsidies and had a negative impact on health, education, and social services. Since the implementation of the new economic program, there has been real wage erosion and a substantial increase in unemployment (projected at 8.5 percent for the end of 1985). State education in either secular or religious schools is compulsory for all Israeli citizens through age 15. The primary school enrollment ratio is about 97 percent and the literacy rate about 89 percent. The parallel education systems in Israel for Jews and Arabs, conducted in Hebrew and Arabic respectively, show a disparity in quality, with greater resources per student going into the Jewish system.

Israel has an advanced health care system with a high doctor-to-patient ratio. Life expectancy is 74 years, and the infant mortality rate is 13.1 per 1,000 live births. According to the Israeli Health Ministry's National Committee for Drinking Water Standards, the quality of drinking water is poor and the incidence of disease connected with pollutants in water is significantly higher than in Europe or the United States. The Committee is recommending new standards to improve water quality.

Title to 93 percent of the land in Israel is claimed by the State or quasi-public organizations in trust for the Jewish people. According to law, anyone may purchase the remaining seven percent of privately-owned land through ordinary commercial transactions. In practice, little privately-owned land is ever on the market.

The Collective Agreements Law of 1957 empowers the Labor Minister to extend the provisions of collective agreements, including the minimum wage in the agreement between Histadrut and the Manufacturers Association, to workers not otherwise covered by collective agreements. The Youth Labor law of 1955 prohibits the employment of children under the age of 15 and regulates employment of youths under the age of 18. The Labor Inspection Law of 1954 provides a labor inspection service to enforce health and safety standards in the workplace.

Women's rights in Israel are protected by law as well as by governmental and private organizations. The Equal Opportunity Law forbids discrimination on account of sex or marital or parental status, and employers are legally bound to pay female workers a wage equal to that paid male workers for the same or generally similar work. Laws and regulations also provide for protection of the rights of female employees with respect to pregnancy and childbirth. The Government includes a senior adviser on the status of women. The Civil Service Commission and several government ministries have officers responsible for promoting fair treatment for women. A number of nongovernmental women's organizations also work to advance the status of women, ensure equal opportunity in all fields, and other family services such as child care for working mothers. The senior adviser on the status of women has publicly criticized as discriminatory the provision in many labor agreements that women, but not men, must retire at age 60.

Over 40 percent of university graduates are women, as are 39 percent of the work force. Fifty-two percent of Israeli civil service employees are women, but they appear to be disadvantaged at the higher levels of the Government. Women account for approximately two-thirds of the instructors employed in the educational system but they occupy only about one-fifth of the senior positions of the professional grade of the career civil service. Women are well represented in professional and technical jobs in the media, and work in a broad range of nongovernment professions and other occupations. Women are drafted into the army for service in noncombat units.

The Israeli Arab minority has equal rights under the law in most respects, and Israeli Arabs have made substantial educational and material progress since the founding of the State. Some have risen to responsible positions in the civil service, generally in the Arab departments of government ministries.

Israeli Arabs, however, are relatively powerless and tend to feel alienated. Despite some governmental and private efforts to bridge the gap, there is little social interaction with Israeli Jews. Israeli Arabs assert that they are denied equal access to education, housing, and other services, and that they are discriminated against in such areas as employment and appointment to government positions. Government grants to Arab local councils represent a smaller percentage of the councils' budgets than is the case for grants to Jewish municipalities.

While Arabs make up about 16 percent of the population of Israel, less than 2 percent of the persons in senior government positions are Arabs, less than 3 percent of Israeli judges are Arabs, and no large bank, industrial enterprise, or agricultural undertaking in Israel is headed by an Israeli Arab. Israeli Arabs make up 3 percent of university students and less than 1 percent of the academic positions in the universities.

Druze and Circassians are subject to Israel's military draft, and some Bedouin serve voluntarily in special units. Most Muslims and Christians have not been permitted to serve and therefore are disqualified from many economic and social benefits which require military service as a precondition.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

The territories which Israel has occupied since 1967 consist of the West Bank, East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, and the Gaza Strip. The West Bank and Gaza remain under military government. Israel regards East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights as subject to Israeli law, jurisdiction, and administration.

The United States holds the view that Israel's presence in all these territories is that of an occupying power. The United States regards Israel's administration as subject to the Hague regulations of 1907 and the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention concerning the protection of civilian populations under military occupation.

Israel declares that the Fourth Geneva Convention does not apply to the West Bank and Gaza, but that it voluntarily observes most of the Convention's provisions in these areas. Major differences have arisen in regard to the applicability of these provisions in East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, the introduction of civilian settlers, and the use of collective punishment. Israel declares that it enforces Jordanian law in the West Bank and British Mandatory regulations in the Gaza Strip. In addition, Israel has issued over 1,000 military orders altering or overriding portions of these laws and uses some British Mandatory ordinances and Ottoman Empire laws on the West Bank.

The complex human rights situation in the occupied territories is largely the result of the fact that since the 1967 war and in the absence of a peace settlement, the territories remain under military administration and there is friction between occupation authorities and the Palestinian population which opposes Israeli control. Among the symptoms of friction are active resistance to the occupation, including episodes of violence, sometimes encouraged by outside extremist groups. Friction also arises from security measures taken by Israel to counteract terrorist acts and threats of terrorism, and to counter other kinds of activities which the Israeli authorities assert endanger security. Another cause of friction is the introduction of civilian Israeli settlers, although settlement activity has slowed. Establishment of new settlements was limited to six by the National Unity Government agreement in late 1984. In 1985 three of these were officially dedicated, one in the Golan Heights and two in the West Bank. Frictions are exacerbated by some Israeli political elements who advocate annexation or permanent Israeli control of the territories as well as by the refusal of the principal Palestinian organizations to recognize the State of Israel.

Israel implements its policy in the West Bank and Gaza through civil administrations. These were created in 1981 under the control of the Defense Ministry, and are staffed by military as well as civilian personnel. Israel's national police, border police, security service, and the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) all have a role in the administration of the occupied territories. The national police, which includes local Palestinians in its ranks, is seldom the target of criticism. However, there are frequent complaints by West Bankers and Gazans about the actions of the other organizations.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Civil Administration authorities have attempted to reshape local politics, particularly by blocking the influence of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and by trying to promote an alternate leadership. Israel permitted municipal elections in 1972 and 1976, but after 1980, citing security considerations, postponed further elections and removed numerous elected and appointed officials in the West Bank and Gaza. Threats and intimidation by extremist Palestinians have also inhibited the development of a visible, moderate local leadership. The present Israeli policy is to support the installation of acceptable, non-PLO Palestinian mayors who have local and Jordanian support in place of Israeli military appointees. A new Arab mayor of Nablus took office in December, and there is discussion of installing other Arab mayors.

Israel has allowed the establishment of four universities in the West Bank and one in Gaza where none existed before, but has restricted activities of student and faculty members which it regards as threatening to its security. Israel permits criticism of its policies by the East Jerusalem-based Arabic press but has often censored articles and editorials and restricts the circulation of Arabic publications in the West Bank and Gaza. One Arabic newspaper and one press service were ordered closed during the year and one Jewish settler newspaper was temporarily banned. Broad restrictions on speech and assembly apply in the occupied territories.

Arab and Jewish residents suffered from a marked increase in violent acts in 1985. One or another faction of the PLO as well as a variety of PLO dissident groups claimed responsibility for nearly all acts of violence against the IDF or Israeli civilians. Much of the violence, including the increased use of homemade bombs, knives, guns, and Molotov cocktails, appears, however, to have been spontaneous and local.

Complaints of settler violence continued throughout the year, including unauthorized armed patrols and physical harassment. Israel prosecuted and convicted Jewish settlers for a variety of illegal acts. Twenty-five Jewish settlers were convicted of offenses including membership in a terrorist organization, murder, conspiracy, and other charges in 1985 and were given sentences ranging from 4 months to life imprisonment. Two IDF officers are currently being tried for their alleged roles in terrorism against Arabs.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political killing is not condoned by the Israeli Government. There have been, however, deaths and serious injuries as a result of both terrorist acts and IDF security enforcement measures. A military government spokesman said in October that 660 terrorist incidents had occurred in Israel and the occupied territories since January 1985.

At least 2 unarmed Arab residents of the occupied territories were killed and 17 wounded by IDF soldiers enforcing security regulations. Members of the IDF also killed at least 4 residents of the occupied territories and wounded at least 5 in armed confrontations. Attacks by Arabs took the lives of at least 4 IDF soldiers, 5 Jewish civilians (in addition to 4 who were killed in Israel) and 4 Arabs, while at least 7 IDF soldiers, 40 Jewish civilians, and 16 Arabs were wounded. During 1985, two Palestinians who had been missing for some time were found dead at the site of explosions.

b. Disappearance

Israeli authorities neither sponsor nor condone disappearances.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by Israeli law and there is no evidence that torture is condoned by the Israeli authorities. Israeli border and national policemen have been convicted of abusive use of force against Arab prisoners, and the Israeli Supreme Court has ordered the withdrawal from evidence of confessions by West Bankers on the grounds that they appeared to have been obtained by force.

Palestinian prisoners at a number of West Bank and Israeli prisons conducted hunger strikes throughout the year protesting conditions. The head of occupied territories prisons said inmates at Jenin prison spend 23 hours a day in 30 square-meter cells holding 14 people each. In 1984 Israeli courts convicted two former officials of Farah prison of having abused prisoners. Based on affidavits collected from former prisoners between May 1982 and May 1984, a report prepared by the West Bank organization Law in the Service of Man, and published by the the International Commission of Jurists, alleged in January that prisoners at Farah prison are systematically abused. Israel denied the charges of systematic abuse.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Persons arrested for common crimes in the occupied territories are usually provided the opportunity for bail, access to an attorney, and a clear statement of charges. Individuals may be held in administrative detention without formal charges for up to 18 days. The normal detention period after the filing of charges is 60 days before trial. This period can be extended by a Supreme Court judge for an additional 3 months, and this extension may be renewed at the end of the 3 months.

Persons detained for security investigations are not permitted bail and initially are denied access to an attorney or other outside contact, including consular officers. In some cases, officials have declined initially to confirm a person's detention to consular officers. This denial of notification of arrest to any third party can, under Israeli law, be extended for up to 15 days. It is unclear whether detainees are informed of the specific charges against them. Many of those released from such detention without charges claim ignorance of the reasons for their detention.

A sizable number of Arabs are often detained after terrorist incidents or the dispersal of demonstrations. Such detentions usually do not result in formal charges and are not prolonged. Persons arrested during demonstrations are tried in military courts on security grounds. The security forces can and do detain individuals without prompt notification of their relatives and apparently without the use of warrants.

In May, Israel released 1,150 prisoners, including 879 who had been convicted of security offenses (alleged terrorists, their accomplices, and contacts), in exchange for 3 Israeli military personnel who had been captured in Lebanon. Some of the approximately 400 security prisoners who were released in the occupied territories as the result of this exchange were later rearrested on new security charges. Thirty-one of those released in the occupied territories were served expulsion orders alleging that they were not bona fide residents of the territories. The Government of Israel permitted 10 of the 31 to remain in the territories after they proved to the satisfaction of the Israeli courts that they were pre-1967 residents of the West Bank. Twenty-one others were expelled, drawing a rare public rebuke from the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), which had helped negotiate the original exchange agreement. The ICRC disagreed with the Israeli interpretation of the residency requirements as established in the agreement. Israel maintained that those who had reentered Israel illegally had forfeited their residency rights; the ICRC disagreed.

In August, after a 5-year hiatus, the Israeli Government revived 6-month administrative detention and deportation from the territories. The United States has indicated its belief that these measures are likely to foster further tensions and that they are inconsistent with the Fourth Geneva Convention. Since that time, approximately 100 Palestinians have been placed under administrative detention. Administrative detention must be confirmed by a military judge. The hearing is confidential and the detainee and counsel are not automatically given access to evidence cited as grounds for the detention. Six West Bank Palestinians were deported for alleged security offenses. Where the deportees appealed, the Israeli Supreme Court upheld the deportation orders.

In 1985 at least 25 Arabs were placed under new or renewed orders restricting them to their town of residence for 3 months or more. Such restrictions involve no formal charges and are ordered by regional military commanders without judicial review. Many of those so restricted are political activists, persons who are outspoken critics of Israeli policies, or PLO supporters.

More than 10 West Bank towns and at least 10 refugee camps were placed under curfew at least once during 1985. Complaints about other forms of collective punishment and humiliating treatment at the hands of the security forces, such as the holding of groups of Arab men in town or village squares for long periods, rose sharply in 1985, especially during August and September. Some soldiers were disciplined for improper use of force and for stealing from those they had stopped for questioning or search.

There is no forced labor in the occupied territories.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial .

Jordanian law, as modified by Israeli military orders, remains in force in the West Bank for most criminal and civil matters. British Mandatory law, as modified, prevails in Gaza. The judicial application of these laws, except in security cases, land acquisition, or where jurisdiction has been transferred by military order, has been left in the hands of an Arab judiciary, which acts independently of Israeli authority. Residents of the occupied territories accused of nonsecurity offenses receive public trials in local courts. In East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights, Israeli law applies.

Persons suspected of having committed security offenses, which are not precisely defined under Israeli law, are normally tried in Israeli military courts with a military judge presiding, and are defended by counsel. Israeli residents of the occupied territories accused of security offenses are not tried by military court but by the Israeli district court closest to their residence or the scene of their crime.

Most military trials are open to the public, except for some cases involving serious security offenses. Consular officers normally have no difficulty in attending any court proceeding in which a foreign citizen is involved. Israel asserts jurisdiction with respect to alleged security offenses committed outside of Israel and the occupied territories.

Orders of the Civil Administration may be appealed to the Israeli Supreme Court. Nonjudicial administrative orders of the military government may be appealed to area military commanders and the Supreme Court. No appeal of military court verdicts is possible, although the area commander may exercise the right of commutation. In April, a petition was filed on behalf of two Palestinians to have Israel establish a military appeals court in the occupied territories, contending that such a court is required by international law. The Government has argued that international law does not require an appeals apparatus, that the present system is adequate, and that an appeals court would undermine the military's antiterrorism deterrent measures. As of this date, the Israeli Supreme Court has not yet rendered a decision.

Palestinians complain that due process is denied in the course of Israel's designating as state land areas of the occupied territories regarded by them as community or private land. Complaints include a lack of written notification or that the 30-day period for filing competing claims is too brief to obtain substantiating documentation. Earth-moving work sometimes begins before the 30-day period has elapsed. Israeli authorities respond that extensions are granted upon requests, and that no title is required if the disputed land has been cultivated for at least 10 years.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under occupation regulations, military authorities can and do enter private homes and institutions without prior judicial approval in pursuit of security objectives. A military order permits any soldier to search any person or premise on the West Bank at any time without warrant on the suspicion that a person or organization may be in possession of a proscribed publication.

In 1985, at least 17 houses of West Bank and Gaza residents accused of involvement in security incidents were demolished and 20 were sealed. There is no judicial review of a decision to seal or demolish a house or room and such action is usually taken before the suspect has been put on trial. Houses or rooms used by Israelis suspected or convicted of security offenses in the occupied territories were not demolished or sealed in 1985.

It is widely believed that mail and telephone services in the West Bank and Gaza are monitored. Individuals can be and are questioned on their political views by security officials. Such inquiries can involve overnight detention.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of expression is restricted on security grounds. Proscribed acts include flying the Palestinian flag or displaying its colors, displaying Palestinian nationalist slogans, and publicly expressing support for the PLO. The Arabic press, most of which is located in East Jerusalem, remains outspoken in its criticism of Israeli policies and actions. Arrests, prison sentences, land seizures, and other politically sensitive stories are generally reported, but editorials and articles are frequently censored in whole or in part. All items to be printed in Jerusalem's Arabic papers must be submitted to the censor for prior review. Hebrew papers need submit only articles on military security matters to the censors. At least 90 editorials and commentaries from Arabic newspapers were censored during the year. Censorship decisions may be challenged by appeal to the chief censor.

Materials licensed to be published in East Jerusalem are free to circulate there, but require an additional license for distribution in the West Bank and Gaza. Military orders forbid the printing or publishing of anything containing political significance without a prior license. Political significance is not defined in the order.

A permit must be obtained for every publication (book, magazine, or newspaper) imported into the occupied territories. Arabic educational materials, periodicals, and books originating outside Israel are censored or banned for anti-Semitic or anti-Israeli content and for the encouragement of Palestinian nationalism. Possession of banned materials by West Bank or Gaza Arabs is a criminal offense. Restrictions of this kind are usually not applied to Israeli residents. Lawyers have complained of difficulty in obtaining the list of proscribed publications. The number of books explicitly prohibited was reduced from 1,300 to 350 after the present Israeli Government took office.

In September, the Arabic weekly newspaper Al Darb was ordered permanently closed on the charge that it was run and directed by the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. An appeal has been filed. Also in September, the East Jerusalem press service Al Minar was ordered shut for 6 months. In October, the Arabic weekly magazine Al Biyadar As Siassi was refused permission to distribute in the occupied territories for 2 weeks for failing to submit published material to the censors. The Arabic daily Ashaab was shut down for 3 days in August for printing material not approved by the censor. Five Arab journalists were placed under administrative detention in 1985. In November, the Jewish settler newspaper Aleph Yud was temporarily prevented from publishing due to alleged incitement to violent resistance against what was contended to be the willingness of the Government of Israel to make territorial concessions as part of a peace settlement.

Arabic-language radio and television programs from Jordan, Syria, and other Arab countries, including broadcasts of the Voice of Palestine, are received in the occupied territories without jamming.

Foreign journalists have not reported any difficulties in meeting with inhabitants of the occupied territories. All reports filed by the foreign press, however, are subject to military censorship.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Israeli occupation authorities have permitted a wide range of labor, professional, and fraternal groups organized before 1967 to continue to function. Professional associations are active and frequently take public stands on political issues. No political parties or other groups viewed as primarily political are permitted. Public gatherings, defined as a group of more than 10 people, require permission, often withheld from both Arab and Israeli groups, based on the consideration of public order.

There are approximately 40 labor unions in the occupied territories, grouped into 2 rival federations. Fifteen new labor unions have been permitted to register in the West Bank since the beginning of the occupation, but over 100 applications have been turned down and a number of Arab unions have been disbanded by the occupation authorities for alleged security concerns. In 1985, the Israeli authorities refused permission for a union of Arab lawyers on the West Bank to form. Strikes are legal so long as they are not undertaken for political reasons. There were no reports of arrests for labor-organizing activity during 1985. Some union activities, such as cultural exhibitions or May Day festivities, were prohibited during the year on security grounds.

West Bank unions are generally small and confined to urban workers in skilled craft trades. The occupation authorities must approve all candidates for election to union office but such elections are held without other interference. Membership in the Histadrut, the Israeli national labor organization, is open to Arab workers from East Jerusalem and the Golan Heights.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religious practice exists in the occupied territories. No group or sect is banned on religious grounds. Muslim and Christian holy days are observed without hindrance, and Muslims and Christians operate a variety of private schools and institutions. There has been controversy concerning rights of access to worship inside the Ibrahimi Mosque/Tomb of the Patriarchs, which is also the site of an ancient synagogue. The occupation authorities tolerate the existence of a number of Islamic fundamentalist groups. There has been no reported interference with the publication or distribution of religious publications.

Israel protects Muslim and Christian holy places and usually assures freedom of access to them. On occasion, the authorities have denied both Arab and Jewish groups access to religious sites on religious or security grounds. Israel makes concerted efforts to facilitate travel into Jordan for Muslims wishing to make the Hajj to Mecca. This includes expedited bridge clearance procedures and extended hours of crossing. In 1985, several thousand Muslims from the occupied territories made the pilgrimage. At least 20 were refused permission on security grounds.

In July, a number of suspects in the Jewish terrorist underground trials were convicted and sentenced to prison terms for, among other things, conspiracy to destroy the Dome of the Rock with explosives.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is generally unrestricted for Arabs within the occupied territories, but certain categories are significantly restricted. Approximately 80,000 Arabs travel daily to Israel to work. All residents over 16 must carry identity documents with them at all times and must show them to military or law enforcement officials whenever requested. Vehicles owned by Arabs of the occupied territories are frequently stopped for security checks, sometimes at unauthorized roadblocks manned by settlers. Palestinians are required to obtain permits to remain overnight in Israel; West Bankers are generally forbidden to remain in Jerusalem after midnight.

Most inhabitants of the occupied territories are permitted to travel abroad and many thousands do so each year. Exit visas are required. The Government of Israel issues laissez passers to residents of the occupied territories upon their request to facilitate foreign travel after a security check. In some cases, restrictions are imposed on reentry. Travel bans are also imposed on some persons suspected of antioccupation activities. Eight West Bank women were prohibited from traveling to the U.N. Conference on Women in Nairobi in August. The leader of a West Bank charitable society was denied permission to travel to the United States in September to attend the Congressional Black Caucus annual conference.

Bans on the travel of residents of particular areas have been employed by Israeli security forces as a form of collective punishment. The residents of at least 10 West Bank towns were prohibited from crossing the Allenby Bridge to Jordan for various periods following terrorist attacks. Bans on Tulkarm and Hebron lasted 1 month and 5 weeks, respectively. Despite the formal state of war between Israel and Jordan, two-way travel between the West Bank and Jordan is permitted. Palestinians returning from Jordan, as well as other Arabs or persons of Arab descent, all of whom are subject to search, complain of unnecessarily harsh or humiliating treatment and harassment. Israel permitted all members of the Jordanian Parliament resident in the West Bank to travel freely to attend parliamentary sessions during 1985.

There are no obstacles to emigration. Israel sometimes refuses to renew the laissez passers of West Bank residents who study or work abroad for a period of time, even though they have not acquired foreign citizenship. Such residents are permitted to return to the West Bank, as tourists only, and are sometimes denied the right to return at all. Entry permits or residency rights are often denied to spouses and children solely because the head of the household has emigrated. Israel also has not permitted the return of many former West Bank residents who happened to be absent at the time the June 1967 war broke out and Israeli occupation began.

Gazans normally do not require prior approval for travel to the West Bank. Under special arrangements concluded between Israel and Egypt, thousands of Gazans regularly cross the border into Egypt, particularly to work or visit relatives in the divided city of Rafah. Israel permits Golan Heights Druze to return after attending school in Syria; it has not, however, permitted the return of other Syrians who fled or were expelled from the area during and after the 1967 war.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

There is no regional self-government in the occupied territories and only limited Arab administration at the town level; most villages retain their traditional leadership. Arab civil servants, institutions, and municipal officials operate under the military government. No indigenous formal political parties or overtly political organizations are permitted.

Municipal elections, held in 1972 and 1976 and scheduled for 1980, were postponed and have not been rescheduled. Of the 23 Arab mayors and municipal councils elected in 1976, 14 of the mayors and at least 4 municipal councils were dismissed by occupation authorities. The mayors of the major towns of Hebron, Nablus, Ramallah, and El Bireh were replaced by Israeli officials. Neither the dismissals nor appointments of alternate officials is subject to judicial review. Bethlehem and Tulkarm are the only major towns governed by elected Arab mayors. Nablus was returned to an Arab mayor, the last duly elected deputy mayor and elected head of the Chamber of Commerce, in December 1985.

Arab residents of East Jerusalem are permitted and encouraged to vote in municipal elections. Approximately 20 percent of those eligible did so in the 1983 elections.

Most Arab residents of the West Bank are Jordanian citizens and as such are represented by 2 senators and 30 members of the Jordanian Parliament.

Section 4 Governmental Attitudes Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

A variety of local groups, both Israeli and Palestinian, are concerned with human rights issues. These groups' publications and statements are allowed to circulate in the occupied territories.

The Israeli Government normally permits international human rights groups to visit the occupied territories, and does not interfere with their investigations. However, two field investigators for Law in the Service of Man, the West Bank affiliate of the International Commission of Jurists which is involved in legal assistance on human rights issues, were placed under administrative arrest in September on security grounds. One was released in December; the other is due to be released in March.

Since 1978 the International Labor Organization has sent factfinding missions to Israel and the occupied territories. Among its recommendations it has urged that "the impact of the state of occupation...on the exercise of trade union activities should be reduced to a strict minimum...."

Amnesty International's 1985 Report on Israel and the occupied territories expressed concern regarding due process and the treatment of prisoners. Freedom House has characterized the occupied territories as "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

There are between 800,000 to 1 million Palestinians in the West Bank. Living standards have risen substantially since 1967, although more slowly than in Israel or Jordan; per capita gross income in 1985 was three times its 1967 level. Much of this increase in income is due to the large number of West Bankers working in Israel and to remittances from Palestinians working abroad. In 1985, Israel's economic problems continued to affect West Bank commercial and agricultural sales, tourist trade, and local construction. A large but undetermined portion of the Arab work force is traditionally underemployed or engaged in seasonal work.

Economic life in the occupied territories has become enmeshed in Israeli regulations, some used politically. Israeli restrictions on the export to Israel of West Bank and Gaza products, especially agricultural products, limits local market opportunities. While Jordan imposes market-protection limits on West Bank produce, export to Jordan is sometimes banned by Israel as punishment for a security incident. Construction of new factories is also restricted for political as well as economic reasons. Some localities from which security offenders have been arrested have been declared off-limits to development projects. While Israel is concerned that funds from the PLO or other hostile sources might be brought into the occupied territories under the guise of development, Arabs contend that even projects which are fully funded by proven local sources have not been approved.

The Israeli Government has indicated that it would review favorably several long-standing Arab proposals and in October the Civil Administration approved a large number of projects which had previously been rejected. Several municipalities have been permitted to import funds held in Jordanian banks and private import of funds has been liberalized.

The taking of land by Israeli authorities for settlements, military use, and in connection with major road plans, and the reclassification of communal areas as state land, significantly affects the lives and economic activities of Palestinians. According to some calculations, Palestinians have been precluded from use of an area approaching 50 percent of the West Bank land and 15 percent of the Gaza Strip, of which about one half is presently vacant and barren. There are currently more than 150 nonmilitary settlements in the West Bank (excluding unilaterally expanded Jerusalem) and Gaza, with a total population of about 40,000, although the growth of settlements slowed considerably in 1985. The scarcity of water in most parts of the West Bank constrains agricultural and urban development. A disproportionate amount is allocated for settlers' use.

The United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) and the military government meet the basic educational needs of refugee students in the West Bank. Overall adjusted primary school enrollment there was 83 percent in 1984. The West Bank is served by four universities, one college, one community college, and a variety of other educational institutions, all established or upgraded since the beginning of the Israeli occupation. None of the universities receives financial support or other assistance from the occupation authorities. The creation of additional institutions is under consideration by various Arab groups. All teachers at educational institutions in the occupied territories must receive certificates from the Israeli authorities, issuance of which include criteria beyond that of professional competence. In March, 18 teachers were dismissed for political activities. An-Najah University was closed twice during 1985: once for 2 months after occupation authorities seized materials considered inflammatory during a campaign for student council elections and for 3 days in December for allegedly allowing illegal assembly. Bir Zeit University was closed by the authorities for 1 month and Bethlehem University was closed for 1 week when proscribed books were found at book fairs on the campuses. Bethlehem was also closed for 1 day in November following student demonstrations protesting deportations. These measures at times go beyond what might be reasonably justified on security grounds.

The 363 square kilometer Gaza strip has a population of about 500,000 with a per capita income of about $1,100 a year. Gaza's economy advanced marginally in the early 1980's, whereas real gross national product grew at over 10 percent in the late 1960's and 5 to 6 percent in the late 1970's. Since 1967, infant mortality has declined sharply and health services have improved. Gaza's basic needs for food, clothing, and shelter are largely met. Severe population pressure and inadequate public sanitation remain major problems. Housing is especially crowded in the eight Gaza refugee camps, where approximately 210,000 of the 370,000 refugees registered with UNRWA live. Approximately 35,000 refugees have left the camps to live in Israeli government-sponsored communities. Inadequate classroom space has forced double-shifting at many UNRWA and government schools in recent years. Gaza producers of citrus, the major crop, complain that marketing has suffered from both Israeli and Jordanian restrictions. Israel has reduced water use to allow the water table to rise and inhibit saline intrusion. The fishing industry has shrunk due to restrictions on fishing waters. About 35,000 Gazans commute daily to work in Israel, earning about one-third of Gaza's income. Gaza's Al Azhar University, an affiliate of Al Azhar in Cairo, offers a 4-year program to about 3,300 Gaza students.

The Israeli-occupied portion of the Golan Heights consists of 1,295 square kilometers, and has an Arab population of about 15,000, mostly Druze and a small percentage of Alawites. Approximately 7,500 Israeli settlers live in some 32 settlements in the Golan Heights. Druze village councils have complained that they do not receive sufficient funding to provide minimal municipal services, and a third of the estimated 4,000 school children are reported to be studying in substandard classrooms.

THE OCCUPIED TERRITORIES

Child labor is not permitted and adequate regulations on working conditions are in effect. Histadrut, the Israeli national labor organization, has taken steps to assure that working conditions for Golan Druze are comparable to those of Israelis.

Urban West Bankers are increasingly sophisticated in their social attitudes, including toward the role of women, but the rural majority continues to hold more traditional social values. There are no legal or administrative prohibitions on the employment of women in the occupied territories, although traditional cultural mores and family commitments limit most to homemaking. Most Palestinian women holding jobs outside their homes reside and work in urban areas. Employment of women is concentrated in service industries, education, and health services, with a small number working in journalism, law, and other professions.

Although women legally have equal access to public education, custom and family pressures limit the number of women in West Bank schools. Even so, female school enrollment is quite high by Middle Eastern standards. A little over 45 percent of the primary and secondary school students are female. While female enrollment at the postsecondary level varies between roughly 30 to 45 percent at coeducational West Bank colleges and universities, a number of teacher and vocational training centers are all male or all female.

There is a wide range of women's cooperative groups for health care, child care, handicraft production, vocational training, and other services. The West Bank-wide Society for the Preservation of the Family is active in supporting women's needs.

JORDAN

Jordan is a hereditary monarchy with a constitution granting the King broad powers. The King forms and dissolves governments and is the ultimate arbiter of policy. The Prime Minister and the Council of Ministers (Cabinet), however, exercise considerable responsibility over many issues. The Constitution also provides for a bicameral parliament and an independent judiciary.

Martial law has been in effect since the 1967 war which ended with Israel's occupation of the West Bank. Under martial law, some persons have been detained with little opportunity to communicate with acquaintances for varying periods, usually not exceeding several months. Generally, however, martial law has not much affected the civil rights of Jordanians.

Jordan has a mixed economy with government participation in certain sectors, largely in basic industries. The Government of Prime Minister Zaid Rifai, formed in April 1985, has promoted free enterprise by canceling Jordanization of foreign banks, eliminating taxes on real property transactions, and vowing to encourage private investment and public sector discipline in a new development plan. Owing to declining foreign assistance and a weak world economy, Jordan's healthy economic growth of the past decade has leveled off in recent years.

There were no significant changes in Jordan's human rights situation in 1985. The absence of political parties, martial law, and broad powers exercised by the police are areas of concern but recent trends have been favorable. The increased opportunities for women in all areas of life, the continued importance given to the rule of law and an independent judiciary, the gradual maturation of the Parliament, and recent fair and open elections have contributed to an improving human rights picture.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The Jordanian Government does not sanction political killings. None has occurred since a prominent Palestinian leader, Fahd Kawasmeh, was assassinated by terrorists in December 1984.

Summary executions do not occur in Jordan. Some Arabs have been sentenced to death based on a Jordanian law permitting trials in absentia for selling West Bank land to Israelis but these sentences have never been carried out.

b. Disappearance

There were no disappearances reported in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is no evidence that the Government condones or practices torture. There have been a few reports of ill-treatment by police. Judicial authorities take such allegations seriously and have been known to dismiss cases based on apparent mistreatment. In May 1985, the Director of Public Security established a special office to handle any public complaints of abuse by security officers and promised to punish offenders. Jordanian law provides for the decent treatment of prisoners. Prison conditions are Spartan but not intentionally degrading. They are inspected by the International Committee of the Red Cross. Crowded conditions in some prisons were much relieved by a June 1985 Royal Amnesty releasing over 1,000 inmates. A modern central prison planned for Amman remains under construction.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although Jordan has been under martial law since 1967, most persons are placed in custody by Jordanian authorities in accordance with the criminal code requiring imposition of charges within 48 hours. Persons may then be detained pending trial for 15 days, or longer if a court approves the prosecution's request for an extension. The criminal code is generally applied for persons arrested for designated martial law crimes, which include espionage, bribery of public officials, trafficking in narcotics or weapons, black marketeering, and security offenses. Security forces have apparently detained incommunicado (or with limited outside access) some persons, possibly 50-75 in 1985, suspected of cross-border infiltration and security crimes. These persons are usually released or brought to trial after detention periods ranging from a few days to several months. A habeas corpus petition for any detained person may be brought before the High Court of Justice, but is unlikely to be granted for those accused of security offenses. Compulsory labor is forbidden by the Constitution and is not practiced. There are no instances of exile.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

All criminal cases, except martial law crimes and crimes committed by military personnel, are tried in civilian courts. The legal code and the independent selection of judges help to assure a fair trial. Trials are held in open court, except in a few cases such as those involving sexual offenses. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty and have the right to be represented by counsel, to prepare a defense, to cross-examine witnesses, and to refrain from giving self-incriminatory testimony. The court appoints a lawyer for those who cannot afford one if the potential sentence is execution or life imprisonment. An effective appeals process may be utilized by either the defendant or the prosecution. Death sentences are seldom imposed. Three persons were reportedly executed in 1985, all for serious crimes involving murder and after lengthy judicial hearings.

Civilian judges must demonstrate legal competence in written and oral examinations before selection by a board composed of three judges, the Chief Attorney General, and the Undersecretary of the Justice Ministry. Judges may be removed from office only after serious transgressions of the law and after a disciplinary board hearing.

Martial law crimes are adjudicated in military court before a panel of three military officers trained in the law. The military court observes the law of criminal procedure and, in practice, defendants are given the same rights as in civilian court except the right of appeal. Sentences of the court for martial law offenses must, however, be ratified by the Prime Minister in his capacity as Military Governor. The Prime Minister is authorized to increase, reduce, or annul the sentences. These cases are always reviewed for fairness by a legal advisor or the Justice Minister before the Prime Minister makes a decision. The military court also adjudicates all crimes committed by military personnel. In these cases, the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces must ratify the sentences.

Religious courts have jurisdiction over most family matters, such as marriage, divorce, child custody, or guardianship. The Shari'a (Muslim religious law) applies to Muslims in these areas and a Shari'a court system handles disputes. Ecclesiastical courts handle similar matters for members of the main Christian sects. The civil courts administer the cases of other religious groups. Shari'a, however, must be applied to questions of inheritance for all communities.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The inviolability of the home is respected. Police searches of homes require warrants except in rare cases involving security or the hot pursuit of fleeing suspects. It is believed that security personnel sometimes monitor telephones and correspondence but the practice is evidently not widespread.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution safeguards freedoms of speech and of the press but permits limited media constraints under martial law. Jordanians freely express wide-ranging opinions, including criticism of the Government, in informal settings. Public debate is less pronounced in the state-owned radio and television networks and in the privately-owned but government-influenced press where a form of self-censorship persists. The Government provides editors with guidance from time to time on key foreign policy and security matters. On most other issues, government interference is minimal and critical commentary is tolerated.

Journalists must register with the Information Ministry and join the Journalists Association. One editor was placed under house arrest for two months in 1985 following a controversial story. A part-time political columnist was also reportedly arrested in May 1985 and charged with membership in an illegal organization.

Foreign newspapers and magazines are widely available, though they are subject to infrequent censorship.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public demonstrations require a permit, rarely granted, from the Interior Minister. Except for a brief sit-in by United Nations Relief and Works Agency workers protesting potential reductions in services, no significant demonstrations occurred in 1985. All organizations require government approval and may not have political objectives. Government surveillance of public meetings, university activities, and organization gatherings is routine.

JORDAN

Jordanians are free to join labor unions and professional associations. These organizations require government licenses, which are usually granted without difficulty. Unions and associations defend the interests of their members and their officers are elected by the membership. Unions engage in collective bargaining. Strikes are legal except for government workers and have occurred in the past, although not in 1985. The law requires that an employer be given advance notice (usually 14 days) before a strike. The Ministry of Labor and Social Development may arbitrate labor disputes.

Professional associations among doctors, engineers, lawyers, pharmacists, and similar professional groups operate freely. They maintain influence with the Government in their respective areas of interest.

About 20 percent of the Jordanian work force is unionized. Seventeen unions comprise the Jordan Federation of Trade Union (JFTU). Several other unions do not belong to the JFTU. Unions have virtually no political role and confine themselves to representing their membership in such areas as wages, working conditions, and termination of workers. Their effectiveness varies widely. The JFTU actively participates in international organizations such as the International Labor Organization and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam, the state religion, is observed by well over 90 percent of Jordanians. However, the constitutional guarantee of freedom of worship is adhered to by the Government. There appears to be little discrimination against religious minorities, who are represented at all levels in the Government, military, and the business community. Laws making harassment of religious minorities a crime are enforced. A variety of Christian groups, including Catholic, Orthodox, Protestant, and Seventh-Day Adventist, maintain churches, schools, hospitals, and other institutions. A small Baha'i community also exists. A few foreign clergymen reside in Jordan. Although proselytizing among Muslims is forbidden, conversion by Muslims is not a crime.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement within Jordan is unrestricted except in certain military zones. With a few exceptions (primarily military personnel and reservists who need permission for foreign travel), the Government does not restrict emigration or foreign travel. A woman must present the written consent of her husband, father, or male guardian to obtain an initial passport but thereafter may travel alone without restraint. Citizens who have left Jordan have the right to return. There are no reported cases of revocation of citizenship for political reasons. A court recently held that assuming a foreign nationality does not deprive a person of his Jordanian citizenship. Some citizens returning to Jordan, particularly those who have traveled to Communist countries, are questioned by the General Intelligence Directorate regarding security matters.

Jordan has faced a long-term refugee problem from the influxes of Palestinians made homeless by the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars. According to the most recent statistics, Palestinian refugees and their descendants on the East Bank total about 1 million, including approximately 203,000 living in refugee camps. The total does not include a large but undetermined number of other persons from the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, and Israel who have settled in the East Bank since 1948. Except for some refugees from Gaza, all have been granted Jordanian citizenship and have the unrestricted right to live, work, and own property. The Interior Minister routinely grants permits for travel between the East Bank and Israeli-occupied territories.

Jordan has granted asylum even in cases which have strained relations with the neighboring states.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Executive and legislative powers are constitutionally vested in the King, who rules with the assistance of an appointed Council of Ministers. A Parliament, with an appointed Senate and an elected House of Deputies, was reinstated by the King in January 1984 after having become moribund in the wake of the 1967 war with Israel and suspended in 1976. Although overshadowed by the executive branch, the Parliament, which must ratify royal decrees and laws proposed by the Council of Ministers, has been gaining stature. A controversial education reform law, for example, was shelved in 1985 after considerable public and parliamentary opposition.

Parliament is still composed largely of members elected in the last national election of 1967. Since that time, general elections have been impossible because of continued Israeli occupation of the West Bank. Vacant East Bank seats have been filled through elections which are widely considered to have been fair and open. The country is still seeking a formula which will provide adequate parliamentary representation for the West Bank in lieu of Jordanian-sponsored elections there. Vacant West Bank seats are currently filled by vote of the other members of Parliament.

Most municipal and town councils are elected by popular vote. Suffrage is universal. Women were enfranchised in 1973 and may also run for office. King Hussein has encouraged the participation of women in the political process and appointed Jordan's first female cabinet minister in 1979.

Organized political parties are not permitted, although several informal political groups operate openly. The Communist Party is banned. All persons seek elected office as independents.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Jordan has attracted little attention from either private or international human rights organizations. The Jordanian lawyers' professional association has a human rights committee, but it is not active. Other organizations and ad hoc groups occasionally issue statements and petitions on such human rights concerns as Palestinian rights and the ban on political parties. The International Committee of the Red Cross maintains an office in Amman and its representative regularly visits all prisons and detention facilities. He is allowed to meet in confidence with all incarcerated persons and the Government is responsive to his recommendations. In its 1985 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the imprisonment of possible prisoners of conscience, the prolonged detention without trial of political prisoners, allegations of ill-treatment of prisoners, and the death penalty. Freedom House rates Jordan "partly free."

Several members of the royal family are actively interested in such issues as prison reform and women's rights. Crown Prince Hassan cofounded the Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues. The Government has also played an active role in the International Labor Organization and the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Jordan's population is 2,794,000 with an annual growth rate of 4.1 percent. Despite limited natural resources, Jordan has continued to provide its citizens with a rising standard of living and improved social services in recent years. World Bank figures show per capita gross national product at $1,640 in 1983.

Nevertheless, adverse conditions in the oil economies of Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, which provide employment for most of Jordan's skilled expatriate work force, have affected Jordan's economy. The growth in remittances has slowed considerably and direct aid from Arab countries declined from $1.2 billion in 1981 to less than $600 million in 1984. Other factors contributing to Jordan's slower economic growth have included depressed prices for phosphates, Jordan's primary export product, a continuing slump in construction, and increased debt repayments. A heavy trade deficit (imports exceeded exports by a factor of four to one in 1984) continues to plague the economy. Central Bank statistics record a 1984 gross domestic product growth rate of 3.8 percent compared to 5.4 percent in 1983.

Jordan is a highly urbanized society with about 80 percent of its people residing in a city, suburb, or semiurban area. About 10 percent of the population is composed of Palestinian refugees living in shelters supervised by the United Nations Relief and Works Agency. The domestic Jordanian labor force of 430,000 has, until recently, been at close to full employment. An additional 320,000 Jordanians work abroad primarily in technical and professional positions in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states. About 150,000 mostly unskilled foreign workers (primarily from Egypt) reside in Jordan.

Jordan has placed great emphasis on social service projects. In the last decade, numerous schools and health centers have been built and sewage, water, and electrification projects undertaken. Welfare assistance is principally family-based, although the Government and charitable organizations provide some help.

Health facilities in Jordan are widely distributed, but uneven in quality. Facilities range from Amman's modern King Hussein Medical Center, which performed the Arab world's first heart transplant in 1985, to simple rural clinics. The ratio of 1 doctor for 960 East Bank Jordanians in the early 1980's is expected to improve to 1 doctor for 368 residents in 1986. Life expectancy at birth is currently 64.48 years. The 1984

World Bank estimate of infant mortality is 53 per 1,000 live births. The World Bank estimated in 1982 that 80 percent of the population had access to safe water.

Education is highly valued in Jordan and its educated citizens, who work in many countries, are Jordan's most important resource. World Bank figures for 1982 indicate Jordan's primary school (grades 1-6) enrollment ratio was 81.30 percent (81.36 percent for males and 81.25 percent for females). These rates drop slightly for preparatory school (7-9). Although attendance at secondary schools (10-12) is not compulsory, about 74 percent of the age group enrolls. Competition to attend Jordan's two major universities is fierce. A third university for military and security personnel was opened in 1984. Students who are not accepted in domestic universities frequently attend one of many community colleges or attend university abroad. The Education Ministry estimates that about 50,000 Jordanians are currently attending institutions of higher learning abroad. Adult literacy has increased dramatically from about 20 percent in 1958 to 72 percent in 1983, with males at 82 percent and females at 60 percent.

Jordan's workers are protected by a comprehensive labor code enforced by inspectors of the Ministry of Labor. Children under 13 are not permitted to work. Children aged 13 to 15 are allowed to work a maximum of 6 hours a day, but are forbidden to work at night (except with special permission) and in certain occupations regarded as dangerous. The Government prepares and adjusts periodically a minimum wage schedule for various trades based on recommendations of an advisory panel composed of representatives of workers, employers, and the Government. Maximum working hours are 48 hours per week, with the exception of hotel, bar, restaurant, and movie theater employees who can work up to 54 hours. Workers are entitled to a weekly day of rest, rest intervals during the workday, 2 weeks annual paid leave, 2 weeks annual sick leave, and severance pay. The law specifies a number of health and safety requirements including bathrooms, drinking water, safety equipment, and first aid equipment for workers. Jordan also has a worker's compensation law. The Government appears to administer and enforce its labor laws fairly.

Women in Jordan have traditionally devoted themselves to family responsibilities, thereby disfavoring them economically and, to a lesser extent, educationally. Women's role in society has been changing in recent years, however. Women now account for half the student body at the elite University of Jordan. At another educational level, a newly-opened vocational training center in Amman has begun to teach women to repair radios, television sets, and office machinery. Such changes in educational patterns are similarly reflected in the work force. Women today comprise about 20 percent of the labor force, compared to 4 percent in 1975. Although women participate generally in subordinate positions and most heavily in clerical, teaching, and administrative jobs, there has been a significant increase in the number of women in such professions as medicine, engineering, and architecture. Women are now officers in the police, two female Jordanian pilots now fly for Royal Jordanian Airlines, and women increasingly operate businesses. The Government encourages women workers by requiring maternity leave and child care centers at large establishments.

Equality between men and women is the legal norm. In practice, certain traditions can constrain women's freedoms. In matters of inheritance and divorce, women are also treated differently. Under Islamic law, sons inherit twice as much as daughters. Although a man may obtain a divorce more easily than a woman, he may be required to pay considerable compensation based on the marriage contract. A recent divorce reform law increased compensation for women suffering from an arbitrary divorce. Women may also gain custody of young children.

KUWAIT

Kuwait's amirs, drawn from the Al-Sabah family, have traditionally governed in consultation with several commercially powerful families and other community leaders. The 1962 Constitution contains detailed provisions on the powers and relationships of the branches of government and on the rights of citizens. Kuwait's National Assembly institutionalizes a degree of consultation with the ruling family and serves as an outlet for popular expression, including criticism of the Government. Political activity is restricted by the ban on political parties.

Kuwaitis are a minority in their own country, comprising 40 percent of the total population. Kuwaiti citizens are 60-65 percent Sunni Muslim; the remainder are Shi'ite Muslim and a tiny minority of Christians. Although the members of Kuwait's Shi'a minority perceive themselves to be largely excluded from leadership positions in the Government, many have achieved great wealth. The Iranian revolution has made Kuwait's leadership more aware of the potential for Shi'a subversion. Meanwhile, the majority Sunni community has experienced an upsurge of Islamic fundamentalism which frequently conflicts with attitudes of the traditionally moderate members of the merchant class. Kuwait's expatriate population includes 300,000 Palestinian long-term residents, many in their second generation. Non-Kuwaitis are given due process under the law but have few other civil and political rights.

Although the Government restricts the political and civil rights of all residents, and particularly those of women and expatriates, it rarely violates the integrity of the individual. Kuwait's security apparatus is used primarily to maintain internal order. It does not engage in political repression.

Increased political turbulence and rising terrorism in the region during 1985 affected the human rights situation in Kuwait. The role of Kuwait's security organizations increased substantially, particularly with regard to the noncitizen community. Terrorist acts, widely believed to be foreign-inspired, continued with the attempted assassination of the Chief of State and the bombings of two public cafes. A prominent Kuwaiti newspaper editor was seriously wounded in an assassination attempt, and an Iraqi diplomat and his son were shot to death in their home. The violence has led to a further increase in security measures and legal restrictions on public gatherings and dissemination of "subversive" literature. Increased attention to law and order is also viewed by some Kuwaitis as a means to protect their society against the threat they perceive to Kuwaiti moral and social values from the large foreign population. Since the beginning of the current cycle of terrorism with the December 1983 bombings of Kuwait installations and the American and French embassies, security organizations have assiduously applied regulations governing expatriate presence in Kuwait and, since the attempt on the Amir's life in May 1985, Kuwaiti officials have publicly acknowledged the deportation of over 15,000 non-Kuwaitis. Internal socioeconomic changes brought on by sudden oil-related wealth, coupled in recent years with violent revolution in Iran and the Iran-Iraq war, have also led to a growing demand by well-organized groups for stricter controls over public morality and political expression. A resurgent Islamic fundamentalist movement advocates adoption of a more stringent legal code based on Islamic Shari'a law.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In March, 1985, an Iraqi diplomat and his son were killed by unidentified gunmen. No group claimed responsibility for the killings, but agents of a foreign government were suspected. No arrests in the case were made.

In May, a car bomb attempt was made against the life of the Chief of State, Amir Jaber al-Ahmad al-Sabah. Four persons, in addition to the suicide bomber, died in the attempt, but Amir Jaber was only slightly wounded. Although callers purporting to be members of at least two organizations claimed responsibility for the attack, no one had been indicted by the end of 1985.

In July, 10 persons were killed and a number wounded when bombs detonated at two public cafes. A caller purporting to be a member of the Arab Revolutionary Brigades claimed responsibility. No one had been indicted by the end of 1985. In both the attempt on the Amir and the cafe bombings, the complicity of groups supported by foreign governments was widely suspected.

There were no reported disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Local security forces, without authorization, occasionally use physical violence when interrogating individuals suspected of committing criminal acts. These incidents do not appear to be widespread or condoned. Non-Kuwaitis are more likely to receive rough treatment than are Kuwaitis, and the seriousness of the suspected crime also appears to be a determining factor. Evidence of mistreatment during interrogation is a defense in Kuwait's courts and has led to the release of a number of suspects.

Kuwait's prisons are managed along modern lines. Treatment is humane, and the Government provides food and other necessities. Young offenders, few of whom are imprisoned, are separated from persons charged or convicted of serious crimes. There is no policy of discriminatory treatment among prisoners for racial or religious reasons.

Large numbers of expatriates were detained, and many of them deported, following the attempt on the Amir's life in May 1985 and the cafe bombings in July. Because of limited space in detention centers--frequently local police jails--there were reports that detainees did not receive adequate food and that hygienic conditions were poor. However, accusations by Iran that some detainees were tortured and killed by the authorities have not been substantiated.

The legal process is based in part on Islamic law, but punishments such as mutilation or stoning are not permitted. Some fundamentalist members of the National Assembly have attempted to force the Government to adopt Islamic law fully, and by extension its harsh punishments, as the only basis for legal process, but their efforts have not been successful.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and imprisonment are prohibited by the Constitution. In 1985, there was no confirmation that persons had been detained for political reasons. Persons may not be denied due process or held for more than 4 days without charge, and a prosecutor's approval is required for detention periods beyond 24 hours. Thereafter the suspect must either be released or charged by a prosecutor, who may authorize detention for up to an additional 21 days. Further detention pending trial may be authorized by a judge. Warrants are required unless a person is apprehended in the act of committing an offense. These procedures are followed in practice. Road blocks and spot checks of outdoor gatherings of expatriates, especially of South Asians, are used sporadically by the police searching for illegal immigrants and contraband liquor. Persons without proper identification may be detained by the police under the procedures described above.

A number of Kuwaitis and non-Kuwaitis were detained and interrogated following the 1985 terrorist bombings. There were a number of reports that local authorities focused their searches for inadequately documented expatriates on Shi'a Muslims of Iranian, Iraqi, and Lebanese origin, leading to some arbitrary detentions. In August 1985, the Government publicly acknowledged that legal procedures had been ignored in some instances, but stated that such practices would be halted. Although there have been unconfirmed reports of incommunicado detention, it does not appear to be a common practice.

No Kuwaiti citizen may be exiled or denied return to Kuwait. However, a noncitizen, even if a long-term resident, may be summarily expelled without a specific charge against him if considered a troublemaker by the authorities. As a result of security measures taken following the May-July 1985 terrorist bombings, a substantially larger number of non-Kuwaitis were deported in 1985 than in previous years. The great majority, however, were persons who had arrived in Kuwait illegally or whose residence permits had expired.

There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Kuwait's judicial system is independent and provides for public trial, the right of appeal, and representation by an attorney of one's choice. Failure of the police to respect a suspect's rights may provide a defense in the courts. Trials in absentia have occurred. In such cases, the defendant is allowed an additional right of appeal. There are no reports of secret or unfair trials or of discrimination against defense counsel. However, the court-appointed attorney of a defendant unable to engage his own lawyer is not always given adequate time to prepare a defense. Interpretation of court proceedings to ensure their understanding by non-Arabic-speaking defendants is sometimes inadequate. According to the Constitution, military courts have jurisdiction only over offenses committed by members of the armed or security forces, except during periods of martial law (which has never been declared in Kuwait). The Amir has the power to pardon or to commute sentences passed by either civilian or military courts and does so through the publication of an annual list of commutations following major religious holidays. The only known prisoners currently jailed for politically related acts are 17 persons convicted of participating in the December 1983 bombings which had resulted in several deaths. Three of the prisoners were sentenced to death, but their executions, which must be ordered by the Amir, were still pending at the end of 1985.

KUWAIT

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to individual privacy and sanctity of the home is provided for in the Constitution and generally respected in practice. Warrants are required to search, unless the police are in hot pursuit of a suspect fleeing the scene of a crime or where there is an indication of the presence of alcohol or illegal narcotics. Search warrants to enter residences or businesses are issued by a public prosecutor. Expatriates, and particularly common laborers and servants who live in accommodations provided by their employers, may have their premises searched by the police with authorization only of the employer. Following the May and July 1985 bombings, security authorities occasionally did not follow these procedures. In several such instances, however, cases were filed against the officials in court and the police were warned against such actions.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutional guarantees in this area are conditional, modified by such phrases as "in accordance with conditions and manner specified by law." The average Kuwaiti or Kuwait resident feels free to offer his opinion in private without fear of official retaliation. No one may make a written or public attack upon the Amir and the ruling family, upon Islam, or upon leaders of friendly Arab states. Kuwait has an active censorship department, which reviews all books, films, videotapes, periodicals, and other material entering Kuwait in bulk or for commercial purposes. In practice, references to the State of Israel are often excised from educational materials, reference works, and maps. Items arriving by post for individuals or institutional use are usually not opened before delivery, unless the contents are suspected of being pornographic. Printed and visual material produced within Kuwait is not subject to precensorship, but is liable to government action after publication or release. Radio and television are government-owned and controlled.

The Kuwaiti press is not precensored. Articles and editorials critical of government action or of individuals appear frequently. The press law sets down several categories which are restricted. These include direct criticism of the Amir and the ruling family; official confidential communications or treaties and agreements with other states; material which might disturb relations with Arab and friendly states or which might prove embarrassing to their heads of state; and a general category of stories which "might incite people to commit crimes, create hatred, or spread dissension among the people." In practice, the list is interpreted selectively and violators are usually only issued warnings. Although no such incidents occurred in 1985, editors and publishers are liable to imprisonment and fines for violations. The Government permits the use of languages other than Arabic in speech, print, and private schools.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political parties are banned. Political activity finds some outlet in social clubs and religious gatherings known as "diwaniyyas." The Constitution protects the right to private assembly, public meetings, processions, and gatherings which are peaceful and not contrary to public morals. However, any group of more than three people desiring to meet for public discussion (or to meet privately but to issue a public statement) must receive prior permission from the Ministry of Interior. The authorities may prevent such an assembly merely by ignoring the request. During 1985 there were no mass gatherings, except those associated with religious observances. During a Shi'a religious commemoration with potential political overtones in September, security forces were highly evident although they did not interfere.

Kuwait permits trade unions, although only government employees and the petroleum, banking, and airline sectors are unionized. The majority of union members are civil servants. Kuwaiti citizens are allowed to establish and join unions. Unions may draw up their own constitutions, formulate their own programs, and join confederations. Many union activities are, however, funded by the Government and subject to government approval. Workers have the right to bargain collectively. The right to strike, though seldom exercised, is recognized. Kuwaiti labor law has a provision allowing for compulsory dissolution of any union that "commits an act considered to be violating the provisions of this law and of the laws connected with the preservation of public order and morals." Expatriate workers, who comprise the majority of the labor force, are permitted to join unions after five years residence. Non-Kuwaitis are not, however, permitted to vote, hold office, or form unions. They are described as "associate members" of the unions. Since each union must be formed by and have several Kuwaiti members, expatriate unskilled workers have no union representation.

In the spring of 1985, some oil workers struck to protest the required performance of additional tasks not in their job descriptions. Port workers struck in the summer to demand higher wages. There is no apparent harassment of professional groups, bar associations, scientific bodies, or labor unions, which are also allowed to participate in international bodies. The Kuwait Federation of Trade Unions, grouping the government and petroleum workers, is a member of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and the World Federation of Trade Unions. Kuwait is an active member of the International Labor Organization (ILO). In 1984, the ILO requested Kuwait to amend its labor laws to bring them into conformity with various ILO conventions to which it is a party, but no action had been taken by the end of 1985.

On December 8, Kuwait's State Security Court concluded the trial of four Kuwaiti citizens who had been indicted on a variety of charges including membership in an organization whose goal was to overthrow the regime and distribution of subversive literature. One defendant was sentenced to two years at hard labor for criminal complicity. A second received a similar sentence for training in the use of weapons. Two other defendants were found not guilty of any the charges. According to Kuwait News Agency, the case involved a "group accused of publicizing doctrines aimed at undermining the State's basic system and instigating the overthrow of the regime.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution declares that "freedom of belief is absolute," but states further that its practice is not to "conflict with public policy or morals." Kuwait's state religion is Islam, and the Shari'a (Islamic law) is, according to the Constitution, "a main source of legislation." The ruling family and most prominent Kuwaiti families are Sunni Muslims. There is no official policy of discrimination against Shi'a Muslims, who constitute about one-third of Kuwait's citizenry, but they and members of Kuwait's tiny Arab Christian minority are seldom appointed to sensitive government positions. There are a number of expatriate Christian congregations in Kuwait and several churches. In recent years the Government has banned Christmas parties in the country's hotels and restaurants. Pressure from fundamentalist Islamic groups is the unstated reason for the restriction. Expatriate practitioners of Eastern religions, e.g., Hindus, Sikhs, and Buddhists, are not allowed to establish places of worship in Kuwait but may worship privately in their homes. Proselytizing of Muslims by non-Muslims is prohibited.

In the past three years, the National Assembly has barred the future granting of citizenship to non-Muslims, prohibited all importation of alcoholic beverages, and repeatedly attempted to establish Islamic law as the basis for all legal process. Assembly members have also pressured, with some success, those campuses of Kuwait University which are sexually integrated to separate the sexes in the classrooms and in other facilities, such as cafeterias. The Government has accommodated the National Assembly's demands for the application of some fundamentalist principles but has blocked attempts in the Assembly to apply Islamic law across the board.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens generally are free to travel inside and outside the country, to emigrate, and to return. There is some restriction on foreign travel for young men who have not completed, or been exempted from, their compulsory military service. Those serving in the military must receive permission from the Defense Ministry before traveling abroad. Although there are no different legal standards regarding the internal or foreign travel or emigration of Kuwaiti women, in practice husbands can prevent their wives and minor children from leaving the country.

There are occasional instances in which citizens' passports are suspended temporarily. Generally, this has applied mainly to criminal suspects, but sometimes to outspoken regime critics as well. By late 1985, upwards of 8,500 Kuwaitis were barred from traveling abroad because of debts remaining from the collapse of an extra-official stock market three years earlier. Representatives of societies, associations, and trade unions wishing to travel to and participate in international meetings have to receive prior permission.

Although the Constitution states that "no Kuwaiti may be deported from Kuwait or prevented from returning thereto," persons have been stripped of Kuwaiti citizenship and deported. Such actions have been rare and have in some cases been based on the voluntary acquisition by the person of foreign citizenship. One such incident publicly reported in 1985 involved a person who purportedly obtained citizenship illegally. There have been unconfirmed rumors that several other persons also were stripped of citizenship and deported following the 1985 bombings.

All non-Kuwaitis in Kuwait over the age of 21 must have the sponsorship of a Kuwaiti citizen. Kuwait does not extend permanent residence to its expatriate population, although in 1985 the National Assembly debated the advisability of extending residence and property ownership privileges to expatriates. Employers have the power to restrict job mobility and the continued residence in Kuwait of their expatriate employees. Many expatriates (including some government employees, such as teachers) must surrender their travel documents to their employers, thus preventing them from leaving the country without the employer's consent. Those employed by government agencies are given residence visas which require an exit permit or "no objection" letter in order to leave the country. Non-Kuwaitis convicted of crimes are routinely deported after serving their sentences.

Illegal entrants to Kuwait are normally returned to their home countries; exceptions have been made for those persons, mostly Iranians and Afghans, who are considered by the Government to be legitimate refugees and have been permitted to remain in Kuwait or sent to third countries. Most members of Kuwait's large Palestinian population have Lebanese or Jordanian travel documents. Since 1984, undocumented Palestinians, and those with Lebanese documentation, have received commitments from the Government that they will be allowed to stay even without sponsors, although Palestinian youths over 21 years of age who travel or study outside Kuwait often have difficulty rejoining their families in Kuwait.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Al-Sabah, a family of Bedouin origin, have ruled Kuwait for over 200 years. The 1962 Constitution limited succession to descendants of Mubarak the Great, the ruler at the turn of this century. In practice, the ruler and senior family members choose the Crown Prince from either the Al-Jaber or the Al-Salim branch of the Al-Sabah. Under the Constitution this choice is confirmed by majority vote of the National Assembly. Executive power is vested in the ruler and, under him, in an appointed Council of Ministers whose chairman by tradition is the Crown Prince.

Upon independence, Kuwait inaugurated a National Assembly composed of 50 deputies, elected by secret ballot, plus cabinet members (presently 16, including the Prime Minister), sitting ex-officio. Candidates for the National Assembly are self-nominated; multiple candidates compete for the 50 seats. A "grandfather clause" effectively limits suffrage to adult males who resided in Kuwait before 1920 and maintained a residence there until 1959, and their descendants. Women's suffrage was considered and rejected by the National Assembly in 1982. A Kuwaiti women's organization was unsuccessful in 1984, both in its attempts to register women to vote and to take the issue to the constitutional court. The issue is likely to be debated in future National Assembly sessions, particularly in light of an Islamic ruling in 1985 that women should not have the right to vote.

The National Assembly reviews government policy and programs, including budgets, makes recommendations, and questions ministers on a variety of subjects, especially their ministries' responsiveness in public services. Government policy is criticized in the Assembly, which only rarely rejects government-proposed legislation, but which is capable of exerting sufficient pressure on the government to cause it to modify its legislation to satisfy Assembly desires. Constitutionally, the National Assembly can bring down the Government or force individual cabinet members to resign. Since the Prime Minister is by tradition also the Crown Prince, the Assembly has forced the entire cabinet to resign only once. Should the Assembly declare that it is unable to work with the Government, the Amir may dismiss the Government. He has the option, however, of dismissing the Assembly and calling new elections. As a result of debate in the 1985 Assembly, the Justice Minister, who was a member of the ruling family, resigned before a vote of confidence was taken against him.

Informal contacts between rulers and ruled are an important feature of the Kuwaiti political system. Traditionally, adult male Kuwaitis have had relatively easy access to their tribal and religious leaders, the heads of the prominent merchant clans, and to the ruling family itself through the system of "diwaniyyas," informal discussion groups to which anyone can come and freely speak his mind. That custom has endured, as has the tradition that the Amir should govern in consultation with the other community leaders. High-ranking officials are also approachable through "wasta," the use of influential family members or acquaintances as intermediaries in obtaining favors or a more favorable hearing for one's case.

While most male Kuwaiti citizens can participate directly or indirectly in the political process, noncitizens, who outnumber Kuwaitis by three to two, have no role. Kuwait has been reluctant to extend citizenship to those of non-Kuwaiti origin, with the exception of certain stateless Bedouin. Naturalization of even Kuwait-born persons is rare. This anomaly is particularly striking for the 300,000 Palestinians, the second largest segment of the population. Citizenship has been extended only to a few Palestinian families who made significant contributions to Kuwait before the early 1970's. The Government has established a committee to draw up criteria for granting citizenship but the results of its deliberations are not expected in the near future. Expatriates seldom engage in political activities for fear of exposing themselves to possible deportation.

Amnesty International, in its 1985 report, expressed concern that during 1984 political prisoners were tried in camera with no right of appeal and that some of the hundreds of people deported from Kuwait could become prisoners of conscience and face torture or execution in their homelands. Freedom House calls Kuwait "partly free." There are no known current requests by nongovernmental organizations to examine human rights in Kuwait.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Kuwait's population of 1,710,000 is growing at the rate of 3.5 percent a year. The Government has an extensive social welfare program to spread the benefits to all citizens of the extremely high per capita gross national product, estimated by the World Bank to have reached $17,880 in 1983. The distribution of this wealth is heavily skewed in favor of Kuwaitis.

The major social distinction in Kuwait is between Kuwaiti nationals, who comprise only 40 percent of the population, and expatriates. Ownership of commercial establishments (above 49 percent), real estate, and shares on the local stock market (the principal sources of private wealth in this capitalist economy) is open only to Kuwaitis. Kuwaiti labor laws give priority in employment to Kuwaitis, then Arabs, and lastly other foreigners. The current economic recession threatens the expatriate community by encouraging efforts to reduce the number of long-term resident non-Kuwaitis. Many have begun to look for employment outside Kuwait.

Programs are designed to provide Kuwaitis with housing, family allowances, retirement income, medical care, education, and employment. Improved health care has resulted in a drop in the infant mortality rate to 20.5 per 1,000 live births and an increase in life expectancy for Kuwaitis, as of 1985, to 71.7 years. Although exact figures are unavailable, few if any persons are below the absolute poverty level and malnutrition has been effectively eliminated. In 1980, the adult literacy rate for Kuwaitis was 67.5 percent.

White collar and skilled expatriate workers often earn the same base pay as Kuwaitis, but receive less in fringe benefits. Benefits restricted to Kuwaiti citizens include higher government salaries, additional government stipends and social allowances, and, in general, retirement pensions. Resident expatriates are entitled to some medical benefits. Public schooling is offered, with some exceptions, only to children of expatriates who arrived in Kuwait prior to 1963, although the Government subsidizes tuition for students in a number of Arabic language elementary and secondary schools. Kuwaitis are given preference for admission to the University of Kuwait. Unskilled expatriate workers, however, earn much less money and usually are not permitted to bring their families to Kuwait. Some of these workers live in crowded apartments or work camps.

General conditions of work are established by Kuwaiti labor law for both the public and private sector, with the oil industry treated separately. The law limits the work week to 48 hours, provides for a minimum of 14 days leave per year, establishes a compensation schedule for industrial accidents, and establishes a minimum age of 18 years for full-time work, or 14 years for part-time work. Women are permitted to work except in "dangerous industries and trades harmful to the health," and are promised "equal remuneration to that of a man provided she does the same work." There is no legal minimum wage, but this has little impact in practice since Kuwait is not a low-wage country. Reflecting the importance of the petroleum industry in Kuwait, the law governing employment in this sector is more generous than the general laws. It provides for a 40-hour workweek, overtime pay for shift work, 30 days annual leave, and a generous sick leave policy.

There are two ministerial orders that supplement the above laws. Number 14 (1970) established an interministerial board to resolve labor disputes and Number 42 (1979) created a permanent commission to coordinate activities in the field of public health and occupational safety.

Kuwaiti women are allotted a subordinate role by statute and practice. Denied the vote, women are also limited by tradition from freely choosing their role in the society, though less so than in some other Islamic countries. Nevertheless, there are Kuwaiti women who are outspoken in their demand for a broader role in society. In contrast to the practice in some neighboring countries, a Kuwaiti woman is permitted to drive a car, may wear Western dress in public, and has legal access to higher education inside and outside the country. Although women have yet to join the work force in large numbers, they are able to compete for government and corporate employment and have the right to litigate against men (for example, in child custody suits). Many women have accumulated substantial personal wealth. However, the Government has restricted women from being assigned abroad in Kuwait's diplomatic service. Some prominent, educated women also are wary of current fundamentalist trends which they fear may lead the Government to restrict their freedoms as a price for fundamentalist restraint on other issues.

LEBANON

Formally, Lebanon is a constitutional democracy with a directly elected, unicameral Parliament which chooses the President. Political power is divided on the basis of a formal Constitution and in accordance with the unwritten, confessionally-based National Pact of 1943, which provides for a Maronite Christian President, a Sunni Muslim Prime Minister, and a Shi'ite Muslim Speaker of Parliament. The National Pact also provides for the proportional allocation of government positions among various religious groups on the basis of the 1932 national census.

Ten years of war, however, have drastically reduced the authority of the central Government and its ability to safeguard human rights and have seriously undermined the country's democratic institutions. Unofficial militias have seized control of much of the country, where they, in effect, govern the civilian population and enforce their own version of justice without regard to the central Government or legal norms. Moreover, the presence of foreign forces has greatly diminished those areas under government authority. Although Israel withdrew the bulk of its forces from South Lebanon during 1985, the Lebanese Government has yet to extend effective authority to that region. Through the presence of an estimated 30,000 troops, Syria continues to control large parts of northern Lebanon as well as much of the Biga' Valley. Even in those few areas of Lebanon under nominal central government control, the authority of the State and its security services does not go unquestioned.

Already seriously disrupted by a decade of war, Lebanon's free enterprise economy deteriorated even further in 1985. Business confidence dwindled, new investment stagnated, and remittances from Lebanese abroad dropped to the lowest level since 1975. The value of the Lebanese pound plummeted, causing a serious decline in the standard of living of most Lebanese.

The year 1985 brought no overall improvement in the human rights situation. As in previous years, major battles fought in densely populated areas intentionally or unintentionally cost the lives of hundreds of civilians and displaced thousands of others. Noncombatants far from the fighting have also been the targets of violence, such as terrorist bombings, random shellings, assassinations, and abductions. Freedom of movement between East and West Beirut and to much of the country was severely limited.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Rival factions routinely kill for political motives. Such killing has not been restricted to soldiers and militiamen; it has also been used frequently against noncombatants. Both indiscriminate and carefully planned attacks against civilian targets continued to occur throughout 1985, killing hundreds and wounding, endangering, and displacing thousands. While forces outside of government control were responsible for most of these killings, opponents of the Lebanese Government charge that security forces and the Lebanese Army also carried out such attacks during the past year.

LEBANON

Such political killing has resulted from both conventional warfare and terrorist attacks. In 1985, residential areas in greater Beirut, Sidon, and elsewhere in South Lebanon were frequently the target of random shelling, whose purpose often appears to have been to kill or intimidate civilians. Terrorist attacks in the form of massive car bombs indiscriminately killed several hundred civilians in East and West Beirut, Tripoli, the Biqa' Valley, and South Lebanon. In all instances, these explosions took place in neighborhoods or villages in which one confessional group predominates, and thus appear to have been aimed against that group. The car bombs were usually detonated in crowded areas in order to maximize casualties.

The cycle of violence in South Lebanon intensified in early 1985 but gradually diminished as Israel began to withdraw its forces. Before and during the withdrawal, Israeli and Israeli-backed forces raided a number of villages in South Lebanon to apprehend persons suspected of carrying out attacks against them. An undetermined number of these persons were killed or arrested. By late 1985, the cycle of attacks and counterattacks had subsided but not ended.

In the fall of 1985, Syrian artillery shelled Tripoli, intervening in a fight between local militias and siding with forces opposed to the fundamentalist Islamic Unity Movement (Tawhiid) which controlled the city. In an apparent effort to break the will of Tripoli's besieged defenders, Syrian artillery units forced the closing of the port and systematically destroyed selected portions of the city, resulting in an undetermined loss of life. The role of Syrian infantry in the battle remains unclear, although Syrian ground forces later policed the subsequent cease-fire in Tripoli.

Heavy fighting also occurred among other groups, most notably between Lebanese Shi'a and Palestinians in and around the refugee camps in West Beirut. These clashes resulted in several hundred deaths on each side, including both militiamen and civilians.

In addition to random acts against civilians, there have been numerous assassination attempts against prominent political and religious figures. These assassination attempts took the form of ambushes, rocket attacks on homes, and car bombings. Attacks on foreign diplomats in Beirut continued in 1985. One diplomat, a Soviet, was killed. In June, members of the Lebanese Shi'ite militia Hizballah hijacked a TWA airliner and held its passengers hostage. The hijackers murdered one American, and seriously endangered the lives of the other hostages. Finally, at year's end, two Lebanese Jews, part of a group of six kidnaped earlier in the year, were killed. Responsibility for the killings was claimed by a hitherto unknown group, Organization of the Oppressed on Earth.

b. Disappearance

Thousands of Lebanon's inhabitants have disappeared since the beginning of the war in 1975. Private militias and foreign forces, rather than official Lebanese security services, appear to be responsible for most of these kidnappings. The victims were abducted primarily by militiamen at roadblocks or in ambushes, and many were probably summarily executed. Most of these persons remain unaccounted for, but occasional hostage exchanges and releases do occur.

LEBANON

During 1985, politically motivated kidnappings continued unabated. Abductions were particularly prevalent in West Beirut and along the so-called Green Line, which divides predominantly Christian East Beirut from mostly Muslim West Beirut. Some Lebanese were kidnapped because of their affiliation with rival militias. Most, however, were civilians abducted simply on the basis of religion. The Lebanese victims included, for example, Muslims traveling to East Beirut, Christians living or working in West Beirut (including Christian passengers and airline employees trying to reach the airport in West Beirut), and six members of the small Beirut Jewish community. In 1985, the number of foreign diplomats, journalists, clergymen, academics, and others who were kidnapped in West Beirut escalated. A few were eventually released, but over 10 U.S., French, and British nationals remain hostage.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Overwhelmed by the presence of private militias and foreign forces, the official Lebanese security services control so little territory that relatively few allegations of torture are made against them. In its report, "Torture in the Eighties," Amnesty International noted that it had received allegations of "some cases of torture" in Lebanon.

Almost no reliable information is available on the treatment of prisoners held by Lebanese militias, Syrian occupying forces, the Israeli-sponsored Army of South Lebanon, or Palestinians. Allegations of brutal treatment abound, but it is impossible to determine to what extent these allegations, which are often leveled by archenemies, reflect actual practices.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Lebanese law, a suspect must be arraigned before an accusation committee (a panel of three judges) and the prosecutor within 48 hours, but government prosecutors sometimes hold suspects indefinitely for interrogation without reference to a judge. Every prisoner has the right to legal counsel, but there is no public defender's office. Bail is permitted in most cases.

No militia or foreign occupying force observes the legal safeguards which the Government is committed to apply in arrest cases. In general, persons arrested by these groups are denied access to the judicial system and to due legal process. Various militias detain individuals arbitrarily for indefinite periods, often to be exchanged for persons held by rival militias. Such detainees, are frequently held incommunicado. In addition to politically motivated abductions, some militias presume to enforce law and order in regions under their control, arresting, imprisoning and, in at least one instance, executing individuals on purely criminal charges.

In 1985, representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) continued to visit Lebanese and Palestinian detainees held in several Israeli prison camps in South Lebanon. The Israelis dismantled these camps as they withdrew from Lebanon. Several hundred prisoners were transferred from Ansar, Lebanon, to Atlit, Israel, during this withdrawal. All were released by September. The Army of South Lebanon, an Israeli-backed militia, maintains a detention center in Khiyam, which neutral observers have not been allowed to visit. The Government does not, as a rule, arrest or exile its political opponents. Fear of assassination by political rivals has, however, driven several prominent Lebanese into voluntary exile, and the general decline in public security has stimulated the emigration of many Lebanese.

The Government does not resort to forced labor. In the present anarchy, however, militias have forced workers, especially immigrant laborers, to perform unpaid duties such as filling sand bags for use in building defenses against attack. Such forced labor typically ends when tensions lessen.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Lebanese law, practice, and custom provide the right to a fair public trial. A decade of war, however, has disrupted the judicial process, and many cases remain unadjudicated. Trial delays result, for example, from the difficulty of conducting investigations when most of the country remains beyond effective government control, from a shortage of judges, and, most importantly, from the general breakdown in security.

Although Lebanese police and courts are present throughout the country, the disposition of criminal cases ultimately depends on the group in power locally. For example, militias frequently intervene to protect their supporters from detention and prosecution.

The Government does not sentence persons to imprisonment for essentially political beliefs or acts. As noted above, however, militias frequently arrest and imprison members of opposing political and military groups.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government has generally evinced no interest in controlling personal life. The law requires the Government to obtain the equivalent of a warrant before entering homes, except when the Lebanese Army is pursuing an armed attacker.

Rights of privacy, however, have been frequently violated in the course of military operations mounted by the army, militias, and foreign forces in Lebanon. All of these groups have attempted to gather intelligence on their adversaries, including by informer networks and telephone monitoring.

In 1985, armed groups in many sections of the country violated the sanctity of the home by deliberately shelling residential areas, destroying houses, and killing and wounding their occupants. During the first part of the year, withdrawing Israeli forces in South Lebanon demolished the houses of numerous persons suspected of anti-Israeli activities. Shelling and sniping reportedly continues in those areas of South Lebanon still under the control of the Israeli Armed Forces and the Israeli-backed Army of South Lebanon. In April and May, Muslim militias overran predominantly Christian villages in the Iqlim Al-Kharrub and east of Sidon, forced their inhabitants to flee, and thus displaced thousands of families. Throughout 1985, shelling of nonmilitary targets occurred in the greater Beirut area, almost always in densely populated residential neighborhoods.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Lebanon has a strong heritage of freedom of opinion, speech, and press. The Government has traditionally protected the rights of those who have opposed government policies through peaceful means. In 1985, however, at least one person was detained several weeks for criticizing the Government.

Dozens of newspapers and magazines representing a broad spectrum of opinion are freely published, and the Government has tolerated the activities of extralegal radio and television stations operated by widely diverse political groups. There are reports that the Government occasionally advised newspapers against running specific articles. Such instances appear rare, however.

Intimidation of journalists by militias and terrorists constituted the most serious threat to press freedom. In 1985, several Western journalists were abducted, and some remain in captivity. As a result, most other leading foreign journalists left the country. The offices of the leading leftist daily, As-Safir, were ransacked in West Beirut. Israeli forces at times banned journalists from certain sections of southern Lebanon. Christian militias have prevented the regular distribution in East Beirut of several leftist dailies. Intra-Christian rivalry resulted in the seizure of the Phalange Party newspaper Al-Amal by the Lebanese Forces militia and the temporary detention of its editor. This rivalry also caused a brief disruption in the publication of Le Reveil, a Christian newspaper generally sympathetic to the President.

The continued breakdown in security in 1985 greatly disrupted schools and universities to the detriment of academic freedom. Terrorists and militiamen, who continued to intimidate university faculty and administrators, represented a serious threat to Lebanon's long tradition of academic freedom. In 1985, two U.S. nationals, the dean of agriculture of the American University of Beirut (AUB) and the director of the American University Hospital (AUH), were abducted. In late 1984, an American librarian at AUB also disappeared. Several Lebanese employees of AUB and AUH were abducted over the past year as well.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government places no restrictions on the right of free assembly, as long as it does not incite popular unrest. Many groups in Lebanon exercised their right to engage in peaceful public demonstrations during the past year.

The major constraint on this freedom came from the militias and foreign forces. In areas under the exclusive control of one militia, demonstrations or open shows of support for rival militias or political groups are not permitted. In South Lebanon, the Israelis had at times allowed peaceful demonstrations against their presence. On other occasions, they dispersed such demonstrators.

Political groups, such as those which opposed the Israeli occupation, are not permitted to operate freely in areas still under the control of the Israeli-backed militia. The Syrians do not, in general, accept groups hostile to them in the areas which they occupy.

LEBANON

Lebanon has traditionally enjoyed democratic labor and management institutions. Collective bargaining and the right to strike continue to exist, despite 10 years of war. However, with unemployment reaching 30 to 50 percent in certain sections of the country, traditional labor practices have become increasingly irrelevant. There are no current statistics on union membership. Employees remain highly organized in the banking industry, which is one of the few sectors of the Lebanese economy which continues to function at near former levels. Lebanon's major labor union negotiates annual wage increases with the Government to offset inflation.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government affirms the right of freedom of worship, and Lebanese practice their various religions with a great degree of liberty.

The 1943 National Pact essentially allocated political power on a confessional basis, according to the proportion of various religious groups in Lebanon as determined by the 1932 census. The unwritten National Pact stipulated that the President would be a Maronite Christian, the Prime Minister a Sunni Muslim, and the Speaker of Parliament a Shi'ite Muslim. Seats in the Parliament were divided on a six to five ratio of Christians to Muslims. Positions in the government bureaucracy were allocated on a similar basis. Some religious groups thus enjoy greater institutionalized political power than others, and it has been frequently charged that politically powerful groups influenced government policies to the economic benefit of their coreligionists. Efforts to alter or abolish the confessional system of allocating political power have been at the center of Lebanese politics for more than three decades. Those religious groups most favored by the 1943 formula have sought to preserve it, while others who feel disadvantaged by it have sought to revise it on the basis of new demographic realities or to abolish it entirely. This struggle has given a strongly religious coloration to Lebanese politics and to the continuing civil strife there.

The intensification of religious hatreds has led away from confessional mixing and towards confessional segregation. Today Lebanese live more and more in neighborhoods and villages inhabited exclusively by one religious community. Many fear to travel to areas where other sects predominate.

Few Muslims live, for example, in East Beirut or openly practice their religion in predominantly Christian areas. Many Christians fled mainly Muslim West Beirut during 1985, complaining of increasing efforts to enforce Islamic mores and of a severe deterioration in public security. In the spring of 1985, several thousand Christians were forced by various Muslim militias to abandon their homes in the Iqlim Al-Kharrub, Sidon, and the villages east of Sidon. Many of these displaced persons have sought refuge in Jazzin, in other Christian towns in South Lebanon, or in the predominantly Christian areas east and north of Beirut. Lebanon's tiny Jewish minority has been intimidated by kidnappings during 1985, and very few Jews remain in their traditional neighborhood in West Beirut.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not restrict foreign travel by Lebanese citizens. Emigration and dual citizenship are permitted.

LEBANON

There is no impediment to voluntary repatriation by Lebanese with valid identity papers.

Lebanon historically has been a land of asylum. During this century, it has given refuge to thousands of Armenians and Palestinians, as well as to smaller numbers from other Middle Eastern ethnic and religious groups. Lebanon's political and economic troubles in recent years have greatly diminished its appeal to refugees. Relatively few sought asylum there in 1985.

Lebanon's relationship with the Palestinian community has been difficult. Most Palestinians, like other foreigners, have not been able to obtain Lebanese citizenship. Their status as a "state within a state" under the 1969 Cairo accords and their involvement in internal fighting from 1975 until 1982 resulted in the bitter enmity of many other groups. In the wake of the 1982 conflict, many Palestinians have encountered difficulty in renewing residence permits and travel documents, and delays still continue. In 1985, some Palestinian combatants returned to Lebanon, and there were serious battles between them and Shi'ite Lebanese fighters.

Lebanese traditionally enjoyed freedom of internal travel, but this freedom has been greatly circumscribed by militia groups which have established checkpoints to keep those deemed undesirable out of areas under their control. The so-called Green Line bisecting East and West Beirut remained closed for lengthy periods, effectively dividing the city and paralyzing many aspects of daily life in Beirut. Crossing the Green Line even when it was officially open remained extremely risky.

Israeli forces and the Israeli-sponsored Army of South Lebanon maintained tight restrictions on the movement of people and goods into and out of areas which they occupied. For approximately five months, the Syrian Army imposed a travel permit requirement on Lebanese crossing into and out of Syrian-controlled territory in North Lebanon. This requirement seriously hindered travel between Beirut and the north.

Because of the closure of the Green Line, fighting and kidnappings along the road to Beirut International Airport, and chaotic security conditions of the airport itself, many Lebanese encountered serious difficulties in traveling abroad. Travelers unable or unwilling to risk using Beirut International Airport, which is located in West Beirut, had the option of traveling overland to Damascus or using the ferry to Cyprus.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Formally, Lebanon is a parliamentary democracy. According to its Constitution, direct elections must be held for its 99-member Parliament every 4 years. Parliament, in turn, elects a president every 6 years, and the President appoints a cabinet which must obtain the confidence of Parliament. Political parties may be formed. Women enjoy the same civil rights as men.

A decade of political turmoil, growing militias, and foreign occupation has robbed these democratic institutions of much of their substance. No parliamentary elections have been held since 1972. Although Parliament, the Presidency, and the Cabinet continue to exist, their effective authority does not extend to most of the country, which is under foreign occupation or militia control.

In the past decade, violence has dominated the political process, as militia groups and foreign forces have resorted to force to gain their way. Leaders of the major factions met in Lausanne, Switzerland in March 1984 and agreed on a program for national conciliation. These leaders later formed a National Unity Government, whose efforts to implement the national conciliation program have so far not succeeded. In March 1985, the Cabinet ceased to meet regularly. In effect, Lebanon existed without a functioning Cabinet for most of 1985.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has a mixed record in dealings with international human rights groups, and indigenous groups have not pressed the Government strongly on human rights issues. Families of missing persons demonstrated along the Green Line on several occasions in 1985, but these protests appear to have been directed against the private militias more than the Government. The ICRC functions widely in Lebanon. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern about arbitrary arrests and detentions, including incommunicado detention, abductions, torture, and extrajudicial killings in regions of Lebanon under the effective control of the Government, the Israel Defense Forces, the Syrian Army, and a number of Lebanese militias. Freedom House rates Lebanon as "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Lebanon's population of 2,619,000 is growing at the rate of 2.1 percent annually. Lebanon attained a high degree of prosperity in the 1950's and 1960's by acting as an entrepot and service center for much of the Middle East. During this period, wealth tended to concentrate in Beirut and, according to some, was channeled into the hands of members of the more powerful religious communities.

Continuing civil strife has destroyed the basis of Lebanon's prosperity. Beirut's port and airport were closed frequently; tourism virtually ended. Many multinational firms moved their regional offices from Beirut to other capitals. Remittances from Lebanese workers abroad declined sharply, as did industrial production. Many banks faced large outstanding loans which they could not collect. The economy of South Lebanon was seriously harmed during the Israeli occupation because of restrictions on the flow of people and goods to and from this area. Since the Government of Lebanon does not control its border with Syria, it loses substantial revenues due to widespread smuggling. Unemployment continued to rise in 1985, although no accurate statistics exist. Underemployment also remained a serious problem, since many employers have reacted to the economic slump by putting their employees on short time.

In 1985, the Government continued to face great difficulty in dealing with the war's economic and social consequences. The loss of control of much of the country to militias and foreign armies drastically reduced its ability to collect direct taxes, and the intermittent closure of Beirut's ports and smuggling through private, militia-run ports greatly diminished the collection of customs fees which traditionally supplied the bulk of government revenues. In effect, government revenues have virtually ceased, and expenditures are reduced mainly to paying the salaries of civil servants through deficit financing. Although the Council of Reconstruction and Development has, for example, financed a few public road projects, the Government has little ability to respond to the needs of the population. Subsidies of wheat and petroleum products continue, but it is uncertain how long the Government can sustain them, particularly in view of the spread of malpractices in the trade of these commodities.

The economic welfare of most Lebanese continued to decline in 1985, with the country remaining divided and the Lebanese pound faltering. The most depressed areas are those parts of the cities, especially Beirut and its suburbs, which have suffered most from the impact of the war and from the influx of displaced persons. Hardships in these areas are mitigated somewhat by the distribution of funds and commodities by religious and other relief organizations. The rural population appears to maintain a reasonable income, as agricultural production continues at historically depressed but still significant levels.

The infant mortality rate is 41.60 per 1,000 live births and life expectancy at birth is 65.93 years. The adult literacy rate is about 68 percent. During the era of prosperity before the war, Lebanon's medical and educational facilities had attained a level unmatched in the other Arab countries of the region. Both have since declined because of the war and domestic turmoil.

Lebanon has comprehensive labor laws covering a range of issues involving workers' rights, including minimum wages, safe working conditions, length of the workweek, child labor, and annual holidays. However, given the civil strife engulfing the country, it is not known whether these statutes continue to be enforced.

Women enjoy equality of civil rights and attend institutions of higher learning in large numbers. Religion, social tradition, and the prevailing atmosphere of insecurity and economic hardship make it difficult, however, for women to expand their participation in Lebanon's social, political, and economic institutions. The women's organizations that do exist are, for the most part, subordinate arms of political parties which work to advance the interest of the parent party rather than that of women in general.

LIBYA*

The Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya describes its form of government as "popular democracy." Although in theory political power is vested in "the masses" under the guidance of the People's Congress and its executive arms, the People's Committees, in practice the country is ruled by a charismatic military leader, Colonel Mu'ammr Al-Qadhafi, aided by extragovernmental "Revolutionary Committees." The governing principles of the society are expressed in Qadhafi's "Green Book" rather than in the Constitution. Qadhafi has created a political system that borrows from pan-Islamic and pan-Arab sources, purporting to establish a "third way" superior to both capitalism and socialism. Despite the local level participants in government, Qadhafi, though holding no formal government position, is the primary decisionmaker on all important issues.

Libya's security apparatus operates at various levels, involving not only Qadhafi's personal bodyguards and the official country-wide police/interior establishment, but also the Revolutionary Committees and Basic People's Committees which act independently of other authorities when encouraged by Qadhafi. The result is a complex of multilayered tight controls, not necessarily explicitly dictated, over individual activities and freedoms. The conservative attitudes of a strict Islamic society produce further restrictions on the individual freedoms and rights of certain groups, e.g. businesspersons. Qadhafi has sought to provide greater equality for women in education and employment but has faced serious resistance from his conservative countrymen.

Libya has used much of its considerable oil income of recent years to finance internal development (new schools, hospitals, roads) and generally to increase the standard of living of the people. Qadhafi has, however, diverted substantial resources to the acquisition of large quantities of weapons and to foreign military adventures, e.g., intervention in Uganda and two invasions of Chad. Further, the recent decline in oil revenues has forced retrenchment: significant parts of Libya's 1981-85 development plan have been dropped, foreign exchange controls have been tightened, and imports have been restricted. Most recently, Qadhafi's move to expel thousands of foreign workers has in some cases hit directly at key public services, e.g., bread lines have resulted from the departure of Tunisian bakers.

Libya's human rights record, poor since Qadhafi seized power in 1969, showed little improvement in 1985. Although there was no incident comparable to the 1984 coup attempt, with its subsequent brutal and widespread purge, there were continued reports of torture and abuse. Qadhafi has urged a reduction in the number of offenses subject to capital punishment, but he not only made it clear that such sentences would continue to apply to political acts against the regime but also reiterated his call for the searching out and execution of the regime's "enemies abroad." Treatment of foreigners worsened, as reflected not only in the summary expulsion of some 65,000 foreign workers but also in the illegal detention of foreigners, including 4 British citizens detained for some 10

*Since the U.S. has no officials present in Libya and since Libya's media is tightly controlled, this report draws heavily on unofficial sources.

LIBYA

months as hostages in an effort to blackmail the British Government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Although there was no repeat of the widespread summary executions and public hangings (carried on television) which followed the coup attempt of May 1984, 1985 saw at least four possible coup attempts with subsequent arrests and punishments for those accused. In early 1984, the Government directed resumption of assassinations of Libyan exiles and announced the formation of "suicide squads" to hunt down and kill Libyan dissidents abroad. In September 1985, Qadhafi explicitly stated that the death penalty was still appropriate for individuals who refused to repent and reiterated his call that they be searched out and killed. A year after the attempted assassination of former Libyan Prime Minister Abdel Hamid Al-Bakoush in November 1984 in Cairo, confirmed by Libya's official news agency as the act of Libyan "commandos" whose job was to eliminate "stray dogs abroad," Egyptian authorities in November 1985 announced the arrest of another four-man Libyan "hit team" which had again targeted Bakoush and other Libyan dissidents in Egypt. The Egyptians stated that their investigation revealed that this was but one of seven such Libyan teams being trained for such missions.

b. Disappearance

Unofficial elements such as the Revolutionary and Basic Peoples Committees continue to carry out arrest and detention of suspected opponents of the Government, with the encouragement of Qadhafi. Such persons, as well as those detained by the official security establishment, may be held incommunicado for unlimited periods without further information as to their condition, whereabouts, or the charges against them. This has been particularly the case for many rounded up in the wake of the May 1984 coup attempt.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Continuing reports of torture and mistreatment of prisoners received graphic confirmation in the televised "trials" following the May 1984 coup, in which some of the accused clearly showed evidence of abuse. Detainees in criminal and security cases reportedly are regularly beaten during interrogation. In some prisons, conditions reportedly are tolerable but, according to information received by Amnesty International, conditions of detention for political prisoners have worsened, including transfer to overcrowded cells and confiscation of reading and writing materials.

Mistreatment is not limited to Libyan nationals. In a case described by Amnesty International in its 1985 report, a Norwegian sailor reportedly died under torture in the custody of a Revolutionary Committee in May 1984. The Libyan authorities sought to attribute the death to suicide and the ship's authorities, before the ship was allowed to depart, were forced to apologize for this "suicide"--a violation of Islamic law. At the U.N. General Assembly in September 1985, the Libyan Foreign Minister reportedly agreed to pay $500,000 in damages to the survivors to settle the case. There are numerous reports that foreign workers, summarily expelled from Libya in August and September 1985, were harassed and beaten in the course of their efforts to leave the country.

While Shari'a (Islamic) law is practiced in Libya, there are no reports that physical mutilation is used as a form of punishment. Amnesty International has expressed concern about the large number of offenses, including political offenses, which are punishable by death under Libyan law. For example, membership in an illegal organization is a capital offense. Qadhafi, in a September speech to the Peoples' Congresses, called for a review of the application of capital punishment, terming it "cruel" and not respectful of human dignity. However, he reaffirmed application of the death penalty to those already under detention or who plot against the revolution.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Libyan law, detainees may be held incommunicado for unlimited periods. Many allegedly are held without charge or trial, apparently as an example to would-be opponents of the regime. Libya declared several years ago that there were then "no political detainees on any charge in its prisons." Reports from a variety of sources, however, assert that the prisons contain increased numbers of persons convicted of, or held for, political offenses, including large numbers of persons arrested in 1984. Qadhafi has justified imprisonment on political, as opposed to criminal, charges. In a 1981 speech he stated, "Those who are put into prisons are there because they are the enemies of the people. There is no shame and there is nothing wrong in putting these persons in prison or in treading on them with your feet." In March 1985, in addressing the People's Congress, Qadhafi again encouraged Revolutionary Committees to investigate and arrest persons guilty of treason whose cases, for whatever reason, the police could not handle. Although he also opposed secret arrests, there is no evidence that this exhortation has resulted in any improvement in practice. Foreigners are not immune from arbitrary arrest. Four British citizens were arrested in 1984 and held for 10 months in apparent retaliation for the U.K.'s arrest of Libyans responsible for bombings and assassinations in the U.K. While Qadhafi disclaimed personal responsibility, stating that these arrests resulted from the action of "the people," he did acknowledge that the issue was "basically political." The four were eventually released following negotiations conducted on their behalf by Terry Waite, an aide to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Exile is not a form of punishment practiced in Libya; to the contrary, Qadhafi seeks to exercise pressure on Libyans working or studying abroad to return to Libya. Libya does, however, engage in the arbitrary expulsion of noncitizens. In August 1985, it summarily expelled thousands of foreign workers, including more than 30,000 Tunisians and 10,000 Egyptians. They were expelled generally without the right to take more than minimal possessions, often without complete compensation for work performed or the right to transfer savings held in Libya, and in many cases were subject to harassment in the process of departure and had their travel documents confiscated. The International Labor Organization sent a team to Libya to investigate these actions, and a report is pending. (Two of the confiscated passports were later found in the possession of Palestinian terrorists in an attack at the Vienna airport in December.) In general, forced labor is not practiced.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The normal court structure in Libya has been bypassed to a significant extent by the "people's courts," which conduct "show trials" and executions. This parallel legal system provides fewer safeguards, and trials are frequently held in camera or in absentia. A 1981 law prohibits the private practice of law and makes all attorneys employees of the Secretariat of Justice. The Union of Arab Lawyers, located in France, has expressed concern for the ability and freedom of attorneys simultaneously to provide legal defense for political prisoners and to serve as government employees. Libya claims that it "guarantees prisoners all necessary means of defense and safeguards of justice adequate to the principles contained in the Declaration of Human Rights" and provides for legal assistance "as soon as possible with respect to the exigencies of interrogation," but there are numerous reports that these rights are frequently denied. In security cases in particular, there are many reports of prisoners being held without trial for long periods. While undergoing interrogation, sometimes for periods of several months, they are given no access to legal representation. Alleged political offenses are increasingly tried before ad hoc "revolutionary courts" rather than under the normal judicial procedure, with the opportunities for defense severely restricted. Moreover a number of these "trials" have been held in secret. There is no precise estimate of the number of political prisoners in Libya. In the wake of the 1984 coup attempt, the number may have risen to several thousand.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government recognizes no absolute right to privacy. The legal requirement that judicial warrants must be obtained before entering a private home is reportedly often disregarded. Local and international phone calls are routinely monitored. The informer network extends to the Revolutionary Committees and other local organizations and does not respect individual privacy. Libyan exiles claim that mere family ties to suspected regime opponents can result in harassment or even persecution by the authorities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although some difference of opinion is tolerated in People's Committee meetings and at the General People's Congress, in general freedom of speech is severely limited, particularly with regard to any criticism of the Government or Qadhafi. Freedom of speech and other basic civil and political freedoms are further restricted during periods of internal security crises. Libyan media are owned and controlled by the Government. JANA, the official news agency, is the designated conduit for politically acceptable opinions. It is impossible to publish opinions contrary to government policy. Foreign publications, if not banned outright, are severely censored. There is an underlying climate of fear and mistrust at all levels of society which further restricts freedom of speech.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of association is granted only to those institutions affiliated with the regime. Public assembly is repressed if it is not government-controlled and supportive of regime positions. Organizations such as trade unions and professional associations are viewed as threats by Qadhafi, who has vowed not to "accept intermediaries between the revolution and its working forces."

Unions are organized under government control and are administered through the popular committee system. Collective bargaining does not occur; there have been no reports of strikes (except by students) for years--presumably they are not permitted. An exiled opposition group in June 1983 appealed to the International Labor Organization to investigate "the oppressive record of the Qadhafi regime with regard to its treatment of workers and laborers and employees in Libya, with particular emphasis on violations of human rights agreements and conventions governing labor and labor unions." This group also charged that Libya has forced foreign workers and employees into military training with the intention of coercing them into military and subversive activities against their own countries.

c. Freedom of Religion

Libya is overwhelmingly Muslim. The regime has banned the once-powerful Sanusiyya Islamic religious organization in an apparent effort to eliminate any alternative power bases. Restrictions were placed on the operation of the organization's Zawaayaa (lodges), a government supervisor was appointed for Sanusi properties, and the Sanusi-sponsored Islamic University was merged with the University of Libya.

Services are apparently permitted in Christian churches, which are exclusively attended by the foreign community. There is a resident Catholic bishop and a small number of priests. Nuns reportedly are permitted to wear their habits.

Nearly all of the formerly sizable Jewish community has emigrated, and no information is available on the status of any Jews who may remain. Qadhafi has stated that he is opposed to Zionism, not Judaism, and that Arab nations should welcome Arab Jews who wish to return to their countries of origin. But in a speech in June 1985 he cited the Prophet Muhammed as stating that Judaism and Islam cannot coexist in the land of the Arabs and, in September 1985, virulently anti-Jewish broadcasts on Libyan radio called for anti-Jewish violence in areas of Tunisia within broadcast range.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

With the exception of security areas, internal freedom of movement is not usually restricted for Libyan citizens. An exit permit is required for travel abroad, and currency controls are imposed to restrict travel. Military conscription regulations deny the issuance of exit permits to potential inductees. It is reported to be increasingly difficult for Libyans suspected of inadequate revolutionary attitudes to travel abroad. Moreover, as part of the effort to control the outflow of foreign exchange, there are indications that the Government is limiting nonessential travel, such as tourism in Europe. Restrictions already limit the amount of currency which can be taken out of the country to $1,000 (300 dinars) per year, regardless of the number of trips. Under Libyan Islamic law, wives may not leave the country without their husbands' permission; children may not travel without their father's consent. The right of return of Libyan nationals is fully protected, and theoretically extends to include opponents of Qadhafi, so long as they are prepared to "repent." However, this "right" often appears to be more of an obligation or threat, with calls for students and others working abroad, often under government subsidy, to return with little or no notice and without regard to the impact on their studies or work.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Major government decisions are controlled by Qadhafi or by committees acting in his name. He makes all appointments of military officers and official functionaries down to a low level. Power flows through a small circle of trusted associates, whose own authority is a reflection of their proximity to Qadhafi. Corruption has assumed major proportions, with adverse effects for local government.

Participation in elections is mandatory, and the candidates are cleared by the Revolutionary Committees from among persons who are not "merchants, contractors, tribal advocates, elections-brokers, officials of the former (pre-1969) government or people who have been attacked by the power of the revolution." Political parties and tribal or local groupings are prohibited, and involvement in such activities remains punishable by death.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In its 1985 report, Amnesty International expressed concern over renewed official calls for "physical liquidation of enemies of the revolution" and subsequent killings of Libyans at home and abroad; the continued detention and imprisonment of prisoners of conscience; the detention without trial of political prisoners; trials before People's Congresses without basic legal safeguards and resulting in executions; the systematic torture and ill-treatment of political and other suspects during the course of interrogations; and the death penalty. In its 1984 report on Violations of Human Rights in Libya, Amnesty International noted that it has registered repeated protests, calls for investigations, and appeals for the respect of human rights with the Libyan authorities, all without reply or signs of corrective action. Freedom House classifies Libya as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Libya's population of 3,752,000 is growing at the rate of 3.2 percent annually. Per capita gross domestic product rose from $5,560 in 1971 to $11,700 in 1980 before slipping to about $8,000 last year.

LIBYA

Libya's substantial oil wealth has allowed the regime to improve living standards significantly, especially for the lower classes, despite major expenditures for military equipment. Oil revenues have provided the basis for the expansion of infrastructure providing services to the population such as schools and health facilities; they also fund the recruitment of foreigners to man these facilities, where Libyan human resources are inadequate.

Libya has generally abided by the reduction in its OPEC quota to 990,000 barrels per day and as a result has witnessed a sharp drop in its revenues. Budget expenditures in the past 3 years have been scaled back and the imposition of foreign exchange controls has sharply reduced imports of consumer goods, resulting in chronic shortages. Recent indications are that the supply of basic food supplies essential for balanced nutrition, particularly outside major urban areas, has been affected, with resulting impact on health standards. Similarly, the large-scale expulsion of foreign workers in August, in part a reflection of the need for greater economic austerity, has had an immediate impact on the quality of life and availability of services for many Libyans.

Investment in health facilities and marked growth in female literacy over the past decade have contributed to an increase in life expectancy at birth from 52 years in 1971 to 58 in 1984. The infant mortality rate is approximately 82 per 1,000 live births. Virtually all of the population has access to safe drinking water. Salt water encroachment into littoral aquifers is contaminating fresh water supplies in some urban areas, forcing the Government to undertake massive water projects.

No information is available on Libyan regulations governing workers' rights. In general, there is no evidence that child labor is a problem in Libya. Foreign workers are subject to arbitrary pressures such as changes in work rules and contracts with little option but to accept or depart, often without full compensation for work already performed. However, with the Government dependent in many cases on the skills of these expatriates, most foreign laborers are paid substantially more than would be possible in their home countries.

The traditional, conservative cultural attitudes of Libya's Islamic society serve to restrict the rights of certain groups, most notably women. Within the confines of Islamic beliefs, Qadhafi has taken a leadership role in efforts to change the status of women and expand their access to educational and employment opportunities. Although his proposal that women along with men be subject to military conscription was originally defeated, Qadhafi succeeded in having the decision reversed and women currently receive basic military training and are subject to a draft.

MALDIVES

The Republic of Maldives is a parliamentary democracy headed by a strong president. It is best described as an "emerging democracy." There are no political parties, and candidates for the unicameral legislature, the Majlis, run for office as individuals. The Majlis selects a single nominee for president, who is subsequently approved or rejected by the voters. All citizens over age 21 may vote. In practice, government control in this small, homogeneous society is exercised by a small elite with a common background and outlook, whose authority is generally and traditionally accepted by the population.

The Maldives is a nation of 1,200 islands in 19 atolls scattered across an area 500 miles long by 75 miles wide in the Indian Ocean. The isolation of individual island communities from each other, and of the Republic as a whole from the rest of the world, is a dominant feature of social and economic life. It is one of the world's least developed countries, with nearly half the population engaged in traditional activities such as fishing, harvesting and processing of coconuts, and small-scale farming.

The Maldives has not been subject to attack or invasion from outside for hundreds of years, and thus sees no need for a large defense establishment. The country's 800-1,000 strong National Security Service is responsible for maintaining internal law and order, protecting the President, defending the country, and preventing foreign fishermen from encroaching on Maldivian fishing grounds. The police division of the Service investigates crimes, makes arrests, and enforces house arrest.

There was little change in the human rights situation during 1985. Virtually universal adherence to Islam, the innate conservatism of a traditional society, and the high degree of homogeneity of the Maldivian people all underlie the relative absence of pressures for social and political change. The authority of the small ruling elite is widely accepted and open dissent is rare.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

In 1985, there were no reports of disappearances.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The 1968 Constitution stipulates that "under no condition shall a torture considered to be injurious be inflicted upon any person." This provision of law is upheld in practice and there were no reports or allegations of torture in 1985.

Maldivians follow Shari'a or Islamic law, and occasionally convicted criminals are flogged. Usually, however, punishment is confined to less physical means such as fines, payment of compensation, house arrest, imprisonment, or banishment to a sparsely populated island where the prisoner must labor to earn his daily keep.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires that "no person shall be apprehended or arrested, except on a verdict specified by Shari'a or (civil) law." There is no provision under Maldivian law for preventive detention, and incommunicado detention is not practiced. There were no reports in 1985 of persons being subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile. Acting on information or complaints received, the Attorney General's office passes the case to the appropriate court and the judge then instructs the police to undertake an investigation. The suspect is questioned at police headquarters and may, depending upon the charges, be detained or placed under house arrest for 15 days while the case is investigated. If the case is not brought to trial within 15 days, the suspect is freed. Detention or house arrest may be extended after the first 15 days by authority of the President, but usually for not more than 1 month. While there are no provisions for bail, an accused person held without bail who has valid reason to travel may receive permission to do so from the court handling his case.

Actions which "arouse the people against the Government" are illegal and persons can be arrested and charged with violation of this law, the penalty for which can be banishment to remote atolls of the Maldives. Forced labor does not exist, except in the case of persons banished to remote atolls, who must work to earn their keep.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

During trial, the accused may defend himself and call witnesses. He also may be assisted by a lawyer, but there are few lawyers and lawyers are not provided by the courts. The accused is sentenced by the judge; the length and type of sentence are established by law and custom.

There is a High Court and eight lesser courts in the capital at Male, each dealing with specific types of cases (e.g., debt, theft, property claims). On other islands there are courts that deal with all types of cases. Judges are trained in Islamic law, are appointed by the President and serve at his pleasure, and thus cannot be considered fully independent. Cases in island courts that present knotty legal points are referred to the appropriate specialized court at Male, whose judge may in turn refer the legal point to four judges attached to the Justice Ministry for assistance. The High Court acts as a court of appeal and handles political cases, such as the trials of the participants in an attempted coup d'etat in 1980 and of four Majlis members found guilty of bribery in 1983.

There are currently only three Maldivians serving sentences of banishment for crimes which can be considered political acts. These three were convicted either of participation in the 1980 coup attempt or of unconstitutional activities and taking bribes. In November 1985, President Gayoom pardoned about 400 prisoners who had served a specified portion of their sentences. None of the political prisoners were included in the pardon, however.

MALDIVES

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits the opening, intercepting, reading, or making public of letters, telephone conversations, telegrams, and wireless messages exchanged between persons "except in accordance with the specific provisions of the law." There have been no reports of complaints in 1985 that the Government monitors correspondence or telephone conversations or uses a system of informers. There are no prohibitions on the importation of foreign publications, except pornography, and foreign broadcasts are not jammed. The Government does not interfere with the right to marry, or seek forcibly to resettle population.

The Constitution also requires that private premises and dwellings be respected and "therefore they shall not be entered into except under conditions and in a manner stipulated in the law." There have been no reports of practices to the contrary.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and expression "so long as the specific provisions of Shari'a and the law are not contravened." Any citizen may criticize or complain to the Government without fear if he does so through recognized channels, such as via letters or oral complaints to the President, to a Majlis member, or to a civil servant or other person in authority.

Maldivians are frequently frank in private when discussing and criticizing the Government. However, the law which prohibits arousing opposition to the legally established Government, together with a long tradition of authoritarian rule, tend to make Maldivians careful when expressing their opinions to foreigners or in the media. There is no prior censorship of newspapers, but writers and editors are subject to prosecution if their articles contravene the law. In 1984, five writers were prosecuted for articles which the Government alleged had created antigovernment feelings. Of the five, one was banished. The offensive articles dealt with such matters as suggestions for improving the fisheries sector and how to deal with foreign vessel encroachments, inefficiency in a government hospital, and a discussion of the laws preventing the Government from closing, as it intended, a private radio station. A few editors and writers were questioned about articles for which they were responsible during 1985, but none was prosecuted.

There are three privately owned newspapers, each required to register with the Government. The only government-owned publication is the News Bulletin, published by the Maldivian Department of Information and Broadcasting.

The Government does not restrict academic freedom. Maldivians are free to acquire and impart knowledge "in a manner that does not contravene Shari'a or civil law." A law in effect since July 1984 has required that students enrolled in government-run or government-assisted schools be liable for government service for varying periods, depending upon their educational attainments. The bill was deemed necessary because of the drop in the number of young Maldivians entering government service.

MALDIVES

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution assures freedom of assembly and association, but Maldivians make little use of these freedoms in a political sense. The majority of rallies and meetings are sponsored or approved by the Government and commonly are addressed by officials or religious leaders. Clubs and other private associations, of which there are many, are permitted to function if they do not contravene Shari'a and civil law, and if they register with the Government.

There are no trade unions in the Maldives. Workers' rights to organize, bargain collectively, and strike are not recognized or protected by statute. Until the 1970's, most Maldivians either were self-employed or held government jobs and there was a relative lack of interest in workers' rights or organization. However, during the past 4 years three sizable garment manufacturing facilities opened, employing large numbers of workers. There were no special provisions regarding workers' rights or treatment in the agreements to establish these companies between the Government and the foreign investors. However, a Department of Labour was formed in 1982 and it has been studying the labor situation in the Maldives and in other countries with a view eventually to developing appropriate labor regulations for the Maldives.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution makes Islam the official religion and all citizens are Muslims. There are no churches or shrines for the practice of any other religion. Missionaries of non-Muslim faiths are not permitted to proselytize in the Maldives. Conversion of a Muslim to any other faith would be a violation of the Shari'a, the law of the land, and would automatically result in the loss of Maldivian citizenship. However, links with coreligionists in other countries are freely allowed and a delegation from the Maldives performs the Hajj each year.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Maldivians are free to move about the country unless they are under house arrest or detention or banished. However, the Government discourages Maldivians from changing islands of residence, primarily because most recent migrants have moved to Male, which is becoming severely overcrowded. The Government reimposed regulations in 1982 that limit immigration to the capital island and its surrounding atoll, permitting migration to Male only for short periods in order to work, be educated, or receive medical treatment. At the same time, the Government has made a major effort to improve social and educational services and develop industry outside of Male.

Maldivians are free to change jobs. There are no restrictions on foreign travel or on emigration, and there are no exit visas. The Government requires any Maldivian who has acquired another nationality to maintain Maldivian nationality concurrently. Such a person must enter and leave the Maldives on a Maldivian passport. As far as is known, the Government never has revoked the citizenship of any Maldivian. There are no refugees or displaced persons and, so far as is known, no Maldivians have been exiled or are refugees or displaced persons elsewhere.

MALDIVES

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Maumoon Abdul Gayoom rules the Maldives together with a small group of generally well-educated members of the elite who are loyal to him. There are no political parties, although they are not forbidden by law. President Gayoom has, however, publicly discouraged their formation as being inappropriate to the homogeneous nature of Maldivian society.

Members of the unicameral legislature, the Majlis, are chosen for 5-year terms by means of secret ballots cast by all Maldivians over 21 years of age. Candidates for the Majlis must be over 25 years of age, Muslim, able to read and write both Arabic and Maldivian script, not involved in a crime for the past 5 years, and in good mental and physical condition. Of 48 members, 40 are elected (2 from each atoll and 2 from Male), and 8 are appointed by the President. There were 162 candidates for the 40 seats contested in the December 1984 elections. Once elected, Majlis representatives are freely approached by citizens or groups with grievances or points of view on proposed legislation.

Candidates for President must be Sunni Muslim, born of Maldivian parents, male, over 30 years old, not convicted of any crimes, and mentally stable. A single nominee for President is chosen by secret ballot in the Majlis from as many candidates as are proposed by the members. The nomination then is confirmed or rejected in a nationwide referendum, also by secret ballot. In 1983, the Majlis voted 47 to 1 to nominate Gayoom to a second, 5-year term. Maldivians confirmed Gayoom with 95.62 percent of their votes. At the time of his nomination and the referendum, President Gayoom had no serious competitor for the position. Some irregularities apparently occurred during the referendum, especially on outer atolls where island chiefs cast the ballots of all eligible voters on their islands. Nevertheless, it is fair to assume that Gayoom's leadership is widely accepted by the electorate.

Since there are no political parties, factions in the Majlis tend to coalesce around individuals or points of view and vary according to the issue. Any member may introduce legislation, which, if seconded, must be considered by the Majlis. All laws must be approved by the Majlis. The Majlis has the power to question ministers and to call for their removal. In practice, however, the Majlis generally supports the Government after carefully discussing and sometimes amending its proposals.

There were no requests for outside investigation of human rights violations in 1985. There are no local human rights organizations. Amnesty International did not include the Maldives in its 1985 Report. Freedom House rated the Maldives "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of the Maldives is 180,000 and is growing at an annual rate of 3.6 percent. Estimated gross domestic product per capita rose to $460 in 1985. Just under a quarter of the population lives on Male, the capital island, which is 400 miles west-southwest of Sri Lanka.

The economy performed well in 1985, due largely to growth in the fishing and tourism industries, but the Maldives nevertheless remains one the least developed countries in the world. Most Maldivians still work in traditional occupations: fishing, the largest industry, involving about 46 percent of the population; harvesting coconuts for copra and making rope; and some subsistence farming. The tourist and textile industries are providing much-needed additional foreign exchange.

The Government is trying to improve the standard of living, partly by working to increase production of traditional products such as fish and coconuts. It also is trying to tempt the inhabitants of Male to return to their native islands or atolls with prospects of employment and better social services there. Programs are under way to replace coconut trees with better strains, make better use of the limited arable land (only 10 percent of the total land), and to introduce new varieties of vegetables in family gardens. There are efforts to increase the annual catch of fish through improved technology.

The tourist industry has continued its rapid expansion. Until several years ago, the Government permitted development of tourist resorts only on islands not inhabited by Maldivians and around Male, where most educated Maldivians live, in part to lessen the impact of tourism on the conservative society of the Maldives. In 1985 there were over 50 hotels and guest houses operating on designated resort islands throughout the country to accommodate the over 100,000 tourist arrivals. The tourist "bed night index" has more than doubled since 1980. The tourism industry received a special boost in 1985 with the establishment of direct scheduled flights from Male to Europe and Singapore.

By 1985, the Government had reached its goal of establishing 22 health centers in the 19 atolls. Plans exist to upgrade and improve three of these health centers. Besides the fairly well equipped hospital in one of the northern atolls, in 1985 a new hospital was completed and opened in a southern atoll and construction began on another. Health care remains rudimentary but is improving. Life expectancy at birth is 53.3 years and infant mortality is 81.5 per 1,000 live births. Based on 1980 statistics, only 5 percent of the total population of the Maldives has access to safe water, with urban dwellers (11 percent) better off than rural residents (3 percent).

The present Government has made considerable progress in education. The country boasts about 85 college graduates, and 56 percent of Maldivians had completed primary school in 1985, up from 44 percent the previous year. Primary school enrollment is 12.2 percent. On the basis of 1977 statistics, the overall literacy rate is 82.4 percent, with the rate for women (82.3) slightly lower than that for men (82.5).

There is now a government school, with trained teachers and a broad curriculum, in every atoll. At present, these schools serve only the children on the islands where they are located. The Government's long-term goal is to have such schools on every inhabited island. The Government has also built community education centers in every atoll. It has established an advanced level secondary school and a vocational training center on Male island, and it plans to build vocational training centers in some of the outer atolls. A teachers training center opened in Male in March 1984, but there are no universities in the Maldives. As a result, the Government seeks scholarships for promising students to attend universities in the Middle East, India, Australia, and the United Kingdom.

Worker rights are neither recognized nor protected in the Maldives, and there are very few labor standards set by the Government. Only government workers are entitled by presidential directive to a paid annual holiday and free health care in the event of work-caused illness. There is no minimum age for the employment of young people. The Government has set no restrictions on conditions under which children or young people may be employed, although most employers do not hire young people for work at night or in what are considered hazardous conditions. There is no national minimum wage, although the Government has established wage floors for certain kinds of work. There is no restriction on the number of hours per week an employee can be required to work, and there is no requirement that private sector employees receive an annual paid holiday.

A textile factory on Thulusdhoo in Male Atoll, which opened in 1985, has been plagued by allegations of worker abuse and violations of the terms of employment contracts. Most of the workers are Sri Lankan women. The Maldivian Government has begun investigating these claims.

Traditionally not equal beneficiaries of the political and economic opportunities of their country, Maldivian women have benefited from the current Government's deliberate efforts to improve opportunities for them. Patterns of behavior and living conditions for women are less restrictive than in some other Islamic countries. For example, they are not required to wear the veil, and a growing number of women serve in responsible positions in the Government and in the professions.

By Islamic and Maldivian tradition, women play a lesser role than men in public life. No women were serving as members of the Majlis elected in 1980; President Gayoom appointed one. There are three women in the Citizens' Special Majlis that is reviewing the proposed constitution. Women hold 15 responsible positions in the civil service. The President has appointed 2 women as aides, another to be his Director of Social Affairs, and 2 women to his 12-member Consultative Committee. In 1982, the President appointed a National Women's Committee which is seeking ways to increase participation by women in the country's life.

MOROCCO*

Morocco is governed by a monarchy which also has fully developed parliamentary, judicial, and governmental institutions. The King is both temporal Head of State and spiritual leader of the country's Muslim community, which comprises virtually the entire Moroccan population. The King can intervene in and set policy on any question if he so desires; but policy on most questions is formulated by the Government and in many cases requires the formal approval of Parliament.

The Moroccan political system is open and very active. Eight of the country's 14 political parties are represented in Parliament, which was elected in September 1984. The lively Moroccan press offers a full range of viewpoints on matters from foreign policy through the economic and social situation, including human rights. There is a full range of private voluntary associations.

The security apparatus is comprised of several overlapping police and paramilitary organizations, all of which have an important impact on the human rights situation. All of the organizations are under the King's ultimate control, although many are administered on a day-to-day basis by the Interior Minister.

Private investment and private property play a large role in the economy, although a number of key industries are in government hands. Morocco remains a predominantly rural country with over 50 percent of the population living outside urban areas. The Government continues to place high priority on job creation and continued development of the agricultural sector to reduce income and social disparities. However, the country's tight financial situation and pressures from its international creditors have forced cuts in many plans. In September 1985 the Government reduced subsidies on basic foodstuffs, leading to price hikes on such commodities as flour, sugar, and cooking oil, the staples of the Moroccan diet.

The human rights situation in Morocco was mixed in 1985. There were no major outbreaks of unrest such as occurred in January 1984, and a number of those arrested and convicted in the wake of those disturbances were released during the year. However, there was continuing concern about the legal status and physical condition of political prisoners in Moroccan jails. Although the Government asserted, in response to domestic and international publicity about the hunger strikes of several prisoners, that all prisoners in Moroccan prisons were common law prisoners, certain prisoners in categories considered to be political continued to receive separate, more favorable treatment. There were also isolated reports of cruel treatment and torture of some detainees, especially those accused of Islamic fundamentalist tendencies.

*A separate section on the Western Sahara is appended to this report.

MOROCCO

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In 1985, there were no proven instances of political killing. Although 14 Moroccans convicted for involvement in Islamic fundamentalist activities were sentenced to death in August, none of the sentences has been carried out. Similar death sentences from trials in August 1984 also have not been carried out. Trials in these cases were public.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of disappearance for extended periods in 1985. Amnesty International continues to press for a report on the cases of some 100 persons reportedly taken into custody as far back as 1976 and who reportedly have disappeared, but the Government has not provided a status report. The Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights reported in early 1985 that 50 other persons, including a number of student leaders, have disappeared in recent years. On January 22, 1985, the French daily Le Monde reported that two long-term detainees were released after prolonged periods of "disappearance". Local human rights sources report, however, that the locations of the two individuals were always known.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are frequent charges of prisoner abuse in Moroccan prisons. Lawyers, observers, and even government officials assert that prisoners are exposed to cold, damp, and crowded conditions, and some prisoners are allegedly subjected to cruel treatment at the hands of prison officials. On January 12, 1985, the local press reported the suicides of two prisoners in the Kenitra prison, allegedly in part because of systematic beatings by prison guards. Human rights groups have reported the deaths of four prisoners in November and December, allegedly due to cold and damp jails. On November 12 the Government confirmed earlier reports from human rights groups that a detainee, Amine Tahani, had died November 6 in a Casablanca prison. Although there were charges by human rights activists in France that Tahani died as the result of torture, the Government rejected the charges and said his death resulted from asthmatic seizures.

In 1985, there were repeated hunger strikes by prisoners to protest prison conditions. Nine prisoners fasted for several months to obtain political prisoner status. After several weeks the Government resorted to intravenous feeding.

Several foreign groups charge that there is systematic use of torture in Morocco, and indeed there are persistent reports of torture by the security forces. Some observers claim to have witnessed various forms of physical and psychological torture by police to extract information or to intimidate detainees, especially in the pretrial period. Most observers agree that such practices are rare.

MOROCCO

The Government rarely responds to charges of torture. However, in April 1985, the Interior Ministry reacted vigorously to charges in the French daily Le Monde of inhumane conditions in what was described as a detention center in Casablanca. The Interior Ministry maintained, and local human rights activists concurred, that the center was actually an institution for orphans and elderly citizens.

Amnesty International has continued to complain of the conditions of detention of approximately 100 military prisoners arrested following the 1971 and 1972 attempts on the life of King Hassan. It reported that the individuals had been held since 1973 in "windowless, filthy, unventilated cells, (exposed to) extremes of temperature, solitary confinement, arbitrary punishments and beatings, inadequate food, and complete lack of medical care." Amnesty International indicated it has reports that "approximately 20 of the prisoners may already have died, many at least in part because of the very bad conditions." In 1985 there was a reliable report that one of the prisoners appeared in good condition.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Moroccan Constitution requires that a detainee be brought before a judge within 48 hours of detention and informed of charges. The police can request a 48-hour extension of that period. This practice is, however, widely abused, and detainees are often held for up to several weeks before appearing before a judge. Most individuals are arrested in public view, but warrants are not always used. Although arrests are not usually arbitrary, they are often made only on the basis of suspicion. Moroccan law requires that a lawyer be present only after the initial presentation of the detainee before the review court, not during the prior period of police custody. Morocco does not have an extensive system of bail, although defendants are sometimes released on their own recognizance. Moroccan law does not have specific provision for habeas corpus or its equivalent.

The most frequent cases in which there was abuse of pretrial rights in 1985 were those involving Islamic fundamentalist activity. Sources estimate that several hundred were detained by authorities starting in April and continuing through August. In most cases, authorities released detainees after several days of questioning without charges.

Under a separate code of military justice, a number of military personnel have been detained in past years without warrants or announcement of a trial.

A number of Moroccan detainees, including many considered informally to be "political prisoners," are allowed to receive Moroccan newspapers, to have access to radio and television, and to pursue studies while in prison. Most prisoners are allowed family visits once a week and on religious holidays, and family members are permitted to bring food to supplement the prison diet. However, many of the prisoners convicted of involvement in the 1971 and 1972 coup attempts continue to be held without family visitation rights or the right to respond to mail received. Families of several prisoners on a hunger strike also asserted repeatedly in 1985 that they were denied access to their relatives.

MOROCCO

There have been allegations that prisoners have been held incommunicado for extended periods, but family or friends have been aware, most sources agree, of the detainees' general location.

There are no known instances of political activists exiled by the Government. However, some activists prefer to remain in voluntary exile, including a number of leading Islamic fundamentalists. Of 57 Fundamentalists tried in 1985, 25 now live abroad. There are reports that a growing number of Moroccans, generally youths, have sought "asylum" in several Western European countries, but it is not certain that these students would be in jeopardy were they to return to Morocco.

Although prisoners are regularly used on work crews, there were no other charges of forced labor in 1985.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Moroccan judicial system is generally considered fair and is in most respects independent of political control. Cases are brought before an initial review court, which can call for a hearing. The detainee is informed of charges and questioned by the judge to decide if they have merit. If not, or if the infraction is minor, the judge can release the detainee or impose a light sentence. If a lengthy investigation is required, the judge can release detainees on their own recognizance. In cases involving serious crimes, courts generally move quickly to bring cases to trial. If convicted by the court of first instance, a defendant has the right to appeal.

Although most cases are handled by civilian/secular courts based in part on French legal tradition, Morocco has a parallel judicial system using Islamic law principles to deal with marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance for Muslim Moroccans. Although Western legal norms are not applicable in the Islamic courts, Koranic principles and the limited kinds of the cases heard reduce the possibility of abuse.

There have been allegations of growing judicial corruption. In October 1985, four court officials, including one judge, in the northern city of Al Hoceima were tried and found guilty of illegal practices.

Although the Government has stated that there are no political prisoners, most observers and Moroccan human rights groups estimate that there remain approximately 110 prisoners held for political activities dating as far back as the early 1970's and sentenced to terms up to life imprisonment. In addition, there are approximately 125 Moroccans convicted of Islamic fundamentalist activities, although some sources insist that the number held could be as high as several hundred. Human rights groups in Europe assert that nearly 1,600 persons were tried and sentenced following the riots in January 1984. Many of those have since been released after completing their terms, but estimates of those still in prison range from several hundred to over 1,000.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In general, the Government does not interfere greatly in the private lives of its citizens. The Constitution states that the home is inviolable and that no search or investigation may occur without a judicial warrant. This is not always observed in practice, however. It is widely accepted that the Government selectively monitors certain individuals, including their telephones and mail. At times of heightened agitation, the authorities are alleged to have searched homes and offices without warrants.

The Government does not generally interfere in the private beliefs of the individual. There is no forced membership in political organizations. The Government is sensitive to the spread of fundamentalist religious beliefs, but there are no reported instances of interference with parents' teaching of religious beliefs to their children. Morocco does not jam foreign radio and television broadcasts, but officials have frequently seized banned publications entering the country from abroad through the mail.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides for freedom of speech, including freedom of the press, except for criticism of the monarchy and Islam. There is lively debate of almost all other issues, including criticism of the Government, of government officials, and of political and socioeconomic problems in the press and in public. There is also a broad measure of academic freedom, and although there are strictures against the investigation of the monarchy and Islam, in fact there is growing research and publishing on Islam and Islamic fundamentalism.

Arabic language daily Al Anbaa, as well as the Moroccan Press Agency Maghreb Arab Press, are government-owned. All other newspapers and journals are privately owned, although some are subsidized by the Government. Most are controlled by political parties or private groups. In 1985, the Government occasionally intervened to delay publication of newspapers carrying material which, it was feared, would inflame public opinion. The Communist Party of Progress and Socialism's French- and Arabic-language dailies asserted that they were regularly subjected to prior censorship. In July, an independent weekly, Al Kawaliss, was suspended for several months for unspecified reasons. Two new weekly newspapers appeared: Al Massaar, published by Socialist Party dissidents and focusing heavily on opposition and human rights themes, and Al Haraka, backed by the Berber-based Popular Movement. Television and radio are government-owned and the views expressed conform with the Government's.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are constitutional guarantees of peaceful assembly and association. Private associations are permitted, after registering with the Government, and professional, business, religious, and cultural associations are active. Groups seen as threatening the political stability of the regime, such as declared Islamic fundamentalist organizations, are outlawed. Permits are required for public meetings, but if the requesting group is a legally registered association, permission is normally granted.

MOROCCO

There are three major trade union federations: the Union Marocaine du Travail (UMT); the Confederation Democratique de Travail (CDT); and the Union Generale des Travailleurs Marocains (UGTM). The UMT is politically independent. The CDT is affiliated with the Socialist Party, and the UGTM with the Istiqlal Party. Approximately 1 million of 7 million Moroccan workers are unionized, mainly in the industrial and commercial sectors. The UMT annually represents Moroccan workers at the annual conferences of the International Labor Organization (ILO). The CDT and UGTM are also active internationally and participated with the UMT in the June 1985 International Labor Conference.

Morocco's Constitution and laws provide full protection to labor. These guarantees, including the right to be represented in the settlement of disputes and the right to protection against interference, are widely applied in the modern sector of the economy but are less well observed, and sometimes totally ignored, in the informal and underground economy. The right to strike is guaranteed by Article 14 of the Constitution but the detailed law defining this right, promised in Article 14, has never been drafted. Legislation governing settlement of labor disputes was enacted in 1946, but the mandated procedures, which are lengthy and complicated as well as in conflict with later constitutional guarantees of the right to strike, are customarily ignored as each dispute is handled on an ad hoc basis by the Government. The August-September 1985 strike at the Jerada coal mine, for example, was settled after 3 weeks of police intimidation, the arrest and sentencing to prison terms of some two dozen strikers, and protracted negotiations involving worker representatives, the management of the government-owned mine, and local and regional officials. In this case, as in many others involving strikes and work protests, workers were prosecuted and convicted under criminal law statutes which outlaw picketing and damage to employers' property. Criminal law dating from the eve of World War II also outlaws strikes in sectors deemed to affect national security. This law is ill-defined and has been used in recent years to stop teachers' strikes, among others. Moroccan trade unions complain that workers are frequently dismissed or suspended for union activity and that the legal system too rarely punishes such illegal actions. The UMT has several complaints pending with the ILO on these and other alleged infractions of the ILO conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining. Despite the fact that these cases have not been resolved to the unions' satisfaction, employers are often prosecuted and punished by the courts for labor law violations. A recent case involved an employer sanctioned for an illegal plant shutdown.

The Constitution also guarantees the representation of workers in Parliament. Of 10 seats reserved for trade union organizations in the current 306-member Parliament, the UMT elected 5 members, the CDT 3, and the UGTM 2 in the 1984 elections.

c. Freedom of Religion

The population is over 99 percent Muslim, and Islam is the official religion. The King bears the title of "Commander of the Faithful" and is the religious as well as secular leader of the Moroccan population.

MOROCCO

The Constitution provides guarantees for freedom of worship, but proselytizing is forbidden. Conversion to another faith from Islam is not banned in the civil code, but the Islamic faith strongly discourages it.

There are two non-Islamic religions with organized communities in Morocco: Judaism and Christianity. There are some 10,000 Jews, living mainly in Casablanca and several other major cities. The Jewish community operates schools and social institutions, as well as 20 major synagogues. Publications in Hebrew are permitted, and rabbis serving the Jewish community are trained in Morocco. Moroccan Jews serve in leading positions in the business community. The President of the Administrative Chamber of the Supreme Court is Jewish, as is one parliamentary deputy. In September 1985, King Hassan, in a gesture designed to show his continued support for the Jewish community, sent one of his sons to the Jewish community's Yom Kippur ceremony. The Jewish community has close ties to communities in other countries, including Israel. In October 1985, a Congress of Jewish Communities of Moroccan-origin was held in Montreal with the Moroccan Government's endorsement..

There are also institutional links between the Moroccan Government and the Roman Catholic Church. In August 1985, Pope John Paul II visited Morocco at the invitation of King Hassan, at which time he met with Morocco's Islamic leaders and delivered an address to 80,000 Muslim youths. In 1983, King Hassan pledged, in a letter to the Pope, to guarantee the Catholic Church's right to conduct both religious and charitable work. The letter also formally recognized the work of the Catholic clergy, who come exclusively from abroad, to minister to some 100,000 foreign residents with parishes in most cities.

There were few incidents affecting the Protestant community in 1985. Prior to the visit of Pope John Paul, a few Moroccan Christians were questioned by police, but the practice was quickly stopped. In October 1985, the Supreme Court overturned earlier administrative rulings which had closed a bookstore in Fez, owned by a Protestant minister, which carried a limited number of bibles and Christian literature. The Moroccan Protestant community is small, numbering less than a hundred. There are also several thousand expatriate Christians.

There have been no further arrests in the Baha'i community since May 1984, nor has the small community been bothered in its activities. In October 1985, the case of the single Baha'i from Teouan still serving a prison sentence came before the Supreme Court in December. The Court rejected his request for a review of his conviction and 3-year sentence for activities related to his faith.

The King and other religious leaders continue to counsel against radical Islamic beliefs. Interior Ministry officials monitor what is taught in the Mosques and report deviations from Orthodox Islam. Starting in early 1985, large numbers of suspected fundamentalists were detained and questioned, especially in northern Morocco. In August, the Government tried 26 Moroccans (9 in absentia), for plotting to overthrow the regime and membership in outlawed fundamentalist organizations. All were convicted, and 14 were sentenced to death. The group was accused of having been trained by Algeria. In October, 31 suspected fundamentalists (16 in absentia) were tried for belonging to an illegal association and plotting to overthrow the regime. All were convicted. Twenty received life sentences, and 4 received 30-year sentences. Death sentences handed down in the Casablanca fundamentalist trial of June and July 1984 have not been carried out.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is unrestricted throughout Morocco. As the administering authority in the Western Sahara, the Moroccan Government restricts movement in areas of the territory which are militarily contested. There were no reported cases of restrictions on foreign travel for political reasons in 1985. There are no formal restrictions on emigration. Obtaining a passport, however, often takes several months. A woman is obliged to have the permission of her father or, if she is married, her husband to obtain a passport. A divorced woman must receive her father's permission for a passport. If she has custody of children, she must have the father's permission for the children's passports.

There are no known instances of the Government depriving any citizen of Moroccan nationality. Moroccan law considers any person who acquires Moroccan nationality to be a citizen for life. Citizens who have left Morocco are guaranteed the right to return. There were no known instances of the Government refusing reentry in 1985. Morocco specifically encourages voluntary repatriation for Jewish community members who have emigrated from Morocco. It also encourages the return of Saharans who have opposed Morocco in the Western Sahara conflict. Returning former Polisario members deemed to pose no security threat have been reintegrated into either civilian or military life.

Morocco adheres to the 1951 convention on refugee status. It currently has some 500 refugees, mainly from African countries and Eastern Europe. Most of the Eastern European refugees came to Morocco in the 1940's and 1950's. For a grant of refugee status, the Government requires that the requester be able to care for his needs. Although there were reports, denied by Moroccan authorities, of Libyan expatriates being forced to return to their country in 1984, there were no such reports in 1985.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Morocco describes itself as a developing democracy. In practice, executive power is vested in the King and exercised by a government designated by him. The King generally takes the proportional strength of parties into account in naming the Government.

Parliament participates in the formulation of overall policy, including the review of the annual budget and other major legislation. However, many measures of lesser importance are promulgated as government decrees or occasionally by royal proclamation. Several layers of directly or indirectly elected officials participate in formulating decisions, including members of Parliament, provincial assemblies, and municipal councils. More than a dozen political parties, representing a spectrum of political philosophies from far left to conservative, competed in the 1983 municipal elections and parliamentary elections in 1984. Local government and Parliament are generally considered representative, although a number of election results have been challenged. There is frequently lively debate on all subjects, and often split votes. While government proposals in Parliament are rarely rejected outright, specific measures are often modified. Political pressure on occasion has persuaded the Government to delay or withdraw legislation.

The Government occasionally uses a direct referendum on major questions affecting the Constitution and the state structure. There were no such cases in 1985. In 1984 the voters were asked to approve the Moroccan-Libyan Treaty of Oujda. The Government announced that 97 percent of those casting ballots voted for the union.

No group dominates, and virtually all points of view are represented in Parliament. Ethnic and tribal distinctions remain, fostered by the country's mountainous terrain. Although Berber spokesmen occasionally claim that Moroccan institutions do not reflect the Berber character of the population and that Berber identity is not sufficiently maintained, they continue to play a significant role in national and local affairs.

In recent years Morocco has not refused any formal international or nongovernmental investigation of human rights. However, the Government is sensitive to such investigations, and cooperation may be slow. An Amnesty International official informally visited Morocco in 1985, and Justice Ministry officials and the President of Parliament received human rights delegations on several occasions. The delegations expressed concern for prisoners on hunger strike. Most observers found the Government's reaction to such investigations tougher than in past years. The Interior Ministry formally rebutted a Le Monde article alleging use of a psychiatric hospital for detention. The Government also complained about international and domestic pressure in support of those on hunger strikes.

There are two major human rights associations: the Moroccan Association of Human Rights (AMON) and the Moroccan League for the Defense of Human Rights (LDDH). The LDDH is affiliated to the Istiqlal Party (the major political party at the time of independence), while the AMDH has less clearly defined links with left-wing political parties. Both were active throughout 1985, particularly regarding prisoners on hunger strike and in calling for release of political prisoners. In 1985, several AMDH leaders were questioned by the police. Earlier, several AMDH leaders were detained for human rights activism.

The Government is active on human rights issues in international organizations, although its interest is generally confined to the Arab world and Western Sahara. One external organization, the Paris-based Association for the Defense of Human Rights (ASDHOM), is particularly active. ASDHOM does not have active chapters in Morocco, but regularly informs the French press of Moroccan human rights developments.

MOROCCO

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International noted that it had continued to work on behalf of more than 200 actual or possible prisoners of conscience and monitored thousands of arrests arising from country-wide disturbances in 1984 and that it was also concerned about extended periods of incommunicado detention; ill-treatment of detainees during interrogation; "disappearances"; and the imposition of death sentences. Freedom House rated Morocco as "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population is 23 million (53 percent under age 20) and is growing at approximately 2.4 percent annually, according to the World Bank. Per capita gross national product was $760 in 1983, while 1984 per capita gross domestic product was $557, with most of the slide due to exchange rate drops.

In September 1985, Morocco signed a second standby agreement with the International Monetary Fund to bridge the balance of payments gap while the Government undertakes reforms for medium- and long-term structural adjustment. Although debt relief and economic reforms have allowed Morocco to make significant progress since 1983 in laying the basis for future growth, it faces continuing austerity and spending cuts have resulted in the postponement of health, education, and housing projects for the country's poorest citizens. There has been little if any growth in per capita income. Opposition parties charge that the Government's austerity measures place the burden of adjustment on poor and middle-income citizens. Slow growth will allow only gradual improvement in adult literacy (35 percent), life expectancy (at birth 54 years), infant mortality (93 per 1,000 live births), and poverty (28 percent of the urban and 45 percent of the rural population in 1979).

The Government is trying to reform the educational system. Thirty percent of the Government's operating budget is for education. The 160,000 teachers under the Education Ministry constitute half of Morocco's civil servants. Female school enrollment is growing faster than that of males. At least 38 percent of all primary students, more than 40 percent of all secondary students, and more than 25 percent of university enrollees are female. Only in rural areas is enrollment of women in schools unusually low, due to traditional attitudes and economic necessity.

Morocco's basic legislation on working conditions dates from the 1930's and 1940's and is fairly widely respected, at least in the modern sector of the economy. These laws provide for a maximum 48-hour workweek with a full 24-hour rest day; for a specified annual paid holiday; and for minimum conditions for the protection of the safety and health of workers, including prohibition of night work for women and children. Children may not be employed or apprenticed before age 12 and there are special regulations governing employment of children between the ages of 12 and 16. Minimum wage legislation also exists and minimum wages were raised twice in 1985 to take account of rises in the cost of living. In the traditional sectors of the economy, children are often apprenticed earlier than age 12, especially where school places are not available. Safety and health conditions in many enterprises are substandard. Labor inspectors do not have adequate resources to monitor compliance with the law, and occupational health inspectors, although mandated by legislation, do not exist because the Government has never allocated the resources to hire or train them.

The Constitution reaffirms the legal equality of all Moroccans and provides that "men and women enjoy equal political rights." Women occupy responsible government positions, including at the ministerial staff level, as well as in the law, medicine, and teaching. Two women pilots are now flying regular routes for Royal Air Maroc. Progress in professional fields has not always been matched in the society at large. There are areas where traditional standards prevail, especially in the area of private law. Divorce is permitted, but a husband can repudiate his wife while she cannot repudiate him. A man is permitted four wives according to Islamic tradition, although multiple marriages are increasingly rare. Segregation of sexes is common, especially in social settings. However, in urban areas and among the urban poor, as well as increasingly among middle and upper class families, women are employed outside the home and contribute to family income.

Women's role in public life remains restricted. No women hold seats in the 306-member Parliament, although women did run for the positions. Of 15,500 city council members in Morocco, only 17 are women. Women serve on the executive committees of several of the major political parties and on the Saharan Consultative Council, a body created in 1981 to advise the King on Western Saharan issues. The Government actively supports labor and family planning projects designed to improve the condition of women and has organized employment programs for them. However, religious and social resistance to such efforts remains strong.

THE WESTERN SAHARA

Portions of the Western Sahara, now divided into four provinces, are administered by Morocco. Morocco assumed administration of the northern three provinces after the withdrawal of Spanish forces in 1975, and it asserted control over the southernmost portion in 1979 when Mauritania renounced its claim to the area and ceased administering the region over which its authority had been vested by the Madrid Accords of 1975.

Since 1977, the northern provinces of Al Ayoun, Smara, and Boujdour have participated in elections held throughout Morocco. Communal elections were held in the southernmost province of Qued Ed Dahhab in May 1981. The four Saharan provinces participated in 1983 elections and in all votes in 1984, including the referendum on the Moroccan-Libyan Treaty of Union and direct and indirect elections to Parliament. Participation in both the referendum and the direct elections to Parliament tended to run higher than in almost all other areas of Morocco.

Moroccan Saharan incumbents fill all 10 parliamentary seats from the Western Sahara provinces, and Western Saharan-origin politicians also fill seats from other provinces. The governors of the Saharan provinces, appointed by the King, are all native Saharans. In consultation with elected municipal and provincial councils, the four governors administer their provinces in the same manner as provinces and prefectures of Morocco proper. Most village and civil servants are also locally recruited Saharans. The governors are concerned primarily with accelerating development and the delivery of social services. Investment in the Western Sahara remains tax-free, in large part to encourage greater investment in the areas, which has the effect of raising the general standard of living. In March 1985, King Hassan spent 10 days in the Western Sahara region. During his visit, he met with the entire membership of Morocco's Parliament as well as with a number of local political leaders. Many Moroccans insist that the enthusiastic welcome the King received proved the population's loyalty to the Kingdom of Morocco.

Ultimate sovereignty over the Western Saharan region remains a subject of international dispute, with sporadic fighting between Moroccan forces and the Polisario, an organization which seeks independence for the territory. At the June 1981 summit meeting of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in Nairobi, Morocco proposed that a referendum be held to decide the question. At a subsequent OAU meeting, specific measures seen as leading to a peaceful settlement of the Saharan problem were outlined by the member states. The OAU summit in 1983 resolved that the referendum be held in December 1983 but also called for direct negotiations between Morocco and the Polisario, a request with which Morocco does not agree. The resulting stalemate has prevented progress to resolve the Western Saharan dispute in the OAU. Morocco walked out of the November 1984 OAU summit after the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic Delegation was seated. Morocco later called for the U.N. to administer the referendum to determine the population's wishes on independence or full integration into Morocco. In October 1985, King Hassan, in a message to the U.N., also announced a unilateral cease-fire by Moroccan forces in the region. He pledged that Moroccan forces would only defend themselves if fired upon.

THE WESTERN SAHARA

The civilian population in the portion of the Western Sahara under effective Moroccan control apparently enjoys the same civil liberties as other Moroccans in areas of undisputed Moroccan sovereignty. However, in September 1985, 21 Saharan students studying in the northern city of Tangier fled Morocco and entered the Spanish enclave of Ceuta clandestinely. They requested political asylum in Spain and eventually traveled onward to Tunisia.

There have been few opportunities to evaluate the human rights practices of the Polisario in areas outside the "Berm," the Moroccan forces' earthwork defense line. There continue to be Moroccan allegations of Polisario human rights abuses, including illegal detention, impressment into military service, and general infringement of the civil liberties of the inhabitants of the Western Sahara.

NEPAL

Nepal is the world's only Hindu Kingdom. Its Constitution specifies that the King (chief of state) is the sole source of authority for all government institutions. Although there are traditional and constitutional restraints on the King's powers, he effectively rules as well as reigns.

The National Panchayat (legislature) consists of 112 representatives elected directly on the basis of universal adult suffrage and 28 appointed by the King. Legislation passed by the Panchayat is sent to the King for his approval, without which it cannot become law. The Panchayat selects the Prime Minister from its ranks. In turn, he appoints the Council of Ministers (Cabinet). The Council of Ministers, answerable to both the Panchayat and the King, manages day-to-day government operations and advises the King. In 1983, for the first time, the Prime Minister was changed by a vote of no confidence.

Nepal ranks among the world's poorest countries. Over 90 percent of its traditional and rural population is engaged in subsistence agriculture. Nepal maintained a self-imposed isolation until 1951; economic development and the broadening of political participation have been government objectives only since that time. Communications facilities are still limited and the radio remains, for most Nepalese, the only contact with the outside world.

Internal security is maintained in the first instance by the national police and as necessary by the army. Owing to Nepal's limited communications facilities, local officials have a large degree of autonomy and exercise wide discretion in dealing with law and order issues.

In 1985 the Government demonstrated a growing tendency to respond with force to control or prevent the expression of opposition views. Riot police were used extensively to prevent public demonstrations by school teachers, students, and banned political parties. Several thousand opposition political activists were kept in preventive detention for several months after attempting to stage a civil disobedience campaign in May 1985. Reportedly as many as 20 newspaper editors were arrested during the year, apparently for publishing articles critical of the King or the royal family. Allegations of police brutality were common.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

On June 20, 1985, 5 terrorist bombs exploded in Kathmandu, killing 5 people and injuring 20. Responsibility for this unprecedented act of political violence was claimed by an antimonarchist group. The Government has set up a special court to try those charged with this act.

b. Disappearance

There were no allegations of disappearances during 1985.

NEPAL

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are persistent reports, particularly from remote areas, that police regularly use brutal methods to interrogate or intimidate prisoners, both criminal and political. An unusually explicit example was provided by two teachers who alleged that in January 1985, they were stripped, beaten, kicked, and humiliated by senior officers in Bhaktapur, near Kathmandu, after being arrested in connection with the teachers strike. The Government has not actively investigated allegations of police brutality or acknowledged public concerns about its prevalence.

Places of detention reflect the low standard of living in this extremely poor country. Jail conditions vary according to the crime committed and the person's status, but all prisoners have access to medical attention and to the traditional Nepalese diet. They are permitted visitors and goods from the outside. Generally, political prisoners have fared better than those convicted of criminal acts. Separate facilities are maintained for women and for the criminally insane.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Public Security Act permits six months of preventive detention before charges must be filed. In May 1985, several thousand leaders and supporters of the banned Nepali Congress Party and Nepali Communist Party were detained without trial for attempting to hold public meetings or picket government offices in support of their demands for greater political freedom. Most of them were not released until mid-October. Detention without charge was also apparently widely used in the investigation of the terrorist bombings of June 1985. There have also been reports of teachers and students in various areas of the country being detained by authorities to prevent their participating in demonstrations.

For common crimes, a suspect must be brought before a court within 24 hours and must be informed of the general grounds for the arrest or be released. A seven-day extension may be granted for the completion of the police investigation. Strict adherence to these principles is not the norm. The writ of habeas corpus is recognized by the Supreme Court and has been effective in several cases. Neither official exile nor forced labor is practiced in Nepal.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The law provides for the right to a fair public trial in most cases (some security and customs cases excepted), and this right is usually honored. Except for those held in preventive detention, the Constitution guarantees the right to counsel and protection from double jeopardy and ex post facto laws. These rights are not always respected. There are separate military and civilian courts. Military courts generally deal only with military personnel, but civilians may be tried in these courts for crimes involving the military. Judges are appointed by the Government, and decisions in political and security cases sometimes reflect the Government's view. All lower court decisions (including acquittals) are subject to appeal, and the Supreme Court is the court of last appeal. The King may grant pardons and set aside judgments.

NEPAL

The Government has in the past admitted holding "political prisoners." In 1984, a committee was formed by representatives of banned political parties to press for the release of political prisoners. Most of the 128 cases the committee has listed as political prisoners, however, appear to involve people serving long sentences for criminal acts such as murder or armed robbery.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Nepalese law and tradition bolster privacy of the home and family, which the Government generally respects. Except for those suspected of narcotics or security violations, search warrants issued by chief district officers are required before search and seizure. Correspondence of some foreigners and domestic nonconformists is opened with little attempt at concealment.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Under the Constitution, freedom of speech and of the press may not be exercised in support of a political party or "to the detriment of the common good," the monarch, or members of the royal family. In practice, this rule is widely interpreted to permit criticism of the Government but not the monarch or the royal family. Journals and newspapers which overstep the established guidelines may be suspended from publication. In 1985, over 20 editors were arrested and their papers suspended, mostly for lese majeste. Foreign publications are seized or banned when deemed to carry articles unfavorable to the Government or monarchy. In 1985, several Indian newspapers were banned for months, following the bombing incidents in June, apparently for their coverage of that event as well as their general editorial policy toward Nepal.

The two largest circulation dailies are government organs, but they carry some reports of opposition activities and criticism of the Government, as well as extensive coverage of the debates in the National Panchayat. A major complaint of the independent newspapers is that government advertising (and most private advertising) goes only to the two semiofficial papers. Nevertheless, the independent press continues to be fairly vigorous and candid in its criticism of government policies and motives. Radio Nepal is operated by the Government and its news reports are closely controlled.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Regulations permit local authorities to prohibit meetings, speeches, and posters if they are found not to be "for the convenience or good of the general public." The law forbids activities detrimental to the monarchy, to relations among the people, or to national security. All political parties are banned under the panchayat system, although in practice political party members are generally permitted to assemble privately and to express their views in the unofficial press.

Regulations governing political activities are interpreted differently by local authorities in different areas of the country, and the decision whether to permit a political meeting is made on an ad hoc basis. In March 1985, the Nepali Congress Party (NCP) held a national meeting in Kathmandu with over 1,000 participants. The Government allowed the meeting to take place, on the tacit understanding that the NCP would not use loudspeakers or stage processions.

Student groups, including those openly affiliated with the banned political parties, are allowed to contest campus elections and did so in 1985. However, they are typically prevented from holding meetings or demonstrations off campus, and a number of student leaders are usually in jail at any given time.

The Government banned trade unions in 1960. The Nepal Labor Organization, a creation of the Government, is the only organization officially permitted to perform trade union-like functions. There are some independent worker's associations which are repressed by the Government when they become too active. In early 1985, school teachers staged a determined strike demanding pay parity with civil servants and recognition of their association. The Government made concessions on pay but refused to grant official recognition of the teachers' association. Many teachers were placed under preventive detention and their attempted demonstrations were broken up.

c. Freedom of Religion

The vast majority of Nepalese are Hindus. Religious tolerance is traditional and the Constitution provides that "every person, having regard to the traditions, may profess and practice his own religion as handed down from ancient times." However, the Constitution also provides that "no person shall be entitled to convert another person from one religion to another." The legal code provides a maximum penalty of one year in prison for any Hindu who converts to another religion and three to six years in prison for any person who seeks to proselytize a Hindu.

In 1985, 9 new cases were registered in which 46 people were charged with conversion or proselytizing. In contrast to statements by official government spokesmen that any adult Nepali is free to change his religion, there were 18 convictions during 1985 for simple conversion from Hinduism to Christianity, with sentences from 3 months to 1 year. All are under appeal. In addition, two Christian pastors were convicted of proselytizing for preaching within their own churches and each sentenced to the maximum six years. Five other individuals convicted of proselytizing were each sentenced to three years. All these cases are also under appeal. There were 18 acquittals in religion cases during 1985, all of which are being appealed by the Government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on travel within the country for Nepalese citizens, although several border areas have been restricted for travel by foreigners. Nepalese abroad are free to return home. There are no known case of revocation of citizenship for political reasons.

Nepal has no stated refugee policy. In the past it has accepted and assimilated approximately 12,000 Tibetan refugees and, according to immigration officials, no refugee has ever been forced to return to Tibet. Today, travelers from Tibet travel freely in both directions across the border.

NEPAL

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Nepal is an absolute monarchy; political legitimacy flows from the King, not from the people. Most Nepalese accept and support a central role for the monarchy, either for religious reasons (the King is regarded as a reincarnation of the Hindu god Vishnu) or out of respect for tradition. Many Nepalese also view the monarchy as the symbol of Nepalese nationalism and a force that unifies a nation of disparate ethnic and linguistic communities. There is also substantial public support for the view that Nepal's future political development should follow democratic lines.

The 1980 constitutional reforms restructured the nation's formal political framework to make officials more answerable to the voting public. Direct election by universal adult suffrage was intended to make National Panchayat members more sensitive to the need to be seen as representing the interests of their constituents vis-a-vis the Government. The accountability of the Prime Minister to the House has made for lively debate of many issues. However, the ban on political parties makes it difficult for public opinion to be represented and mobilized systematically. In the absence of political parties, the Palace still effectively dominates the legislature; politics within the National Panchayat sometimes appear to be little more than a struggle for ministerial office.

No international human rights organization is known to have requested permission to visit Nepal since Amnesty International did so in 1977. In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed its continuing concern about the arrest and imprisonment of opponents of the Government, as well as about severe restrictions on political activity and religious freedom in Nepal. Freedom House rates Nepal as "partly free."

There are two human rights organizations in Nepal which work with Amnesty International and regional human rights groups. Human rights activists disseminate their views in public meetings, newspapers, and pamphlets. There have been no reports of attempts to suppress them. The Government has expressed its concern about human rights violations in Cambodia, Afghanistan, and South Africa.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Nepal's population is approximately 17 million, and its population growth rate is estimated at 2.5 percent annually, increasing the pressure on food supplies and social services. The per capita income is approximately $160 per year.

Nepal's economic development has been hampered by geographic and demographic problems compounded by its isolation until 1951. These problems are offset only partially by the country's major resources--cheap labor, tourism, and vast hydroelectric potential. Eighty percent of Nepal's land is hilly or mountainous, creating a high population density on its arable land. Population pressure on the country's limited resources has resulted in recent years in rapid deforestation, serious erosion, and loss of soil fertility.

NEPAL

Life expectancy is estimated at 46.8 years, with the average for women slightly lower. Infant mortality is estimated at a relatively high 106.5 deaths per 1,000 live births. An estimated 14 percent of the population has access to relatively safe drinking water, up from 9 percent last year due to extensive efforts by the Government and aid donors to build village water systems. The ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements is estimated at about 90 percent. Approximately 60 percent of the population is believed to live below the absolute poverty level.

The literacy rate for Nepal is approximately 20 percent overall, with men (34 percent) leading women (5 percent) by a substantial margin due to traditional attitudes toward schooling for girls. School enrollment has been increasing, with 1982 figures showing 83.6 percent of school-age males and 33 percent of school-age females enrolled in primary school; the overall average is 58.8 percent.

The industrial sector is small, accounting for little more than 1 percent of gross domestic product. The Nepal Factories and Factory Workers Act of 1959, as amended, sets minimum wage rates and working conditions, including special rules for women and a minimum age of 14 years. Enforcement is spotty, however, and there have been reports of child labor being used in match and bidi (country cigarette) factories.

Women in Nepal have the right to vote and to hold property in their own name. Women's property rights have been enforced by the courts when cases are brought to them, especially in the Kathmandu area. However, women have yet to enjoy their rights fully in many rural areas, where lack of knowledge or understanding of the law is common and the weight of traditional practice and attitudes is great.

OMAN

The Sultanate of Oman is an absolute monarchy without popularly elected representative institutions. The reigning sultan, Qaboos bin Said Al Said, is the 14th ruler of the current dynasty. The State Consultative Council, formed in 1981, functions as an advisory body on economic and social questions. Members are appointed by the Sultan who has continued the House of Al Said's long tradition of firm control over all questions affecting the Omani State.

National security remains a matter of continuing close attention. In the early years of the rule of Sultan Qaboos, the Government's concern was focused on quelling an insurrection in the southern province of Dhofar supported by the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen. The insurrection was finally defeated in 1975, but threats from South Yemen and later from Iran forced Oman to continue to devote much revenue to defense. As the nation on the south shore of the Strait of Hormuz, Oman has become the focus of attention for efforts to protect the flow of oil from the area, with concomitant increased expenditure on military modernization. Many key jobs in the Government, especially in the military and internal security services, are occupied by outsiders, including many British.

Almost totally undeveloped in 1970, Oman has used its modest oil revenues to foster a remarkable degree of progress in the social, economic, and administrative spheres, achieving a significant improvement in the living standards of its people. The economic and social benefits that have accrued from the Government's efforts to modernize the country have won the allegiance of the urban population of the capital area and the provincial administrative centers. Sultan Qaboos has also built on a trend, already visible during the reign of his father, to bring notables of the tribal system of the interior into the national administrative system.

There were no major developments in 1985 with significant impact on the human rights environment in Oman. Although lacking formal codification of civil and political rights, the Government is reasonably accessible to the people through their tribal leaders and walis (governors). The internal security services are large, efficient, and pervasive, but are not generally regarded as repressive, and the integrity of the individual is generally respected.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no known political killings in Oman in recent years.

b. Disappearance

There were no known disappearances in 1985.

OMAN

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Though Islamic law is administered throughout the country by Islamic judges, the amputations prescribed by such law are generally commuted by the Government to prison terms. Exceptions may occur in remote areas, or among Bedouin tribes, but there is no confirmation of such practices, nor do they have the central Government's sanction. Prison conditions are considered severe by Western standards; cells are not air-conditioned despite summer temperatures which can reach over 115 degrees Fahrenheit, and all prisoners must observe the fasting requirements during the Islamic month of Ramadan. There are no reports of torture or other forms of cruel punishment by Omani authorities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Though Omani law does not provide for habeas corpus or its equivalent, the period of detention before trial in criminal cases is usually short. Abuses of the police power of arrest have occurred, but the criminal code imposes penalties for unjustified arrest or detention. Citizens have several channels through which they can seek redress of any grievance against law enforcement authorities, and these appear to function well, particularly in rural areas. Membership in certain unauthorized organizations is a criminal offense. A small number of former members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Oman (PFLO) are reportedly still under detention, as are fewer than 50 guerrillas from the Dhofar Insurgency (1965-75).

Approximately 500 Dhofaris returned to Oman in 1983 under an amnesty following the rapprochement between Oman and South Yemen. Smaller numbers continued to return in 1984 and 1985. All Omanis who were in exile under the previous Sultan were given the opportunity to return, and many thousands have done so since 1970. Incommunicado detention is not practiced. There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Islamic law prescribes a fair and speedy trial before experienced and impartial judges, and judicial practice in Oman conforms largely to these prescriptions. In fact, however, the majority of cases are settled by out-of-court negotiations. There is no right under law to a jury, counsel, or public trial, but members of the public do attend trials and hearings. The defendant is formally charged, either before a magistrate of the police court in the capital area or a local magistrate (qadi) in outlying areas. The defendant may call and question witnesses. If convicted, he may appeal his case to the chief magistrate of the police court system, and ultimately to the Sultan in cases involving serious offenses. The various judicial systems are technically subordinate to the Sultan, but they operate independently in the vast majority of cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There are no reported instances in which the Government has interfered arbitrarily or unreasonably with the private lives of its citizens. However, warrants are not required to search private residences or offices. Such searches, as well as monitoring of telephones and private correspondence, are confined to cases where the Government perceives a security threat or criminal activity. There is no forced membership in political organizations. While there is no government policy to discourage the use of other languages in speech or print, or in religious instruction in the home, the Government has increasingly insisted that correspondence with it, and in public and legal documents, be in Arabic. Omani men have the right to marry as they choose but, in accordance with Islamic law, marriages between Omani women and non-Muslim men are not permitted.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are no guarantees in law which protect freedom of speech or freedom of the press. Criticism of the Sultan in any form or medium is prohibited by law. Criticism of individual officials, agencies, and their programs is tolerated, but is not given media coverage. The Government controls all radio and television broadcasting. Government control of all printed matter, including newspapers and magazines, is specified in the Press and Publication Law, issued in May 1984. The law imposes strict controls on, and a mechanism for prior censorship of, all information in printed form in both domestic and imported publications. The Government owns two of the three daily newspapers, one in Arabic and one in English. Subsidies to the several privately owned weekly and biweekly publications provide an effective incentive to self-censorship, although there have been arrests and closure for offensive articles. Thus, editorials and news coverage invariably reflect government views. Publications arriving in Oman from foreign countries are censored for politically or sexually offensive material and are occasionally banned. The censor's attention generally focuses on articles that directly attack or embarrass the Omani Government. In 1985, the Sultanate's only resident Western correspondent had his residence permit revoked and was forced to leave the country. Authorities are reported to have objected to his pursuit of news stories on sensitive matters. Such stories never appeared in the Omani media, but the authorities objected to their publication elsewhere. Academic freedom is not an issue as there are no institutions of higher education. Conversations with or among Omanis are candid on the subject of social, economic, and administrative development.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is not guaranteed by law. Associations of any kind must register with the Government, and those which oppose the political system of the Sultanate are prohibited.

Labor unions and strikes are illegal, and there is no collective bargaining; although Oman's labor law specifically prohibits the right to strike, it does mention the concept of "collective grievance" and encourages conciliation of disputes through the formation of joint consultative bodies of labor and management. The organization of other professional groups is embryonic.

OMAN

c. Freedom of Religion

Oman is an Islamic state and virtually all Omani citizens adhere to one or another sect of Islam, the exception being a small Hindu community made up of Omani citizens of Indian origin. Ibadhi Muslims are in an overall majority and include the Royal Family. However, members of the minority Sunni and Shi'a Muslim communities are found in all walks of life in both the public and private sector. Non-Muslim foreigners, both Christian and Hindu, are allowed to worship at designated locations. The Government of Oman has donated land for the purpose of building a Christian church and a new Hindu temple. Non-Muslims in Oman are prohibited from proselytizing. Conversely, conversion to Islam is encouraged and publicized.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Omanis living abroad before 1970 have returned to Oman in large numbers with official encouragement and without legal obstacles. Several thousand ethnic Omani refugees from East Africa, particularly Zanzibar, have been successfully resettled. Many Omanis who had sought refuge in South Yemen during the insurgency in Dhofar (1965-75) have returned to Oman with official encouragement. Non-Omani refugees are not permitted to remain in Oman. Those few that reach Oman are generally returned to their homelands unless they can be quickly resettled in a third country.

Omanis may travel abroad freely, although a woman must have authorization from her husband or father to obtain a passport. Many Omanis work abroad, particularly in the United Arab Emirates, where an estimated 30,000 Omanis are currently employed. Many of these people travel home to Oman on weekends. With the exception of a few military areas, there are no restrictions on travel by Omanis within their country. The Government's transportation program has greatly increased the ability to move within the country to heretofore inaccessible areas.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Oman is a monarchy in which the Sultan retains final word in all government decisions. Succession to the Sultanate is determined through a consensus of the Royal Family and leading public figures. There are no political parties, legal opposition groups, elections, or constitution. Citizens do have access to senior officials through the traditional practice of submitting petitions for the redress of grievances. Successful redress depends on the effectiveness of personal contact and the quality of the persons chosen as intermediaries. Outside of Muscat, the Government still reflects the tribal nature of Omani society. Traditional elites dominate the tribal and town councils, which settle intratribal disputes. Final authority, however, is with the walis (governors), who are appointed by the Sultan.

In an effort to broaden participation in the Government, the Sultan formed the State Consultative Council in 1981. It consists of 55 members drawn from the Government, the business community, and the outlying districts. It includes members of every significant ethnic, geographic, and religious group. At present, the Council's role is an advisory one, limited to the social and economic spheres.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Oman declined to receive a proposed Amnesty International mission in 1972 during the insurgency in Dhofar. Since then, there have been no known requests by international human rights organizations to visit Oman. There are no independent organizations in the country to monitor human rights violations. Freedom House rated Oman "not free." Amnesty International does not include Oman in its 1985 report. Oman has played a passive role in the United Nations and regional bodies on human rights issues.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Oman's population of 1,200,000 is growing at the rate of 3.4 percent a year, boosted by an inflow of Omanis from overseas and of migrant workers from the Indian subcontinent and East Asia. Per capita gross national product is now over $6,250.

Before 1970, the Government of Oman actively discouraged all forms of modernization. Oman was among the poorest countries in the world with a rudimentary economy and virtually no modern infrastructure. With the start of oil exports in 1967, the accession of the present Sultan to power in 1970, and the increase in oil prices in the 1970's, Oman has made remarkable advances in almost every index of development. Since 1970, the Government has devoted a large proportion of its oil revenues to infrastructure, industrialization, agriculture, fishing, expansion in communications, and the provision of a full range of social services to the population. The benefits of Oman's new prosperity have been by and large centered in the capital area and a few key provincial centers such as Salalah. The Government is aware of this imbalance, and has made some effort to redress it. Corruption in some areas has also siphoned off some of the gains from the commonweal, but the Government is taking steps to curtail corruption. Since 1970 the number of hospital beds has jumped from 12 to several thousand, the number of students in the schools from a few hundred to more than 200,000, and the length of paved roads from approximately 10 kilometers to over 3,000. Life expectancy has increased to 53.5 years, and programs for the eradication of endemic diseases are widespread. The infant mortality rate is 115 per 1,000 live births. Many towns and most rural areas still lack reliable supplies of safe water and electricity. The adult literacy rate is still below 50 percent, and many primary age children are not in school.

Since the early days of the reigning Sultan's rule, Oman has had a comprehensive labor law defining conditions of employment for both Omani and foreign workers, who constitute a large percentage of the work force. Reports are that the labor law is fairly enforced, and that workers' grievances, which are handled within the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, are generally given the benefit of the doubt in hearings conducted by labor inspectors.

Employment of children (those under 13) is prohibited. Omani law regulates the employment of juveniles, defined as those between the ages of 13 and 16, prohibiting evening and nighttime work, strenuous occupations, and overtime and holiday work. A special section deals with employment conditions for women, prohibiting evening and nighttime work, safeguarding health and morals, and setting out their rights to maternity leave.

Omani labor law is very specific on matters of occupational safety and access to medical treatment. Likewise, the workweek is set at 48 hours (36 hours for Muslims during Ramadan), and various categories of leave are set forth.

Though conservative, Oman has not been extreme in its attempts to impose strict adherence to Islamic precepts on women. For example, women have shared in the benefits of the social and economic growth of recent years, and schooling for girls is available to the same extent as for boys in urban areas, less so in rural areas. However, for cultural reasons, the educational level of girls still lags behind that of boys. Many urban Omani women drive. A few women have reached high levels in the public sector. By and large, however, occupational advances available to women are limited to the traditional spheres of teaching, secretarial work, and nursing. Oman's labor laws are protective of women, guaranteeing maternity leave and working conditions.

The gains achieved by a small minority of women are largely irrelevant to the great majority, both in the towns and in the rural areas, whose lives are carried out within the confines of the house and the local marketplace. The previous lack of adult education facilities means that all but the youngest females in rural areas are illiterate. This general lack of education, combined with communal and tribal customs which dictate a subsidiary role for women, makes it difficult for most adult women to participate fully in the modern sector. The expansion of educational facilities for girls (including the new university) will allow for some equalization of the position of women in the future, but the communal and tribal customs will continue to militate against full participation by women for the foreseeable future.

PAKISTAN

During most of 1985, Pakistan was ruled by a Martial Law Administration headed by President Mohammed Zia-ul-Haq. On December 30, however, constitutional government was restored with the repeal of martial law and the reimposition of a modified version of the 1973 constitution, most of the provisions of which had been in suspense since the Martial Law government of General Mohammad Zia-ul-Haq seized power in July 1977. Historically, periods of constitutional rule in Pakistan have been interspersed with periods in which the government has ruled through emergency powers or martial law (or both). The most recent of these periods of martial law--Zia's Martial Law Administration--had in fact carried over a state of emergency it inherited from the civilian government it replaced 8 years before. In the new constitutional setup, Pakistan has both an executive president and a prime minister. Zia has stayed on as President and key policymaker, retaining also--at least for now--his post as Chief of Army Staff. However, he now shares power with Prime Minister Mohammad Khan Junejo, head of the Pakistan Muslim League and leader of a comfortable majority in the Parliament which was elected in February 1985 and which, with Junejo, managed the transitional period through the end of martial law.

The coup which brought Zia to power in July 1977 was sparked by a breakdown in constitutional order and nationwide disturbances, following a highly controversial election in which the ruling party was alleged to have perpetrated massive election fraud. During the ensuing 8 years of martial law, Zia promised but subsequently postponed national elections on two occasions before finally delivering on a third promise of elections with national and provincial elections in February 1985. During his 8 years of martial law rule, his regime sharply restricted individual rights and severely limited the traditional independence and responsibilities of the judiciary. Immediately prior to lifting martial law at the end of 1985, however, the Government canceled most martial law orders in effect and obtained parliamentary approval for the few which remain on the books. The articles of the Constitution guaranteeing the fundamental rights of Pakistanis and the powers of the judiciary have been fully restored.

Although Pakistan continues to make impressive economic progress, the country remains underdeveloped and the people largely illiterate and poor. Social, political, economic, and religious turmoil throughout its 37-year history has hindered the full development of a national identity and the evolution of democratic institutions.

The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 has had a major impact on Pakistan. A leader of international opposition to that invasion, Pakistan provides refuge for well over 2 million Afghans, and is the target of an intense campaign of Soviet-inspired propaganda and disinformation. The fighting in Afghanistan has frequently spilled over the border with attacks on Pakistani border areas, resulting in over 130 deaths during 1985. Despite this constant pressure, and increasing economic and social dislocation in the border areas deriving directly or indirectly from the presence of the refugees, Pakistan has allowed the refugees freedom of movement and employment. Pakistan has also provided up to half the cost of supporting the refugees, supplementing extensive international support.

PAKISTAN

Human rights abuses have been common under both civilian and military rule during Pakistan's 37 years and, although the trend was generally toward improvement, abuses continued in 1985. On the positive side, the Government, in addition to lifting martial law, held elections on a nonparty basis in February and March for a national assembly and four provincial assemblies. The opposition alliance, the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy (MRD), boycotted the elections, but two major parties actively encouraged their members to participate as individual candidates in the elections, which were characterized by a substantial voter turnout and by an absence of government interference. Press freedom also increased markedly in 1985, with newspapers frequently printing statements by opposition leaders harshly critical of the Government. During the year, Freedom House upgraded Pakistan's rating from "not free" to "partly free"; it observed that Pakistan had moved toward a more democratic and open system, although it noted that there was still a long way to go.

On the negative side, the authorities in 1985 on several occasions used preventive detention (usually for a relatively brief period) and more frequently used externment orders (banning individuals from a particular province) to curtail the activities of opposition leaders. In August, the Government placed the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) leader, Ms. Benazir Bhutto, under house arrest for martial law violations shortly after her return from overseas; she was later allowed to leave the country again. The Government also announced in August that all mail would be subject to seizure and search by the authorities for a period of 6 months. During the year, there were continuing allegations of torture and traditionally harsh and abusive treatment of prisoners. Military courts, which operated with scant regard for due process, concluded several major treason and subversion trials, resulting in the execution of those convicted.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no allegations of government-inspired political killings. Cross-border air raids and artillery attacks by Communist forces based in Afghanistan, and several terrorist bombings directed against Afghan refugees in Pakistan, resulted in over 130 casualties.

b. Disappearance

No known disappearances resulted from official actions in 1985. Kidnaping, particularly for ransom, remains common, particularly in the semiautonomous tribal areas and more remote areas of Sind where banditry is reported on the rise.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are credible allegations that police, paramilitary, and military torture of detainees took place in 1985. Allegations of torture have been heard in connection with all the major security-related trials completed during the year, including the "Libyan conspiracy trial" in Rawalpindi, the "Al Zulfiqar" treason trial in Lahore, and the military conspiracy trial in Attock.

Abuse of prisoners in common criminal cases also appears widespread. As under previous regimes, policemen and jailers use third degree interrogation methods. The local press regularly reports incidents of death in police custody. Although the Government investigates most publicized allegations of mistreatment, it has failed to institute systematic reforms aimed at eliminating them.

Three classes of prison facilities exist. Class "C" cells, which generally hold common criminals, suspected terrorists, and low-level political workers, usually have dirt floors, no furnishings, and poor quality food. The use of handcuffs and fetters is common in "C" cells. Political leaders and foreign prisoners usually are held in class "B" cells, which provide better treatment, less crowded conditions, and better food. Only prominent persons receive class "A" accommodations, which can include air conditioning and private servants. House arrest is a fourth category of imprisonment and the least onerous to the detainee.

The Government's 1979 Hadood Ordinances prescribe traditional Islamic punishments for theft, adultery, and consumption of alcohol; penalties include flogging, stoning, and amputation. There were occasional public floggings of persons convicted of sexual assault, adultery, drinking alcohol, possession of narcotics, and robbery in 1985. However, because of the strict Islamic rules of evidence in the ordinance (and the reluctance of officials to carry them out), no stoning or amputation sentences were carried out. According to published reports, a tribal council in a semiautonomous region may have imposed a stoning sentence in accordance with tribal custom.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Martial law regulations authorized detention up to 90 days for persons who act in a manner prejudicial to the regime. Although legally these detentions could only be extended for up to 2 years, in practice they were occasionally extended beyond that period. Detainees under martial law did not have access to a lawyer; nor could they apply for bail. With the termination of martial law, however, writs challenging detention orders filed under martial law ordinances and regulations, almost all of which have been ended, are permitted.

The number of political detainees fluctuated widely during the course of the year. In the period before the February elections, the Government detained perhaps 1,000 activists of political parties opposing the polls, most of whom were released within a month after the election. The authorities also on several occasions detained, generally for a few days, varying numbers of political activists to prevent the opposition political alliance from holding rallies and "summit" meetings. The Government also detained, usually for short periods of time, religious leaders and workers it suspected of attempting to incite sectarian hatreds.

During the year, several prominent political leaders who had been under detention for comparatively long periods were released, including the Vice Chairman of the Sind branch of the Pakistan Peoples Party (PPP) and the President of the National Liberation Front. PPP Chairman Benazir Bhutto was kept under house arrest in September and October but was freed when she petitioned to leave the country in November.

Although no official statistics exist, it is estimated that in 1985 there were as many as 60 political detainees in Pakistan. Former detainees claimed that prisoners under preventive detention are frequently held incommunicado and allowed little contact with families, lawyers, or doctors. Preparatory to lifting martial law, all cases before martial law courts were transferred to civilian courts. Many, but not all, detainees under martial law were released in the process.

No one has been sentenced to exile. There have been some press reports of forced labor camps located in remote areas of Baluchistan and run by the tribes. The inmates are usually kidnaped from their families as children by hostile tribes. The Government does not condone this practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Until the December 30 lifting of martial law, there were three judicial systems: a civilian judiciary based on Anglo-Saxon law, Shariat Benches operating under Islamic law, and military courts functioning under various martial law regulations. According to the 1981 provisional constitutional order, the civilian judiciary could not review the actions of the martial law authorities and the military courts. Among the steps taken to pave the way for the lifting of martial law, the regime took action which transferred to civilian courts all cases being tried in military courts under certain martial law orders.

The Shariat Benches try offenses under the Hadood Ordinances but otherwise operate similarly to ordinary civilian courts. Cases referred to the Shariat Benches are heard by judges from the civilian court system who, in practice, apply ordinary criminal procedures in most cases. Defendants in the Shariat courts can obtain bail and lawyers of their choice; judges and attorneys must be familiar with Islamic law. The appellate benches are also staffed with ordinary judges from the provincial higher courts.

Under martial law, summary military courts customarily did not grant defendants the right of counsel and could dispose of cases in minutes. Although special military courts did not prohibit defense counsel, judges could impose secrecy on the proceedings and expel witnesses and defendants accused of acting in a "subversive" or "dilatatory" manner. Normally, at least two of the three judges of a special military court were military men with little training in law or familiarity with legal procedures and safeguards. Military court sentences could be appealed only to the Deputy Martial Law Administrators (i.e., the provincial governors) if the sentence was for less than 14 years' imprisonment or to the Chief Martial Law Administrator if the sentence was either death or more than 14 years.

During the year, special military courts handed down decisions in three major security-related trials. In March, a court in Lahore sentenced to life imprisonment all 54 defendants being held at the Kot Lakhpat jail on charges of high treason. Later that month, a court in Rawalpindi sentenced 5 defendants to life imprisonment for conspiring with a foreign power to overthrow the Government; 13 defendants were acquitted. In July, a special military court in Attock sentenced 7 military officers to long prison terms for plotting to assassinate leading government figures and to blow up strategic installations, acquitting 12 codefendants, including the Lahore lawyer Raza Kazim. All three trials were held in camera, and sources familiar with them allege that scant regard was paid by the presiding judges to normal legal procedures and safeguards in the Kot Lakhpat and Rawalpindi trials. Some sources believe better attention to legal procedure was paid at Attock.

Special military courts convicted Nasir Baluch of complicity in the 1981 hijacking of a Pakistan International Airways' aircraft, which resulted in the death of a Pakistani diplomat, and Ayaz Samoo for the assassination of a Karachi politician. Both men, who were also opponents of the regime, were tried in camera and both were executed. Some observers doubt that the accused were accorded normal procedural and substantive safeguards in mounting their defense.

Various estimates exist regarding the number of political prisoners. In August, the Lahore-based Political Prisoners Release and Relief Committee (PPRC) claimed that there were 366 prisoners of conscience in the country, and the Karachi Bar Association identified 122 alleged political prisoners in the Province of Sind (the PPRC had claimed that there were 192 in Sind). Some opposition figures have claimed there were as many as 400 political prisoners in Sind, while the Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights in a recently published report estimated that there were perhaps 1,000 political prisoners in all Pakistan as of April 1985. All of these figures apparently include a number of detainees, as well as a large number of persons convicted of specific acts of terrorism or violence, often of a political or dissident nature. It is believed that the number of persons serving sentences primarily for political beliefs or acts is relatively small. In August, the Interior Minister admitted to a total of six political prisoners in Pakistan.

In a special report on Pakistan, the Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights outlined the alleged deterioration of Pakistan's legal system under martial law.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Decisions about occupation, education, place of residence, and family size are made without official interference. While police must obtain a warrant before entering a private home, authorities have occasionally ignored these formalities in dealing with political opponents of the regime and with suspected bandits.

Pakistan traditionally has maintained a domestic intelligence service to monitor political activists, terrorists, and foreign intelligence agents. Informed sources maintain that wiretapping is used against opposition politicians.

In August, the Government announced that, in order to intercept materials aimed at undermining the ideology of Pakistan, all foreign and domestic mail would be subject to interception and check by the authorities for a period of 6 months.

PAKISTAN

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government owns and operates the radio and television stations and strictly controls the news they carry. A government press trust controls four of the larger newspapers and one of the two national wire services, which are also circumspect in their coverage of the news. The other newspapers and magazines are privately owned and relatively free.

Since the February elections, there has been increasingly free discussion of government policies and criticism of the Government in the privately owned press. During the spring 1985 election campaign, the press was barred from reporting any statements advocating a boycott of the polls. In addition to providing relatively unfettered reporting of statements made by the newly elected legislators, the press has also extensively covered hostile remarks by the leadership of the extraparliamentary opposition. In July, the Information Minister informed the National Assembly that the Government had ended the system of press advisories, through which the Government instructed the media how to report on certain topics. According to press sources, only a few subjects--such as sectarian conflict and relations with India--are now subject to press advisories.

The Information Minister also told the House that the Government would no longer use the placement of advertisements to influence the editorial policies of newspapers. In the past, the Government, by far the single largest advertiser in the country, pressured recalcitrant newspapers by withdrawing advertising. Given the increasingly critical coverage featured in many newspapers, the Government generally appears to be upholding this commitment. However, it reportedly cut in half the advertising revenue for one regional newspaper which prominently reported the return of Benazir Bhutto.

Academic freedom appears circumscribed. The Government has tried to abolish the faculty senate and student council at Quaid-E-Azam university, a move which many faculty members regard as an attempt to curtail academic freedom. A more serious threat to academic freedom, however, is the atmosphere of violence and intolerance among the student body. Well-armed groups of Islamic fundamentalist, secularist/leftist, and ethnic nationalist students clash periodically and attempt to force their views on their classmates and the faculty. Institutions are frequently closed as a result of such violence.

Although literary and creative works remained generally free of censorship in 1985, Pakistani books and magazines dealing with politics were frequently banned. The authorities sporadically confiscated such literature. Foreign publications critical of the regime were occasionally seized. No effort was made to restrict access to foreign broadcasts, although one Pakistani stringer for a foreign broadcasting service was briefly detained during the February election campaign.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Under martial law the right to free assembly was closely controlled. Permits had to be obtained for open meetings, and permission to hold political meetings was infrequent and selective. During 1985, opposition groups used the tactic of meeting at Friday prayers in a designated mosque. On several occasions, clashes occurred with police when the opposition activists attempted to move from the mosque into the streets for demonstrations. Weddings and ceremonies ending fasts have also been the venue of political gatherings.

Authorities occasionally permitted or tolerated smaller opposition meetings or impromptu street demonstrations, and the Movement for the Restoration of Democracy held a large rally in Lahore on August 14. Although still active, student unions remain officially banned.

Workers in most jobs may form labor unions, elect collective bargaining agents, and negotiate on wages and working conditions. Most Pakistanis work in either small, unorganized shops or in the agricultural sector; hence only about 7 percent of the work force is unionized, and long-standing labor law precludes industry-wide collective bargaining. Government measures instituted in 1981 to ban union activities in the state-run Pakistan International Airways (PIA) have not been enforced; the main PIA unions are associated with the banned Pakistan People's Party. Strikes were prohibited under martial law, but there were a number of "go slows" and other labor disputes during the year, including a major walkout by workers at the government-owned Wah ordnance factory.

Under martial law, formal affiliation of labor unions with the officially "defunct" political parties was banned, although informal links were strong in some cases. Pakistani labor unions, professional associations, and employers' associations have the right to federate and to maintain relations with international bodies such as the International Labor Organization and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Pakistan is an Islamic Republic. Minority religious groups are protected, but Hindus, Christians, and Parsis do not enjoy the same legal rights as Muslims. Reports of discrimination against minority groups in the areas of employment and education appear well-founded. Seats in the national and provincial assemblies are reserved for members of minority religious groups, and under the reinstated 1973 Constitution the president and prime minister must be Muslims.

In general, minority groups can practice their religion openly. Members of minority religious groups can maintain links with their coreligionists in other countries and undertake travel for religious purposes. Foreign clergy may enter the country to serve congregations. Although conversions are permitted, the Government prohibits proselytizing among Muslims and has refused to renew the residence permits of some foreign missionaries who have ignored this ban.

The Ahmadi sect, which considers itself Muslim despite theological differences with traditional Islam, has historically been repressed. In 1974, the Bhutto regime amended the Constitution to declare the Ahmadis a non-Muslim minority. In April 1984, the Zia Government banned the use of Muslim terminology and proselytizing by the Ahmadis. Citing their belief that they are Muslims, the Ahmadis refused to run for any of the minority seats reserved for them in the 1985 elections. Sporadic clashes between the Ahmadis and anti-Ahmadi groups continued throughout the year. A number of prominent Ahmadis were murdered in the Sind Province, presumably by anti-Ahmadi fanatics. In what appeared to be deliberate efforts to court arrest, a number of Ahmadis were detained at various locations throughout the country for wearing badges bearing the Islamic profession of faith. Most were quickly released, but some complained of brutal treatment by the authorities. In October, the Government denied the Ahmadis permission to hold two large meetings at their headquarters in Rabwah, while at the same time allowing anti-Ahmadi groups to hold demonstrations in the same area.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Pakistanis generally have freedom of movement within the country. However, prior to lifting martial law, the Government frequently placed restrictions on opposition political leaders, banning them from travel to certain provinces for a specific period of time (usually 90 days). For most Pakistanis, foreign travel is unrestricted; over 2 million work abroad. Under martial law the authorities occasionally restricted the foreign travel of some political figures and women's rights activists. The right of citizens to return to the country is, with infrequent exception, recognized.

Over 2 million Afghans have fled to Pakistan as a result of the Soviet invasion. The Government administers over 300 refugee camps and bears much of the cost of inland transportation of relief supplies provided by various donors. Pakistan has placed few restrictions on travel by, or employment of, the Afghans.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

A martial law regime led by General Zia-ul-Haq governed Pakistan from 1977 to December 30, 1985, during which period a lieutenant general holding the titles of governor and martial law administrator governed each of the four provinces. Zia interpreted the results of a referendum held in December 1984 as an endorsement of his rule, and was sworn in in late March 1985 for a 5-year term as President.

Mohammad Khan Junejo serves as head of the newly elected civilian Government, i.e., Prime Minister. He is part of the National Assembly and responsible to that body. He is assisted by a Cabinet composed of members of Parliament. Similarly, the provincial governments are headed by chief ministers, who are also assisted by cabinets comprised of civilian provincial legislators.

In February and March 1985, elections were held for national and provincial assemblies. Although the Government declared its intention to allow most members of the MRD to stand as individuals, the opposition alliance boycotted the elections, calling for immediate restoration of the 1973 Constitution. However, two of the four most prominent parties in the country chose to participate actively in the elections. A large number of candidates--including many former members of the boycotting parties--ran, and the election turnout was high by Pakistani standards. (Most observers felt that the Government's figures of 53 percent for the national elections and 57 percent for the provincial elections were consistent with earlier voter turnout.) Outside observers, including Western journalists, generally believe that there was little government interference in the elections. Five of the nine serving cabinet ministers who ran in the elections were defeated. At the end of the year the regime, in steps culminating in the lifting of martial law, took action which restored the articles of the Constitution guaranteeing the fundamental human rights of Pakistanis.

Political parties, officially banned in Pakistan since 1979, remained proscribed throughout most of 1985. The political parties now can operate legally after they register with the Government under a new act passed just before the lifting of martial law. The newly elected assemblies have on many issues divided into pro- and antigovernment blocs with little reference to party lines. The Government has been careful to build a consensus for its programs of gradual transition to constitutional government; parliamentary pressure appears to have played an important role in holding the Government to its promise to lift martial law, and Parliament has participated actively in drafting the legislation establishing the postmartial law political structure. The relative balance of power between the President and Prime Minister has been shifted in favor of the latter, but the Presidency still retains sweeping powers.

Pakistan's acceptance into membership in the International Parliamentary Union was announced in September.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Domestic human rights organizations operate largely free of official harassment, and their reports receive extensive coverage in the privately owned press. Police brutality has even been satirized on Pakistan television. In 1985, the Government did not retaliate against bar associations and other groups which criticized human rights abuses.

Pakistan has allowed visits by international human rights organizations, but has neither cooperated with them nor responded to critical reports by Amnesty International, Freedom House, the Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights, and others. However, in some specific cases (e.g., the Raza Kazim case and the Attock trial), the Government appears to have responded positively to international concern.

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern over the continuing detention of prisoners of conscience; the fact that hundreds of other political prisoners were tried before military courts whose procedures fell short of internationally accepted standards for a fair trial; incommunicado detention; reports of torture and deaths of criminal suspects in police custody, allegedly due to torture; the detention of prisoners in bar fetters and shackles; and the frequent imposition of death sentences and flogging. During 1985 Freedom House upgraded Pakistan's rating from "not free" to "partly free."

PAKISTAN

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Pakistan's population of some 99 million is growing at an annual rate of 2.6 percent. Per capita gross national product was $390 in 1983, and the average annual growth rate for the gross domestic product of better than 6 percent a year since 1977 has led to a gradual but sustained rise in living standards. The percentage of the population living below the absolute poverty line had fallen, as of 1979, to 32 percent in the cities and 29 percent in the rural areas. According to official 1984 estimates, the poorest 20 percent of households earn 7.5 percent of the total income.

Social and economic upward mobility is increasingly possible, particularly as a result of repatriated funds from family members working abroad. Pakistan faces many problems common to the developing world: an overall adult literacy rate of 26.2 percent; an infant mortality rate of 124.6 per 1,000 live births; and a life expectancy at birth of 51 years for males and 49 years for females. In spite of increased government attention to rural development, programs for improving living conditions have had mixed results and substantial disparities between urban and rural life still exist. For example, in 1981, 72 percent of urban dwellers had access to potable water, compared to only 20 percent of those in rural areas; urban areas had a literacy rate of 47 percent, the countryside, 13.7 percent.

A key element of the sixth 5-year (1983-88) plan, as amended, is a higher level of allocations for what have been woefully underfunded social sectors. Priorities for these sectors are reflected in the current year's federal budget, where projected outlays for education, with emphasis on primary education in rural areas, are to grow from 6 percent of the total budget expenditures in 1985 to 10 percent in 1986. Expenditures in support of health services are to increase by 22 percent, with major outlays to fund the establishment of basic health centers at the village level. A wage indexation program to reduce the effects of inflation on the poorest segments of society was implemented for the first time in 1985, and the current budget also places emphasis on housing construction and upgrading of existing slum dwellings in Karachi and other major cities. Changes in both tax brackets and rates will also benefit lower-income families.

Corruption has apparently become more widespread over the past decade as large sums of money have entered the country from overseas workers and narcotics trafficking. Socially prominent Pakistanis suffer less at the hands of officialdom than those less well-off, partly because of their ability to return favors or offer inducements to appropriate civil servants and partly because of the general deference still accorded social "betters."

Pakistan law sets minimum wages for both skilled and unskilled labor. Comprehensive health and safety legislation provides for inspection of the workplace by government inspectors to insure compliance with health, safety, and workmen's compensation regulations. Although observed mainly in the breach, the law requires that no adult shall work more than 9 hours without payment of overtime, no worker shall work more than 10 hours of overtime per week, and no child under the age of 15 is to be employed. Children between the ages of 15 and 17 are not to work more than 5 hours a day.

PAKISTAN

The Government has had institutions in place to administer these labor regulations since independence. Nevertheless, lack of resources, corruption, and illiteracy hamper the application of labor legislation. Noncompliance is widespread and punishments for infractions are rarely meted out.

Pakistani society is traditional and Islamic. It assigns women a subordinate role in terms of civil, political, and individual rights. Many Pakistani Muslims interpret the Koran's injunction on modesty to mean that women should remain in "purdah," either at home or behind the veil. These attitudes have contributed to an adult female literacy rate of only 15.2 percent, compared to 36 percent for males (1981 estimates). As of 1980, the primary school enrollment ratio was only 27.7 percent for girls as compared to 69.3 percent for boys. The ratio of men to women in secondary educational institutions, according to 1983 Pakistani statistics, was better than five to one. Eight times as many men as women work outside the home, and those women who work or attend school usually do so in separate facilities.

Urban women are represented in the universities, but postgraduate employment opportunities remain largely limited to teaching, medical services, and the law, with a small number of women entering the commercial and public sectors. The Government's policy of "Islamization" has reversed some of the social and legal gains made by women in past years. Women may not participate in international athletic competition abroad, and, as part of a drive to push for the wearing of traditional garb by both men and women, the Government determines appropriate dress for women employees appearing in public on television, in the print media, and as airline stewardesses.

Although the original caste distinctions common to South Asian societies are disappearing in Pakistan, clan affiliations, which in some ways parallel the old caste system, can still help or hinder those seeking education, employment, or justice.

QATAR

Qatar, a small, wealthy Persian Gulf state ruled by an amir from the Al Thani family, is governed by a 1970 Basic Law, which institutionalizes the customs and social mores of Qatar's conservative Wahhabi Muslim heritage. These include respect for the sanctity of private property, freedom from arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and protection against transgressions of Islamic law (the Shari'a). Thus, although the Amir holds nearly absolute power, he must exercise authority with care. While he may, for example, suspend any secular law or countermand any civil court decisions, he is unlikely to do so, especially without consulting his Council of Ministers and the Advisory Council of Notables that assist him in making policy decisions. The Amir is also unlikely to reach any major decision without achieving a consensus within his family.

Qatar's economy continues to expand at a slower rate than it did during the 1970's and early 1980's. The economy is mixed, with the state owning and operating most basic industries and services while retail trade and the construction industry remain in private hands. Its fast developing industrial infrastructure has led to the creation of an expatriate community which outnumbers the native population by almost four to one. Limiting the influence and controlling the activities of expatriates are for most Qataris major national goals. Qatari resentment against expatriates makes them more likely than natives to be the victims of arbitrary police action. It is also difficult for an alien to take legal action against a citizen. The economic slowdown of 1983-1985 has encouraged the Government to continue its policy of reducing the number of expatriates. This policy, however, has been carried out with some compassion. Palestinians, for example, have on the whole not been forced to leave unless able to make arrangements to settle elsewhere. Expatriates from South Asia have not been so lucky, and their numbers have dropped noticeably.

The human rights situation in Qatar did not change appreciably in 1985. There are many factors against change--not the least being the absence of any credible internal pressure on the regime. So long as the Government feels secure, major innovation is likely to occur only as the result of a consensus within the ruling and other leading families.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is not condoned by the authorities and, although the Government does administer most of the corporal punishments prescribed by the Shari'a, it no longer allows amputation. Although non-European expatriates routinely complain of maltreatment after their arrest by Qatari authorities, the practice does not seem to have official sanction. Executions rarely occur. Prison conditions are uncomfortable but adequate. Family members and friends may bring food to supplement the monotonous prison fare as well as small luxuries and mail. There have been allegations of overcrowded and unsanitary conditions in the women's prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

As a general rule, the authorities must charge suspects before a competent court within 48 hours. In most cases involving expatriates, the police have promptly notified the appropriate consular representative. Suspects detained in security cases are generally not afforded their rights. An expatriate arrested in 1983 in a security case was never formally charged and was held under house arrest for over a year.

Involuntary exile has not been practiced in over a decade. Expatriate offenders are normally deported upon completion of their sentences. There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Except for security cases, most disputes are judged before either a civil or Shari'a court. The civil courts adjudicate most commercial cases involving expatriates. The Shari'a courts administer criminal and family law and may, if one party requests, take jurisdiction in business cases. Although the judiciary is nominally independent, most judges are expatriates holding residence permits granted by the civil authorities and thus hold their positions at the Government's pleasure.

Many expatriates find proceedings in the Shari'a courts bewildering. Only the disputing parties, their relatives and associates, and witnesses are allowed in the courtroom. Lawyers may not play any formal role save that of preparing litigants for their cases. Although non-Arabic speakers are provided with translators, foreigners report being at a considerable disadvantage, especially in cases involving the nonperformance of contracts. Shari'a trials are normally brief. After both parties have stated their cases, and examined witnesses, the judge is likely to deliver a verdict with only a short delay. Criminal cases are normally tried 2 to 3 months after suspects are detained.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Traditional attitudes regarding the sanctity of the home provide a great deal of protection against arbitrary intrusions. Except in security cases or emergencies, the police must normally obtain a warrant before searching a residence or business.

Police routinely monitor the communications of criminal and security suspects. Mail thought to contain either pornography or drugs is also opened as a matter of course.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although both expatriates and Qataris are free to say what they wish privately, public criticism of the ruling family and its policies is not tolerated. The Government strongly discourages attacks on other Arab governments as well. This policy applies to the electronic media, which are government-owned and controlled, and to the press. The journalists, particularly expatriates, generally avoid pressing against these restrictions because of the risk of having residence permits cancelled.

The authorities routinely screen all video cassettes, audio tapes, books, and periodicals for objectionable political sentiments and pornography.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government allows private social, sports, trade, professional, and artistic societies to operate. The activities of these organizations, which must register with the Government, are closely watched.

Government policy does not allow political parties or demonstrations.

While there is no law forbidding the formation of labor unions or strikes, the Government in practice allows neither. There is no collective bargaining by workers.

c. Freedom of Religion

Qatar's state religion is Islam, the Koran is its basic constitution, and the Shari'a its legal code. Muslims enjoy certain advantages such as preferential employment. All other faiths are prohibited public worship, and they may not proselytize. Apostasy from Islam remains a capital crime, although no one has been executed for it in recent memory. The Government does tolerate the private practice of non-Muslim religions, both by allowing parents to raise children in non-Muslim faiths and by allowing private gatherings in private homes for worship.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on internal travel. Male Qataris travel abroad at will. Females, both Qatari and foreign, usually require the permission of a male guardian or relative to leave the country. All Qatari citizens have the right to return. Foreigners are subject to immigration restrictions designed to control the local labor pool. They require a local sponsor to enter and their sponsor's permission to depart.

The Government has no formal policy on refugees. Those attempting to enter illegally, including defectors from nearby countries, are denied entry. Often refugees who can get local sponsorship or employment may enter. If they lose their jobs, however, they are expected to leave. The Government has apparently been willing to relax its rules in order to help Palestinians unable to find refuge elsewhere.

Section 3 Respect For Political Rights: The Right of Citizens To Change Their Government

Qatar's political institutions blend the characteristics of a traditional Bedouin tribal state and of a modern bureaucracy. There are no political parties, elections, or organized opposition to the Government, and the Amir exercises all executive and legislative powers. His autocratic rule, however, is checked to some extent by entrenched local customs. Interlocking family networks and the recognized right of citizens to submit appeals or petitions personally to their Amir provide effective, if informal, avenues for redress of grievances and also serve to limit abuses. The custom of rule by consensus leads to extensive consultations between the Amir, leading merchants, religious leaders, and other notables on important policies. Women for the most part play no role in public life.

Under Qatar's Basic Law of 1970, the Amir must be chosen from among and by the adult males of the Al Thani family. The current Amir has designated his oldest son as heir apparent. This took place with the consent of the notables and religious leaders according to established custom. There are no serious challenges to this arrangement, and in the foreseeable future effective political power will remain in the hands of the Amir, his family, and the local notables.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No major international or nongovernmental organization monitoring human rights abuses has asked to investigate conditions in Qatar. Amnesty International's 1985 Report did not include Qatar among the countries surveyed. Freedom House calls Qatar "partly free." Qatar has expressed concern over the plight of Palestinian, Lebanese, and Afghan refugees.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Qatar's population is estimated to be 292,000 and to be growing at an annual rate of about 4.2 percent. The per capita gross national product is approximately $22,000 (1982).

Life expectancy at birth is 72 years, and the infant mortality rate is 42 per 1,000. Education is free for citizens through graduate school; most of the large expatriate communities have their own schools. The adult literacy rate in 1981 was just over 50 for men and women.

Oil revenues have enabled the Government to develop an extensive network of social services. Health care is provided free to all residents. Staple foods such as flour, milk, and rice are subsidized; prices of other items are regulated. Citizens receive subsidized housing and scholarships for higher study abroad. Most Qatari males, and all heads of families, are guaranteed a reasonable income either through government employment or social security payments.

The minimum working age is 18 years, but expatriate children frequently work at younger ages in small businesses and shops. Some regulations concerning worker safety and health exist, but enforcement is spotty. There is no minimum wage in Qatar and most workers spend less than 48 hours per week on the job.

In this conservative society, women remain in a subordinate position, largely relegated to roles as mothers and homemakers, although some are now finding jobs in education, medicine, and the news media. Their activities are still bound by a number of social customs and quasi-legal restrictions, such as veiling and prohibitions against the issuance of driver's licenses, and they continue to face widespread discrimination. For example, women do not regularly receive the overseas university scholarships available for males, and their employment, while tolerated, is discouraged beyond such fields as nursing, teaching, and home economics. Public life is a male sphere. Expatriate women find it easier to get jobs or to own and manage a business than their Qatari counterparts. On the other hand, mandatory schooling for girls and the opening of employment opportunities for women in medicine and education represent a shift in attitude, as does the slowly expanding number of women allowed to go abroad for university studies. There are signs that as more Qatari women receive education, they will press for a relaxation of some of the restrictions from their country's tribal past.

SAUDI ARABIA

Saudi Arabia is a traditional, Arab, and Islamic monarchy ruled by the sons of its founder, the late King Abd Al Aziz (known in the West as "Ibn Saud"). There is no written national constitution.

By convention, the King is chosen from among the sons of Abd Al Aziz, who themselves have preponderant influence in the choice. Senior religious scholars and other princes also have a voice. The King serves as Prime Minister. Officials from the highest levels on down maintain contact with citizens by holding open door audiences regularly. There are no elected assemblies or political parties, and nonreligious public assembly and demonstrations are not permitted. Non-Muslim public worship is banned. The legitimacy of the regime rests upon its perceived adherence to the defense of Islam, particularly the austere Hanbali School of Islamic jurisprudence. Rulers and ruled share a respect for laws believed to be divinely inspired and ancient customs which call for authority based on consensus in government, internal social cohesion, and economic private enterprise. Social custom mandates strict separation of the sexes outside the home, greatly limiting job or career possibilities for women.

During the past 30 years, massive oil revenues have transformed Saudi Arabia's centuries-old pastoral, agricultural, and commercial economy. This transformation has been marked by rapid urbanization, large-scale infrastructure development, government subsidies to entrepreneurs and consumers, the emergence of a technocratic middle class, and the presence of almost 3.5 million foreign workers. Economic activity and resources (except oil) have largely remained in private hands.

No major new developments affected human rights during 1985. Due to unsettled conditions in the Middle East, the Iran-Iraq war, the basic ideological enmity of the Iranian revolution toward Saudi Arabia, the lingering memory of antiregime disturbances in 1979-80, terrorist incidents and discoveries of foreign-supported subversive activities in the Gulf States, as well as two terrorist bomb explosions in Riyadh last May, Saudi authorities remain deeply concerned about internal security. There have been several reports of mistreatment of prisoners in 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known political killings in 1985.

b. Disappearance

Disappearances at the hands of official agents are unknown.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Government policy prohibits torture, but some punishments meted out under Islamic Shari'a law involve amputation. There have been reports during 1985 of police beatings of detainees to elicit confessions, which in the absence of witnesses are usually required for conviction in Shari'a courts. One American citizen was detained and flogged by the so-called Mutawwi'in (enforcers), or members of the Committee for Propagation of Virtue and Prevention of Vice. These are government employees who assert the right to detain suspects for up to 48 hours before turning them over to police, and to administer floggings to encourage confessions. The American's accusation is being investigated by the authorities. Prison conditions are apparently not unusually harsh or intentionally degrading. There were reports during 1985 of mistreatment of foreign national prisoners in a Riyadh jail and of routine beatings of Saudi prisoners in the Qatif traffic jail. There was one documented instance in 1985 of abuse of an American inmate at Dammam Central Prison. These appear to involve abuses by lower-level officials, and not expressions of policy. The Interior Ministry investigated reports that surfaced in 1983 alleging that foreign national prisoners had been subjected to beatings, sleep deprivation, and high frequency noise in order to extract confessions. In cases where the reports were found accurate, the Government took disciplinary action.

In accordance with Shari'a law, Saudi Arabia imposes capital punishment for the crimes of premeditated murder, adultery, apostasy from Islam, and, depending upon the circumstances, rape and armed robbery. The Interior Minister and Cassation Courts review all cases in which capital punishment has been imposed. During 1985, the number of death sentences increased sharply (34 executions in the first 9 months of the year) from the low levels (5 or fewer) in most recent years. Furthermore, death sentences have been handed down for crimes that are not normally considered capital. Four Saudis were beheaded for crimes in which no one was hurt: two for armed robbery and two policemen for burglary, drug dealing, and other offenses. Beheading is the usual method of execution. Execution by firing squad or stoning may be imposed for adultery. Severe social disapproval discourages adultery, and the requirement of confession or testimony by four eyewitnesses renders conviction for adultery rare. A recidivist thief may suffer severance of a hand. For less severe crimes, such as drunkenness, or publicly infringing Islamic precepts, flogging with a cane is often imposed. Public flogging is intended to humiliate the criminal and serve as a deterrent to others. The skin is not to be broken, but floggings are painful and leave welts.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were several dozen arbitrary arrests and imprisonments of Shi'a in the Eastern Province during 1985. There is no automatic procedure for contacting a detainee's family or employer. If asked, however, the police will usually confirm an arrest. Shari'a law makes no provision for bail or habeas corpus. Prisoners may be held for months while an investigation proceeds before being either charged or released. Regulations issued by the Interior Ministry in 1983 to eliminate lengthy pretrial detentions or detentions without charge have not been vigorously applied. On the other hand, the Board of Grievances, an independent judicial body empowered to investigate citizens' complaints against official abuse, has used authority granted to it in 1983 and has become an effective if slow avenue of redress for citizens and private corporations against state institutions, public sector companies, and government officials accused of malfeasance, nonfeasance, bias, or corruption.

Normal consular notification of arrests of foreign nationals is almost unheard of, and police authorities frequently deny consular access during the investigative phase. It is impossible to estimate accurately the number of individuals affected. There have been credible allegations of incommunicado detention and solitary confinement. Forced labor and exile as a form of punishment are unknown.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judicial system is founded upon the Shari'a. The Shari'a courts exercise jurisdiction over common criminal cases and civil suits regarding marriage, divorce, child custody, and inheritance of real or personal property. Trials are generally closed and are normally held without counsel, though the advice of Islamic lawyers is available before trial. In the Shari'a court the defendant appears before a judge, who determines guilt or innocence and, if warranted, imposes the appropriate punishment. Appeals against judges' decisions are automatically reviewed by the Justice Ministry or, in more serious cases, by the Supreme Judicial Council to ensure that court procedure was correct and that the judge applied appropriate Shari'a principles and punishments. Counsel is not permitted in the court itself, but lawyers may act as interpreters for those unfamiliar with Arabic. With rare exceptions, there is no consular access to foreign nationals' trials. The independence of the judiciary is ensured by law and respected in practice. The Justice Ministry is responsible for the appointment, transfer, and promotion of judges. Judges may be disciplined or removed only by the Supreme Judicial Council, an independent body of senior jurists. The Supreme Judicial Council has investigated and removed corrupt judges so that they might be prosecuted and jailed.

Specialized labor and commercial courts decide cases on the basis of decrees issued by the Council of Ministers and regulations issued pursuant to those decrees. The Commercial Courts' effectiveness is vitiated by frequent serious delays in reaching decisions and practical difficulties in enforcing judgments reached. The military justice system has jurisdiction over uniformed personnel and civilian government employees charged with violations of military regulations. Decisions of courts martial are reviewed by the Minister of Defense and Aviation and by the King.

The Board of Grievances arbitrates claims against the State. The President and Vice President of the Board are experienced jurists. They are aided by board members expert in administrative, contract, corruption, civil service, and forgery legislation. The President is responsible directly to the King, and the members of the board are guaranteed considerable independence. The board has vigorously wielded new powers, granted by a 1983 decree, to call erring officials to account.

There were no reports of prisoners formally sentenced for political offenses. Detention for a few weeks or months followed by a warning and release has reportedly been used to intimidate the few Saudis who have publicly criticized the regime.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Among the most fundamental of Islamic precepts are the sanctity of family life and the inviolability of the home. The police generally must demonstrate reasonable cause and obtain permission from the provincial governor before searching a private home, but warrants are not required. The Mutawwi'in assert the right to enter homes to search for evidence of un-Islamic behavior when they have "grounds for suspicion," but instances of this appear to be exceedingly rare. Wiretapping and mail surveillance can be carried out on the authority of officials of the Interior Ministry or the Directorate of Intelligence. A wide network of informants is believed to be employed.

Some social norms and strictures affecting personal life are matters of law and are enforced by the Government. Saudi women may not marry non-Saudis without government permission. Saudi men must seek approval to marry women from countries other than the six members of the Gulf Cooperation Council. During Ramadan, the prohibition against public eating, drinking, or smoking during daylight hours is enforced on Muslims and non-Muslims alike. Prohibitions against alcohol and pornography are strictly enforced. Members of the officially supported Committee for the Propagation of Virtue and the Suppression of Vice patrol the streets and markets to assure Islamic decorum in dress and demeanor and the closing of shops during the daily prayer periods.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Criticism of Islam and the ruling family is not allowed. The potential presence of informers renders open criticism of the regime rare except among trusted friends. Saudis are, however, able to voice complaints and to seek redress of grievances through the open-door audiences which are held regularly by even the highest officials.

The press is privately owned. It is effectively controlled by both the 1982 media policy statement and the firm understanding that nothing embarrassing to the Government, ruling family, or religious leadership may be published. The media policy statement enjoins the press to uphold Islam, oppose atheism, promote Arab interests, preserve the cultural heritage of Saudi Arabia, and combat human rights violations. Guidelines issued by the Information Ministry instruct the press on the position to take on controversial political issues. Editors are appointed with the approval of the Information Minister, and he may have them removed.

Saudi television and radio are state-owned and operated. Besides entertainment, their basic aim is to project and gain public support for official policies and views, with the corollary that conflicting viewpoints are not presented. Increasingly, foreign news is presented objectively, as for example in television coverage of the Israeli elections. Foreign publications circulate but are rigorously censored for materials deemed immoral or critical of Saudi policies and actions. These criteria are sometimes interpreted broadly or capriciously. Time magazine was temporarily banned because of an article it carried about a dispute among Turkish Muslims that was deemed insulting to Islam. A recent article on a Saudi-U.K. arms deal in the International Herald Tribune was censored, and a survey of Israel was excised from a recent edition of the Economist.

Academic freedom is constrained by similar guidelines; the study of Freud and Marx, for example, is taboo. Professors commonly believe that classroom comments which would be taken as antiregime will be reported to the authorities.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Assembly as a means of political expression or to present grievances is prohibited. Tribal, familial, and economic interest groups informally aggregate public opinion, which their leaders express to high officials. Nonpolitical clubs and professional groups may be organized with the permission of the authorities. The few existing professional bodies are permitted but not encouraged to maintain contacts with their recognized international counterparts. Labor unions are prohibited, and strikes are forbidden. Collective bargaining is unknown.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official religion. All Saudis must be Muslim. Apostasy is a crime, and proselytizing by non-Muslims is prohibited. The Saudis scrupulously uphold the Islamic injunction that all Muslims have a responsibility to make a pilgrimage, or Hajj, to Mecca, and all Muslims are welcome to visit the holy places. Travel to these places by non-Muslims is prohibited. Political activities by pilgrims are banned.

The Shi'ite Muslims of the Eastern Province, usually estimated at 500,000 persons, constitute a religious minority subject to social and economic discrimination. In the wake of the Iranian revolution, they have been periodically subjected to surveillance and limitations on travel abroad. Certain of their members have been arrested without charge and detained, sometimes for many months. For security reasons, the Government does not permit Shi'a public processions to mark Ashura, the holiest of the exclusively Shi'a holidays. The Shi'a are free to adjudicate exclusively intra-Shi'ite disputes within their own legal tradition, but Shi'ite judges receive no stipend or salary from the Government. Likewise, the Government provides no financial support for the Shi'ite religious establishment and does not permit the construction of Shi'ite mosques. In recent years the authorities have made efforts to redress the Shi'a's complaints about the economic underdevelopment of their areas. Nevertheless, most Shi'a continue to live under conditions notably poorer than those of their Sunni compatriots.

Non-Muslim religious services are not permitted. Saudi customs officials prevent the importation of non-Islamic religious materials. Foreign nationals practice their religions only in discreet, private gatherings. Large gatherings or elaborate organizational structures are likely to attract official attention and may lead to the deportation of leaders. There have been instances in which small private services, discovered and brought to the attention of the authorities, have been broken up and those conducting them arrested, interrogated, and deported.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Immigration, and Repatriation

Saudis may travel freely anywhere within the country. Passports are issued by the Interior Ministry. Male Saudis may travel abroad freely. In the case of government officials, the permission of the Royal Diwan is required but apparently is normally perfunctory. Women must obtain prior permission from their closest male relative before being allowed to leave the country. The passports of suspected subversives have occasionally been seized. Shi'a are generally prohibited from traveling to Iran. Detection of such travel by Saudi authorities is followed by interrogation. Shi'a known to have pro-Khomeini sympathies may not be allowed to travel abroad. Saudis are permitted to emigrate and assume foreign nationality. This results in the loss of Saudi nationality. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

There is no formal policy regarding refugees or granting asylum. Refugees and displaced persons are in most cases dealt with like all other foreign workers. Anyone seeking residence in the Kingdom, except Yemenis, must meet strictly enforced requirements of sponsorship and employment. There are over 250,000 foreigners who fled their native countries, primarily Palestinians, Lebanese, Eritreans, Afghans, and South Yemenis. For the most part, these individuals receive no special treatment, privileges, or services. Reportedly, individual Saudis (frequently members of the ruling family) permanently sponsor such individuals to enable them to remain in Saudi Arabia, permitting them to find work where they may. In a small number of cases, sponsors reportedly have charged fees to such persons for providing documentation required by the Government. There have been no reports of forced repatriation of persons fleeing persecutions. There are hardly any Saudi refugees outside of the country. A few Shi'a are thought to have fled the country to avoid arrest.

Foreigners living in Saudi Arabia, except for Yemenis, are required to carry identification cards. They are not permitted to travel outside the city of their employment or to change their workplace without their sponsor's permission, nor are they permitted to travel abroad without their sponsor's permission since sponsors hold foreign national employees' passports and are responsible for obtaining exit visas for them. Foreigners involved in or often merely incidental to commercial disputes or criminal investigations are usually not allowed to leave the country until the problem has been resolved. Sponsors have taken advantage of this arrangement at times to exert unfair pressure to resolve commercial disputes in their favor and occasionally have been able to prevent foreign nationals from departing Saudi Arabia for long periods. The official Saudi practice of seizing passports of all potential suspects and witnesses in criminal cases has sometimes forced foreign nationals to remain in Saudi Arabia for lengthy periods.

SAUDI ARABIA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The King rules the country in matters secular and religious, within limits established by religious law, tradition, and the need to maintain consensus among the ruling family and religious leaders. The King's legitimacy is based upon his descent, his selection by consensus, his adherence to the tenets of Islam, and his perceived concern for the welfare of the nation. With the consent of other senior princes, the King, who is also the Prime Minister, appoints the Crown Prince, who is the First Deputy Prime Minister. All other ministers are appointed by the King. They, in turn, appoint subordinate officials with cabinet concurrence. There are no elected officials in Saudi Arabia. (The only elections in Saudi Arabia appear to be businessmen's elections of two-thirds or more of the board members of the quasi-official Saudi Chambers of Commerce and Industry.) Likewise, political parties are not permitted, and there are no known organized opposition groups.

Traditionally, public opinion has been expressed through client-patron relationships and interest groups such as tribes, families, and professional hierarchies. The open-door audience (majlis) remains the primary forum for expression of opinion or grievance. Subjects typically raised at a majlis are complaints about bureaucratic dilatoriness or insensitivity, requests for redress or assistance, or criticism of particular acts of government affecting personal or family welfare. Broader "political" concerns--Saudi social, security, economic, or foreign policy--are not considered appropriate and are seldom raised. The King meets on a weekly basis with religious leaders.

This informal consultative means of ascertaining public opinion has limitations. Participation by women in the process is severely restricted. Rural-urban migration has weakened tribal and familial links. Citizens are not directly able to change policies or officials through the majlis system, which is largely a forum in which grievances are aired and favors sought. As governmental functions have become increasingly complex, time-consuming, and centralized in Riyadh, direct access to senior officials has decreased. The creation of a system of national consultation between rulers and ruled has been under consideration for many years. No steps toward its implementation were taken in 1985.

There have been no reports that international or nongovernmental organizations have sought to investigate alleged violations of human rights during 1985. There are no human rights groups in Saudi Arabia. In international forums, Saudi representatives regularly protest violations of human rights of Palestinians, Afghans, Eritreans, and Muslim minorities in several countries.

In its 1985 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the reported detention of possible prisoners of conscience, inadequate detention and trial procedures in political cases, allegations of torture and ill-treatment of detainees, and the use of amputations, flogging, and the death penalty. Freedom House rates Saudi Arabia as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION:

Petroleum revenues have permitted the Government to improve the living standards of most Saudis, whose annual per capita gross domestic product was $13,000 in 1984. Its population of 11,152,000, including approximately 3.4 million foreign nationals, is growing at a rate of 3.2 percent annually.

The Government has promoted public welfare through massive development projects, consumer subsidies, interest-free housing loans, and concessions to entrepreneurs. The economy is still adjusting to the fall in national income caused by declining oil prices and production in the past 3 years. The Government has used its huge foreign reserves to complete major infrastructure projects while promoting private agricultural and industrial development and maintaining consumer purchasing power through subsidized loans and welfare payments.

According to the World Bank, 91 percent of the Saudi population had access to safe water in 1980, and in 1977, calorie intake was 91.2 percent of the total requirements. Life expectancy is 56.9 years. Health care and education through the university level are available to all Saudis without cost. The development of a modern education system is a major government objective. Appropriations made for education in the current budget amounted to 11 percent of the total. Over the past year 880 schools and colleges were opened, raising the total to approximately 10,000. During the same period the number of students enrolled at all levels rose by 7.6 percent, and the number of teachers increased by 9.5 percent. In recent years primary schools have been constructed in even the most remote villages and a massive expansion of the university system was begun in the late 1970's with the objective of accommodating all undergraduate applicants within the country. Literacy among adult Saudis has risen rapidly; Saudi Government statistics suggest an adult literacy rate of about 33 percent (45 percent of men and 20 percent of women). Approximately 65 percent of Saudi children (77 percent of boys and 53 percent of girls) are enrolled in primary schools.

Despite these efforts, poverty has not been eliminated. Some of the remaining Bedouin prefer a traditional lifestyle and only selectively take advantage of available opportunities to improve their standard of living. Other Saudis have only limited opportunities to improve their economic position due to lack of education or ignorance of government assistance programs. In the cities, poor Saudis are likely to have recently migrated from rural areas. In the rural areas, the poor are mostly small farmers in provinces where government resources have not yet been so generously applied to infrastructure development as in cities. The Bedouin, who comprise perhaps 5 to 7 percent of the population, cling to a nomadic way of life which frequently precludes the accumulation of substantial wealth.

The large expatriate work force does not, for the most part, receive the same economic and social benefits available to native Saudis and must abide by considerable restrictions on its lifestyle. The poorest of these foreign nationals, almost 3,000,000 Yemenis, Africans, and Asians, live under conditions significantly worse than those of the Saudi urban classes.

SAUDI ARABIA

The 1969 Saudi Labor and Workmen Law requires the employer to take necessary precautions for the protection of workmen from hazards and diseases resulting from the work and the machinery used, and for the protection and safety of the work. Labor Ministry inspectors and the labor courts seek with some success to enforce the labor code, but foreign nationals report frequent failures to enforce health and safety standards. Saudi authorities have reportedly enjoyed greater success in enforcing contract terms and working hours. There have been press reports that some foreign workers are living and working under poor conditions, and there are indications that the authorities may take corrective measures. Saudi labor law establishes maximum hours at regular pay at 48 per week and allows employers to require up to 12 additional hours of overtime at time-and-a-half. Employees may volunteer for additional overtime. There is no legal minimum wage. The labor law provides, however, that minimum wages may be set by the Council of Ministers on the recommendation of the Minister of Labor. The market minimum is in effect the amount required to induce foreign laborers to work in Saudi Arabia.

There is no minimum age for those employed in agriculture, family enterprises, private homes, or repair of agricultural machinery. Adolescents (ages 15-18), juveniles (under 15), and women may not be employed in hazardous or harmful industries, such as mines or industries employing power-operated machinery. In other cases the labor law provides for a minimum age of 13, which may be waived by the Ministry of Labor in certain areas and with the consent of the juvenile's guardian. Child labor does not appear to be a significant problem in Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Arabia has a generous social security program for which most foreign workers are eligible on the same basis as Saudis. Some foreign workers, particularly those in unskilled positions such as lower-level construction workers and housemaids, are exploited due to their ignorance of the labor code, inability to understand Arabic, lack of written contracts, or need for income. The labor courts have the reputation of being reasonably fast and fair.

Due to orthodox religious beliefs and traditional social practices, women do not enjoy equality with men. By Koranic precept, a daughter's share of an inheritance is less than that of a male offspring. Women are obliged to demonstrate legally specified grounds for divorce, whereas men may divorce without such grounds. In Shari'a court the testimony of one man equates to that of two women. Women may not drive motor vehicles, and there are restrictions on their use of public facilities when men are present. They do not by custom travel alone. They are restricted to reserved women's sections on urban buses. Women may travel abroad only with the written permission of their nearest male relative. Employment opportunities for Saudi women either in the civil service or with public corporations are extremely limited. In practice their employment is largely restricted to the teaching and health care professions. In public, women are required to dress with extreme modesty. Free but segregated education through the university level is now available to Saudi women locally. The number of civil service jobs available to women (in segregated offices) has increased somewhat. Polygamy is becoming less common, particularly among younger Saudis. This may be due in part to economic factors.

SRI LANKA

Sri Lanka is a multiparty democracy. Its Constitution, adopted in 1978, provides for a strong executive president who is independent of the unicameral parliament. Both are elected by universal adult suffrage, with members of parliament to be selected in future general elections on the basis of a system of proportional representation. The Constitution also provides for an independent judiciary and the rule of law. When the 1978 Constitution came into effect, the then Prime Minister and leader of the United National Party (UNP), J. R. Jayewardene, became President.

A developing country, Sri Lanka has achieved a high quality of life despite low per capita income which in 1984 still stood at only $340. Tea exports are Sri Lanka's largest source of foreign exchange earnings. Other agricultural products and textiles are also major exports. Approximately 60 percent of Sri Lanka's productive capacity is state-owned or controlled, the result of large-scale nationalization in the early 1970's.

Sri Lankans are ethnically and religiously diverse: 74 percent are Sinhalese, mostly Buddhists; 18 percent are Tamils, predominantly Hindus; 7 percent are Muslims of varying ethnic origins; the remainder consist of Malays, some descendants of European colonists, and a small number of aboriginals, the Veddahs. Of the Tamil population, two-thirds are so-called "Ceylon Tamils" whose presence on the island dates back many centuries. The rest are "Indian Tamils," who were recruited in India during the last century to work on the tea plantations. Under the British colonial administration prior to 1948, Ceylon Tamils held a disproportionate share of influential positions in government service, the police, the professions, and commerce. With independence, Sinhalese political leaders sought to redress what their community regarded as an imbalance in favor of Ceylon Tamils; typical of their efforts was the so-called "Sinhala-Only" Act of 1956 which made Sinhalese the sole official language of the country. For Tamils, the Act stood for government-sanctioned discrimination against them. However, Tamil was designated a "national" language by the 1978 Constitution and its use in government, education, and the courts is specifically protected in the Constitution.

A growing Tamil conviction that they do not enjoy political rights equal to those of the Sinhalese majority led some moderate political leaders and frustrated Tamil youths to conclude, by the mid-1970's, that separation of the Tamil-majority areas of the island into an independent Tamil state or "Eelam" was the only solution. The political leaders renamed their party the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) and contested the 1977 elections on a platform of independence, winning all 14 seats in the heavily Tamil Northern Province and two seats in the Eastern Province, which has a sizable Tamil minority. Many militant Tamil youths turned to armed struggle and to terrorism as their way of attaining Eelam. Their targets have been government security forces, officials, Sinhalese civilians and Tamils who do not support their cause. Government security forces have not succeeded in their efforts to end separatist violence. Poorly prepared for the task, they have sometimes retaliated against innocent Tamil civilians.

SRI LANKA

Despite the TULF's advocacy of separatism, from 1977 onwards it sought to negotiate with the Government a political resolution of Tamil grievances. TULF members lost their seats in Parliament in 1983 after they refused to swear allegiance to the Sri Lankan unitary state, as required by a constitutional amendment enacted that year. By-elections to fill these seats have been postponed because of the unsettled security situation in the North and East, and as a result Tamils living in those constituencies are currently without representatives in Parliament. There are currently three Tamil United National Party members of Parliament and three Tamils in the cabinet, including the leader of the Ceylon Workers Congress (CWC), a labor union-cum-political party which represents the interests of Sri Lanka's Indian Tamil community.

Throughout 1984 an All-Party Conference sought to develop a political compromise based on the devolution of certain powers to local government bodies. The process ended in stalemate in December 1984 when the TULF rejected the Government's proposals for devolution, and the Government subsequently withdrew them. During early 1985, both sides stepped up their attacks, with the Government mounting a series of military operations in the north and east in an effort to locate the Tamil separatists and their facilities and to eliminate them.

The murder by Tamil militants of 146 mostly Sinhalese civilians in an attack on the Buddhist sacred city of Anuradhapura in May shocked the nation and led to renewed efforts to find a negotiated settlement to the communal problem. With India's help, a "cessation of hostilities" between the major militant groups and the Government was arranged, and face-to-face talks were begun in Bhutan; these broke down in August in the face of mounting ceasefire violations by both sides. The talks revealed a wide gap between Tamil demands and the concessions that the Government was prepared to make. Indirect exchanges between the Government and representatives of the Tamil separatists continued sporadically through the end of the year, but violence resumed at previous levels as intercommunal fighting spread to the multiethnic Eastern Province. The "cessation of hostilities" remained in effect only nominally, while a multiethnic ceasefire monitoring committee endeavored to investigate reports of violations by both sides. Its reports at the end of the year concluded that both sides had been guilty of violations.

As in previous years, controversy over the actions of the security forces has been a major source of tension. Their numbers are relatively small: 18,000 in the police and 21,000 in the armed services. They once had a considerable number of Tamils among their ranks, and as recently as 1984 the senior police officer was a Tamil. But by 1985 no more than 5 percent of police personnel were Tamils; in the armed services virtually 100 percent of enlisted ranks are now Sinhalese. The Government has admitted that breaches of discipline among the security forces have occurred and some measures have been taken to punish wrongdoers. A major problem has been the tendency of the security forces, when attacked, often by land mines planted by the separatists, to strike out indiscriminately at the civilian population. There are indications that the landmines are deliberately placed in civilian areas so as to provoke these retaliatory attacks by the security forces. Civilians in disputed areas often fear both the security forces and the militant separatists.

Some traditional rights remained restricted in 1985 because of the continuing insurgency. The Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA), instituted as a temporary measure in 1979 and made permanent in 1982, gave the Government special powers to arrest without warrants and to detain for long periods without bail or charges those suspected of acting against the State. Emergency regulations, promulgated under the state of emergency which has been in effect since May 1983, have given the police broad powers, including the power of preventive detention. At midyear, however, the Government relaxed some restrictions adversely affecting residents of the north and east by lifting curfews and easing enforcement of security zones. Some detainees held under the PTA were released, while others were formally charged. In addition, formal press censorship was lifted in July.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The death toll, mostly in the north and east, from politically motivated violence arising from the communal conflict rose again in 1985. The Government estimated that 1,078 persons were killed due to ethnic violence. Of these, 885 were civilians, 75 police, and 118 members of the armed forces.

Continuing violence throughout the year was punctuated by a number of particularly serious incidents of violence by both sides. While conclusive evidence is often lacking, the following are instances in which security forces allegedly attacked innocent civilians. On May 9, after a landmine explosion the previous day in which an army major was killed, members of an army patrol allegedly killed 43 young Tamil males in Velvetitturai on the Jaffna Peninsula. On May 15, a ferry enroute to the Jaffna Peninsula was stopped and 26 Tamils were killed by a group of men armed with knives and blunt instruments; survivors of the attack claim to have recognized several of their attackers as members of a nearby Sri Lankan naval detachment; on the basis of a high-level naval inquiry, the Government has reported that there was no evidence that naval personnel had been involved. Members of the local home guards were identified by survivors as the perpetrators of an incident June 3 outside of Trincomalee on the east coast in which a bus was stopped and 13 Tamil passengers shot dead. On August 16, near Vavuniya in the north-central part of the country, members of an army patrol who had escaped injury from a landmine explosion moments earlier allegedly undertook reprisals against nearby Tamil civilians, reportedly killing as many as 100 people. The Government initiated an inquiry and reported that 22 were killed when army reinforcements arriving on the scene "acted without restraint," and that it was taking disciplinary action against the officer in charge of the reinforcements. On November 16 four policemen were killed in the east coast town of Batticaloa when a landmine detonated under their jeep. According to witnesses, police subsequently shot and killed nine local civilians.

SRI LANKA

In the few cases in which investigations have revealed that the security forces have acted improperly, the Government has maintained that it was unable to obtain adequate evidence to prosecute. It has instead dealt with misbehavior administratively. In 1985, four servicemen were "discharged with ignominy," and inquiries or disciplinary proceedings were being conducted against other members of the security forces allegedly implicated in such incidents as the deaths of Tamil civilians in Velvettiturai in May and in Vavuniya in August.

In 1985, more than in previous years, Tamil militants targeted civilians in addition to the security forces. Typically Tamils accused of collaborating with the Government were tied to a lamp post or telephone pole with a sign noting their alleged crime, and then shot. According to Government figures, 61 Tamils were killed in this manner. The militants also assassinated several prominent members of Jaffna's Tamil community, including a school principal and two former members of parliament, for allegedly being traitors to the cause of Tamil Eelam. Militants were also responsible for setting the explosives which on January 19 destroyed most of the Yal Devi express train from Jaffna to Colombo, killing 29 soldiers and 11 civilians. Tamils attacked police stations in Jaffna and Mannar in April and May respectively, killing close to 50 police. On May 3 guerrillas attacked a naval base, an army camp, and a police station on the Jaffna Peninsula.

Whereas most previous attacks against civilians had been directed against members of their own ethnic community, Tamil militants on May 14 attacked Sinhalese civilians in and near the ancient Sinhalese capital of Anuradhapura, killing 146 persons, including 21 women and 14 children. It is widely believed that this incident of terrorism was in retaliation for the alleged killing of 43 young Tamil males in Velvettiturai by army personnel 5 days earlier. Tamil militants are also credited with attacks on the Eastern Province village of Namalwatte on November 7 in which 10 Sinhalese civilians were killed and an attack September 16 on the Buddhist temple in Thirukunamadu, also in the Eastern Province, in which 2 Buddhist priests and 3 pilgrims were shot dead.

Although no accurate statistics are available, reported disappearances rose during 1985. There were a number of reports of the disappearance of young Tamil males who had been arrested and taken in for questioning by the security forces. In practice once limited mostly to the Jaffna Peninsula, police and military patrols operating in the north-central and eastern-coastal parts of the country also began making large-scale arrests and detentions of young Tamil males as the insurgency spread to those areas. Amnesty International estimated in October that 180 such detainees had "disappeared" in "recent months." Some of those detained were later discovered by their families to be in detention at police stations or in army detention camps. Others have not been found. In several instances, relatives or organizations seeking information about the missing say they were told the individual had never been arrested, or had been released and departed for terrorist training outside the country, or had been shot while trying to escape. The Government estimated that 60 civilians and members of the security forces were abducted by Tamil militants and are presumed to have been killed. The most prominent case of disappearance in 1985 involved Father Mary Bastian, a Tamil Catholic priest in the western-coastal Mannar area. On January 5-6, an army patrol searching for guerrillas opened fire in the vicinity of his church, reportedly killing eight persons. According to some eyewitnesses, among those killed was Fr. Bastian. His body was never found and a government investigation reportedly failed to find evidence that security forces had killed him. At year's end, seven Sinhalese pilgrims travelling to a Catholic shrine in northwestern Sri Lanka were reportedly abducted by militants; their whereabouts remain unknown.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution guarantees that "no person shall be subjected to torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment," and in 1982 the Government submitted to the U.N. a unilateral declaration opposing the use of torture.

There have been persistent reports of torture or ill-treatment by military and police of persons detained under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. Amnesty International published a special report in October on torture in Sri Lanka. The report cites affidavits submitted by alleged victims, as well as statements by doctors who claim to have treated the victims and said that they were able to corroborate their allegations of ill-treatment. The Amnesty International report noted that torture victims are most often those detained for political offenses, either radical leftist Sinhalese or Tamils accused of collaborating with the separatists. The Government states that, because the alleged victims are not identified in the report, it is unable to respond to specific allegations of torture or to pursue inquiries into individual cases.

Amnesty International also alleged that ill-treatment of detainees usually occurs in military camps or police stations, but is rarely reported in prisons, where regular criminals are held. The Government has stated that no police officers have been convicted of causing physical harm to persons in police custody.

Prison conditions in Sri Lanka are not good, particularly in pretrial detention centers, many of which are old and overcrowded. In prisons for convicted prisoners, however, there is less overcrowding. The Government has begun construction of a new prison which is scheduled for completion in several years.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution stipulates that no person "shall be arrested except according to procedure established by law" and that an arrested person must be informed of the reason for his arrest. Within 24 hours, an arrested person must be brought before a magistrate who may authorize bail or, for serious crimes, continued detention. A suspect may be detained up to three months without bail, or longer if a court so rules. Persons convicted of criminal offenses may be sentenced to "rigorous imprisonment," (hard labor) under which they are compelled to work.

There are exceptions to the normal rules for a person detained under the emergency regulations or under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. Under the state of emergency, first declared in May 1983 and renewed monthly by Parliament since then, the President reissues each month the emergency regulations by gazette notification. The regulations give extraordinary powers to the police to use preventive detention on persons suspected of planning to commit offenses or to arrest individuals suspected of having committed a wide variety of crimes. Detainees under these emergency regulations can be held for up to 90 days on orders of the Attorney General, after which time the suspect must be produced before a magistrate. The magistrate is not empowered to investigate the case, but under the regulations he "shall" remand the detainee to a prison, where he can be held indefinitely. Bail may be granted at the discretion of the Government.

SRI LANKA

The Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA) provides that any person arrested under this law must be produced before a magistrate within three days unless the Minister of National Security orders the suspect to be detained for a period of three months. Such an order may be renewed for a period of up to 18 months. The terms of detention are set out in this order; detainees do not have the same rights as other prisoners regarding visits by family, access to lawyers, food, and other conditions of incarceration.

The PTA and emergency regulations were used extensively in 1985 to detain large numbers of persons, mostly Tamil youths, especially in the north and east. The Government has reported it arrested 1,878 persons under the PTA. Of those, 880 had been released at year's end. According to local human rights activists, there were 55 detainees, as of November, who had been held without charges under the PTA for more than the legally permissible 18 months. In five cases, the Government chose to redetain them under the emergency regulations. The others were to be released, but at year's end only 8 of the 50 had been released and 1 charged under the PTA; the other 41 remained in custody.

Several observers reported that a common practice of the security forces is to round up all young men between the ages of 16 and 35 within about a square mile radius of the site of a terrorist incident. Those detained under the PTA are questioned and some are released, while others are taken to detention facilities. Relatives may write to the Defense Ministry and ask that the case of their family member be reviewed. The review is conducted by a three-man advisory board which considers the evidence, interviews the police and the detainee, and makes a recommendation. Many of the cases reviewed have led to a recommendation for immediate release, but it frequently takes several months for the process of review and release to be completed.

The Constitution empowers the courts of appeal to issue writs of habeas corpus, and relatives of persons arrested under the PTA or the emergency regulations have brought several habeas corpus suits over the past few years. In no instance where the court inquired into the detention and disappearance while in police custody of a suspect detained under these measures have the results been publicly released.

There is no forced labor in Sri Lanka, other than for criminals sentenced to rigorous imprisonment.

SRI LANKA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Generally speaking, an accused person is entitled to a fair trial in open court, is represented by counsel of his choice, and is apprised of the charges and evidence against him. Accused persons tried in the high court are provided an attorney if they need one, but no attorney is provided by the Government for defendants tried in other courts.

Although trial by jury is the custom, juries are not provided in trials under the Prevention of Terrorism Act on the grounds that jury members could be intimidated. Although the PTA has been in effect since 1979, and hundreds of people arrested under its terms, there had been only three trials under the act by mid-1985. Of those detained under the PTA who have been released, the large majority were held for a period of months and then set free without charges ever having been brought. The most publicized case of the trial of a PTA detainee, which began in November 1984, involved Father Aparnam Singarayar, who was arrested in November 1982 and charged with two offenses in February 1983. His trial on the first charge, that of withholding information from the police in a bank robbery case, was still under way at the end of 1985.

The independence of the judiciary is constitutionally guaranteed. The Chief Justice and all judges of the Supreme Court, courts of appeal, and high courts are appointed by the President. The Chief Justice and two Supreme Court judges comprise a Judicial Service Commission which appoints, transfers, and dismisses all lower court judges.

The judicial system in the northern Jaffna Peninsula has virtually ceased functioning due to intimidation by the Tamil militants. For most of 1985, police in the area have not performed their normal law enforcement activities and judges have tried only a few cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government respects individual privacy and the sanctity of the family and the home, and the judiciary has a good record of upholding rights to privacy in those cases which reach a high court. Ordinarily, search and arrest warrants are required in order to enter private premises. Under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, however, police officers above a certain rank and less senior officers authorized by them in writing may, without a warrant, enter and search any premises and seize "any document or thing" when there is a presumption or evidence of support for, or involvement with, unlawful activity. Critics claim that police and military personnel often enter the homes of Tamils without cause.

Monitoring of telephones is not known to be a common practice, despite allegations by some critics of the Government that it taps their telephone lines.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees "freedom of speech and expression including publication," but it also permits these guarantees to be restricted "as may be prescribed by law in the interests of national security." Sri Lankans are generally free to express their views in private but may be prosecuted under the emergency regulations for making certain kinds of remarks in public. Press censorship was in effect for five months in 1985 on articles relating to terrorist activities, security operations, and communal matters. After formal censorship was ended on July 18, the Government asked the media to exercise restraint in publishing information on security-related subjects, and a measure of self-censorship was apparently practiced. In November, restrictions were placed on the publication of press reports on the activities of the Ceasefire Monitoring Committee.

The Government adopted on March 31 a more restrictive policy regarding issuance of press credentials to foreign correspondents. Sri Lankan diplomatic missions were authorized to review a correspondent's past reporting or that of his journal for fairness and accuracy before a visa and press credentials were issued. In practice, however, many foreign journalists entered the country in 1985 on tourist visas.

There also were some instances in 1985 in which individuals were prosecuted for their statements. A Canadian citizen of Sri Lankan descent, who was chairman of the citizens committee of the east coast town of Kalmunai, was charged in May with sedition for making certain statements, principally repeating to a foreign journalist a report he had given to the police about an alleged atrocity by the security forces. The Government accused him of relaying rumors and argued that it was irrelevant whether the rumors were true. One person, arrested after distributing leaflets at a demonstration by university students, was held for several days, then released.

Although the Government controls the country's largest newspaper chain and owns the radio and television services, a variety of independent newspapers and journals provide a full range of viewpoints on foreign policy and most domestic matters. Many small circulation periodicals published by opposition political parties operate in an unrestricted manner.

Academic freedom is generally respected. In January 1985, the Parliament passed a bill amending the Universities Act of 1978. The amendments, among other things, provided for more government control over the selection of the senior university administrators, the vice chancellors. Critics charged that the amendments undermined the country's system of free higher education and restricted academic freedom by unduly increasing government influence. There were several demonstrations, sometimes violent, against the amendments in February and March. The Government responded by closing several universities temporarily and arresting or forcibly dispersing protestors in some instances. The Government also temporarily extended press censorship to matters pertaining to postsecondary education.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees freedom of assembly and association and the right to form and join trade unions. Sri Lanka has an abundance of private associations, devoted to the promotion of business, professional, educational, religious, charitable, and humanitarian causes, which are free to maintain ties with international bodies. However, there are a few restrictions on free assembly and association. One leftist political party, the Janatha Vimukti Peramuna (JVP), has been proscribed since 1983. Under the emergency regulations, the President (or his designee) is empowered to prohibit public meetings which would be "likely to cause a disturbance to public order or promote disaffection."

In practice, the police issue permits for outdoor, public meetings or processions and special permission is required for use of a loudspeaker. The question of whether to issue a permit is left to the discretion of the superintendent or assistant superintendent of an area, who may refuse a permit if he anticipates a breach of peace; in 1985 the practice of issuing permits sometimes appeared inconsistent. For example, one group advocating a peaceful settlement to Sri Lanka's communal conflict had several requests for demonstration permits denied. In contrast, a group of political and religious leaders opposed to continuation of the peace talks with Tamils received a permit for a public meeting.

Worker rights are recognized and protected by law. Any seven workers may form a union, draw up their own procedures, elect their own representatives, and formulate programs. Workers are expressly granted the right to bargain collectively. When workers and employers are not able to resolve a dispute, there is an arbitration system which involves Labor Department officers. These officers are stationed throughout the country to assure that employers fulfill their legal and contractual obligations to workers and to be available for arbitration in minor local disputes.

Excepting public service employees, workers are free to strike in Sri Lanka and have done so frequently. Under the emergency regulations, the President may declare any business to be an essential service, making a strike illegal. During 1985, the Government used this power to terminate strikes or other job actions several times. In the case of public service employees as well as workers in "essential services," the Government generally agreed to discuss grievances with a labor representative. A group of the 8,000 workers who were fired during a strike in 1980 brought a complaint against the Government in 1983 before the International Labor Organization Committee on Freedom of Association. In its session of May-June 1985, the Committee urged the Sri Lankan Government to do its utmost to reinstate those workers who had been without employment since 1980 and to conclude as rapidly as possible the trials of five trade union leaders who had been charged in connection with the 1980 strike.

Over 1,000 labor unions and federations together represent about one-third of the 6.9 million-strong labor force. Workers in the nonplantation agricultural sector and most of those employed in small businesses, as well as workers in the free trade zone, are not represented by unions. Employees in the zone participate in labor-management company associations. Although there are a few independent unions, most of the largest worker organizations are affiliated with political parties, frequently operate as arms of those parties, and play a significant role in the political process. Since worker organizations' party affiliations are fixed, their memberships fluctuate depending on which is the governing party. Despite constraints arising from their political affiliations, Sri Lankan unions have been effective in improving conditions for workers. Many unions maintain ties with international labor federations and trade secretariats.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Constitution establishes Buddhism as the official religion and requires the Government "to protect and foster" Buddhism, it also guarantees the right of all Hindus, Muslims, and Christians to practice their religions freely. Most members of the majority Sinhalese ethnic group are Buddhists, while most Tamils are Hindu. There are Christians from both groups. Religious differences generally are not a basis for discrimination. Sri Lankans of every faith are free to maintain links with coreligionists in other countries, as well as to undertake religious travel.

Two cabinet ministers are assigned the additional portfolios of Minister of Muslim Affairs and Minister of Hindu Affairs to deal with issues involving those minority religions.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees every citizen "freedom of movement and of choosing his residence within Sri Lanka" and "freedom to return to Sri Lanka." These guarantees are generally honored. The present Government removed exit visa requirements imposed by its predecessor and now permits virtually unimpeded emigration and foreign travel. Many Sri Lankans have taken advantage of this policy to seek jobs abroad. According to some estimates, there were 180,000 Sri Lankans working abroad in 1985.

Some Sri Lankans, predominantly young male Tamils, have sought refugee status or political asylum abroad on the grounds that they are members of a persecuted minority. Despite the freedom to return cited in the Constitution, in 1985 there were a few cases of returning Tamils being arrested on arrival and detained for a period of days. Those detained either had traveled on forged passports or were suspected of narcotics offenses. The Government has said it does not take legal action or discriminate against those returning to Sri Lanka when their applications for asylum have been refused.

Refugees or displaced persons from other countries are generally denied entry to Sri Lanka. The Government does not permit refugees to stay in the country even while they are seeking permanent residence elsewhere.

Due to concern that Tamil terrorists were frequently crossing from southern India to northern Sri Lanka via the Palk Straits, the Government adopted a series of measures beginning in April 1984 which progressively restricted freedom of movement in that area. Expanding on the maritime surveillance zone imposed in April 1984, in November of that year the Government announced a prohibited zone along some 200 miles of Sri Lanka's northern coastline. It also imposed a security zone in the entire Jaffna Peninsula. These measures restricted free movement in the area to a considerable extent and made it virtually impossible for the large number of fishermen resident in that area to earn their livelihood. These restrictions as well as nightly curfews in the north were gradually relaxed during the late spring of 1985. The curfew was terminated in July, but the restrictive zones remain technically in effect under the emergency regulations.

As a result of these various restrictions as well as the threat or fear of becoming involved in the spreading communal violence, large numbers of Sri Lankans were displaced from their homes in 1985. According to some estimates, during the period 1983-1985 more than 100,000 Sri Lankan Tamils sought refuge in the Indian state of Tamil Nadu. The Government estimates that as of year's end some 46,000 persons were housed in refugee camps in Sri Lanka with another 94,000 having sought refuge elsewhere in the country (with friends or relatives). Of the total estimated 140,000 displaced persons, 88,000 are Tamils, 49,000 are Sinhalese, and the remainder Muslim. The continued unsettled security situation has made it difficult for these people to return to their homes.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Sri Lanka is an open, working, multiparty democracy. Citizens enjoy universal adult suffrage, and voter turnout is generally over 80 percent. Traditionally, the UNP and the other major political party, the Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP), both of which draw their following mainly from the Sinhalese majority community, have alternated in forming governments. The current UNP government came to power in the general elections of 1977, gaining 51 percent of the popular vote and 83 percent of the seats in Parliament. The UNP government formulated a new Constitution, adopted by Parliament in 1978, which established the office of a directly elected executive president and provided for a proportional representation system in future parliamentary general elections.

Jayewardene became the first President under the 1978 Constitution and was returned to office in the presidential election of October 1982, gaining 53 percent of the popular vote. General elections to Parliament due in 1983 were not held. Instead, citizens went to the polls in a referendum held in December 1982 to vote on a constitutional amendment to extend the term of the 1977 Parliament from 6 to 12 years. Restrictions were imposed on the activities of opposition parties during the referendum campaign, and some voting irregularities were reported. The amendment was approved with 54.5 percent of the votes and Parliament's term now runs until August 1989. UNP candidates have won most of the by-elections held since 1977, including the two held in 1985. President Jayewardene's United National Party now holds 140 out of 153 occupied seats in Sri Lanka's unicameral legislature.

Sri Lanka's political parties represent a variety of political views. Most opposition parties function freely, several operate their own newspapers, and the activities of their leaders are covered by the media. One party, however, the extreme leftist Janatha Vimukti Peramuna (JVP), has been proscribed since July 1983 for alleged involvement in communal riots during the last week of that month. In addition, the civic rights of the leader of the SLFP, Mrs. Sirimavo Bandaranaike, were suspended in 1980 for a period of seven years on the grounds that she exceeded her authority during her tenure as Prime Minister from 1970-77. Until her pardon on January 1, 1986, the suspension of her civic rights prevented her from serving in Parliament and campaigning on behalf of her party's candidates in elections.

SRI LANKA

Tamils, who comprise approximately 18 percent of the country's population, are primarily represented by two parties. The Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) claims to speak for the Ceylon Tamils resident in the north and east, and the Ceylon Workers Congress (CWC) represents the Indian Tamils. The President of the CWC serves as a minister in the present Government.

Indian Tamils, who make up about one-third of the country's Tamil population, are descended from Tamils brought from India in the 19th century to work on the plantations. They do not qualify for Indian citizenship under Indian law and were denied citizenship under Sri Lankan law at independence. Under a 1964 agreement between the governments of Sri Lanka and India to address the problem of 1 million "stateless" Indian Tamils, many were repatriated to India or granted Sri Lankan citizenship. When the agreement expired in 1981, there were an estimated 94,000 Indian Tamils, plus their offspring born since 1964, who remained "stateless." The Government estimates that the total number of stateless Indian Tamils is currently around 150,000 persons. The Sri Lankan Government has stated its intention to grant citizenship to those remaining stateless.

The Government is sensitive to adverse reports on its human rights situation but generally does not interfere with investigations. Senior government officials frequently make themselves available to visitors looking into human rights issues. There were several special reports on human rights in Sri Lanka in 1985.

A representative of the Human Rights Standing Committee of the Law Association for Asia and the Western Pacific (LAWASIA) visited Sri Lanka on a factfinding mission in February. The mission's report concluded that the situation had deteriorated since LAWASIA's last report in 1983 due to the escalating violence and the erosion of democracy and the rule of law. Also in February, two members of the British parliamentary human rights group visited Sri Lanka and concluded that "in the present situation human rights are being violated or infringed to a substantial extent."

The chairman of the Australian parliamentary amnesty group visited Sri Lanka in June and presented his findings, an update of his initial report of June 1984, to the Emergency Committee on Sri Lanka, an informal international group of human rights activists. He found the ethnic conflict to be "destroying the economy, violating human rights and undermining the progress of development programmes supported by many governments over many years." In October an Amnesty International newsletter included a special report on torture in Sri Lanka, based on affidavits and doctors' reports on the victims. The Government follows a practice of not responding to Amnesty International reports, which it says do not identify victims of alleged abuses and are based more on hearsay than hard information.

In its 1985 Report (covering the year 1984), Amnesty International expressed concern about reports of random killings of noncombatant Tamil civilians by members of the security forces; the detention of Tamils, members of left-wing opposition parties, and students under legislation permitting long-term detention without charge or trial; reports of widespread torture of detainees; and deaths in custody. Freedom House rated Sri Lanka "partly free."

The International Committee of the Red Cross has a branch in Colombo which has been active in rehabilitation projects. Several local nongovernmental organizations monitor human rights in Sri Lanka. They collect information from families of victims or members of citizens' committees near the site of alleged incidents. Their periodic reports and appeals for change, however, are generally not addressed by the Government. Some attorneys represent defendants pro bono in those human rights cases which reach the courts.

At the end of 1985, the Government was considering a proposal to establish a Civil/Human Rights Commission modeled on U.S. institutions which would be empowered to mediate grievances.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sri Lanka's population of 16,334,000 is growing at an annual rate of 1.8 percent. The high rates of growth (over 6 percent) in the gross national product (GNP) Sri Lanka enjoyed from 1978-81 have decelerated somewhat in recent years (5.2 percent in 1984). The balance of payments situation deteriorated in 1985 due to a fall in tourism, lower world prices for tea, and the economic and social disruptions caused by the island's continuing ethnic strife. Lower government revenues and greatly increased defense spending have produced a record budget deficit which is expected to fuel inflation and contribute to depreciation of the currency. Development expenditures may also be curtailed to reduce the deficit.

Under the current Government's market-oriented economic policies, the expansion of the private sector has been encouraged. Foreign investment has been welcomed but most has gone into the tourist and textile industries. Sri Lanka's rapidly growing textile exports now constitute its third leading earner of foreign exchange. Unemployment, chronically severe, was estimated at 11.7 percent in 1981, down from a postindependence high of 24 percent in the mid-1970's.

Agriculture, contributing nearly a quarter of GNP and employing almost half of all Sri Lankan workers, is the largest and most important of the country's economic sectors. Lowlands are farmed by smallholders raising rice, fruits, coconuts, and vegetables, while the central hill country produces tea, largely in government-owned estates, and rubber. In 1984 Sri Lanka was very nearly self-sufficient in rice and overall was a net agricultural exporter. However, lower tea prices and production difficulties in the government-owned estates hurt the agricultural sector in 1985.

The ambitious Mahaweli scheme, a series of modern dams and irrigation systems aimed at providing hydroelectric power and watering large tracts of underutilized arid land, has become a bone of contention in the current ethnic troubles. Some Tamils object to government settlement policies that are altering traditional local ethnic balances in newly irrigated areas. Militant Tamils have attacked Sinhalese settlers in some sections of the Mahaweli scheme.

SRI LANKA

Citizens have the right to acquire, hold, and dispose of property, but each individual may own only 1 house and no more than 50 acres. The Government permits noncitizen residents, except "stateless" Indian Tamils, to own property.

Sri Lanka's quality of life is higher than that of countries of equal income. Life expectancy at birth is 69.9 years. The infant mortality rate is 28.4 per 1,000 live births. The calorie supply as a percentage of requirements is 98.4 percent (1977) and in 1980 one of three Sri Lankans had access to safe water (65 percent urban, 18 percent rural). Although a majority of Sri Lankans are poor by developed country standards, there is virtually none of the starvation-level poverty experienced in some other developing countries. Sri Lanka's free public health care system is generally good by Third World standards, though it is frequently plagued by shortages of medicines and modern medical equipment. In 1983 there were 280 hospital beds and 13 doctors per 100,000 population.

Sri Lanka provides free education from primary school through university level. The primary school enrollment ratio is 102 (male 104, female 99). The overall adult literacy rate is 87 percent and is constituted as follows: males 91 percent, females 81 percent, rural 84 percent. Nearly 18,000 students (44 percent female) are enrolled in Sri Lanka's 8 universities.

Under Sri Lankan labor laws, employment of children under age 12 is prohibited. Those between age 12 and 14 are called child workers and may not be employed in industry or dangerous occupations; employment of young persons between 15 and 18 is subject to certain restrictions. Employees under age 18 cannot be required to work outside of specified hours. In addition, employers are required to provide annual leave, rest periods, and meal breaks. In practice, however, there is a child work force, probably numbering at least several thousand, who work illegally in Sri Lanka, mostly at jobs in rice cultivation, as domestics, or as street peddlers. Efforts to address this problem have been hampered by the fact that, in some cases, child workers are a major source of family income.

There is no minimum wage, but wage boards for 34 different trades set minimum wages and working conditions. Actual wages and working conditions generally exceed these minimums. Most permanent, full-time workers are covered by laws which provide that they shall work no more than 45 hours per week, no more than 9 hours per day or more than 5 1/2 days per week, and that they will receive a 14-day paid holiday annually. Workers in the unorganized agricultural sector are not covered by these or any labor laws, although the Government may investigate individual complaints.

Women have equal rights under the law, including equal property and inheritance rights. The various ethnic and religious groups have their own strictures, however, which place some limitations on women. Some Tamil families believe their women members should not be seen working in public. Some Muslim women are discouraged by members of their community from seeking higher education or employment. Some women fill important posts in the civil service, the professions, and business, but the majority are found in manual and semiskilled jobs and in the home. Women vote in large numbers but otherwise play a more limited role than men in the political process. There are currently six women members of Parliament, including one woman minister of cabinet rank. Sri Lanka had the world's first woman Prime Minister.

The caste system is reportedly breaking down among Buddhists, but it remains important when marriages are arranged, and it continues to be widely observed among Hindu Tamils. Members of virtually all of Sri Lanka's ethnic minorities occupy prominent positions in all walks of public and private life, but since independence the Sinhalese majority has steadily strengthened its relative position of influence in most sectors of society. The miniscule Veddah population in 1985 became even more thoroughly assimilated into larger Sri Lankan society. A number of hunting and gathering Veddah communities were provided with land on which to begin settled agriculture, and a few former hunters were offered jobs in national parks and reserves.

SYRIA

According to its Constitution, the Syrian Arab Republic is a representative democracy. In fact, Hafiz al-Asad, as President, Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, and Secretary General of the Syrian Ba'ath Party, wields virtually absolute power. During Asad's rule, the Ba'ath Party has functioned principally to legitimize his regime. The regime has not permitted other centers of governmental power, such as an independent legislature or judiciary, to develop. It has resorted to extreme brutality and forcible repression to ensure its survival, but it has also pursued a policy of providing for the basic economic and social needs of its people.

The Ba'ath Party, with its emphasis on socialism and secular Arabism, gained ascendancy in 1963 but has since that time been dominated by the military. Ba'athism has sought to overcome sectarian and class consciousness by building a sense of national rather than ethnic identity. Since Asad's accession to power in 1970, members of the minority Alawi Muslim sect, to which he belongs, have greatly improved their own economic well-being; historically, they were among Syria's poorest groups. At the same time, elements within the Sunni majority have suffered economically as the regime moved gradually to eliminate all major private industry.

Islamic fundamentalists in Syria oppose the secular emphasis of Ba'athism and Asad's Alawi background, and in 1979-1982 frequently resorted to terrorism. Violent resistance to the regime, however, largely came to a halt after the Government killed thousands in suppressing an insurrection by the Muslim Brotherhood, a banned, secret organization of Sunni Islamic fundamentalists, in Hama in 1982. The ferocity of that repression remains ever-present in the minds of the Syrian people and has apparently succeeded in discouraging antiregime activity. In January 1985, President Asad made a limited offer of amnesty to some Muslim Brotherhood exiles.

Syria officially has a Socialist economy. Although agricultural production and some small enterprises remain in private hands, an increasing proportion of agricultural processing and distribution and all large-scale industry have been placed in the hands of state enterprises.

During 1985, Syria continued to be ruled by a repressive dictatorship. There was popular participation in decisions concerning economic and social issues on a limited basis via the Ba'ath Party, unions, and other organizations controlled by the State or the party. However, while the more public forms of repression have diminished in the past 3 years, there have been no indications of a trend toward a more open political system or greater respect for the integrity of the person.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Political executions in Syria are typically a reaction to direct and violent threats to the regime; when the threats subside, the executions subside. Following the army's bloody suppression of an Islamic fundamentalist uprising in Hama in 1982, both antiregime terrorism and executions for political reasons have subsided. A few unconfirmed reports of political executions surfaced in the period 1983-85. Two bombs were set off in Damascus in July, and one in September 1985. A number of Palestinians were detained in the aftermath of these incidents, but it is not known if there have been any executions.

SYRIA

Syrian artillery devastated parts of the Lebanese city of Tripoli in September-October 1985. The attack was directed against an alliance of Islamic fundamentalists who fought to control the city with support from Palestinians opposed to Syria. This alliance may have included a number of Syrian Islamic fundamentalists who fled Hama in 1982.

Syria provides sanctuary and support to Arab terrorist groups such as Abu Nidal. Anti-Turkish Armenian terrorist groups are also thought to operate in Syria. Syria continues to permit Iran to support Lebanon-based terrorist groups in Syrian-controlled parts of Lebanon.

b. Disappearance

According to plausible reports, some Syrians arrested for security reasons are never heard from again; families are not notified, nor are detainees allowed to contact their next of kin. It is possible that many of these people are dead. Disappearances reached a high point in 1979-82 and dropped considerably in 1983-85.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although the penal code prohibits torture and establishes severe penalties for such practices, there have been numerous credible reports of torture, primarily during arrest and interrogation. There are no reports of punishment of security or police officials for acts of torture, however. According to Amnesty International's 1985 Report, use of torture by the Syrian security forces is routine.

Little detailed information is available about prison conditions. No international organizations, such as the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), are allowed access to detention facilities. The ICRC has, however, visited such special category detainees as the U.S. airman captured in December 1983 and Israeli prisoners-of-war. Persons charged with or convicted of criminal offenses are held separately from those charged with political and security offenses. Health care, food, and access by family members for persons held in ordinary prisons are reported to be adequate. Conditions at prisons where political and security prisoners are held are reported to be more severe, and visits by family members are not allowed.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The civilian legal code, modeled after French law, provides for due process, although it permits indefinite pretrial detention during the investigative process. Under the state of emergency in force since 1963, these safeguards can be suspended, and an individual may be held indefinitely without charge or trial, especially in political and security cases.

SYRIA

The number of people currently held without trial or charge is not known but is probably significant. Approximately 20 Ba'ath party and government officials of the previous regime have been under detention since 1970. According to unconfirmed press accounts, possibly as many as 150 military officers were arrested in January 1982 in connection with an alleged coup plot, and several dozen more in 1983 for questioning government policies. In 1984, however, a power struggle between the President's brother, Rif'at al-Asad, and several military and security force commanders did not lead to sweeping arrests or detentions, nor have scattered bombings and other acts of terror and sabotage in Syria in 1985 led to such a result.

There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Criminal cases with no political implications are conducted according to a French-based legal code. The defendant is detained provisionally upon the accusation of the public prosecutor, then remanded to a judge of arraignment, who may either free him on the basis of insufficient evidence or refer the case to a criminal court. Defendants are entitled to legal representation of their choice; if they cannot afford an attorney, the court appoints and pays for a lawyer. Civilian courts impose no restrictions on lawyers in representing clients and allow the right of appeal. In noncontroversial criminal cases, the civilian courts are typically free from governmental interference; nevertheless, pressure from the party, state security forces, or other special units affects the course of the trials or the verdicts if there is high-level interest in a case.

Persons charged with security or political offenses fall under the jurisdiction of the military courts or the state security court. Arrests are made secretly and with no legal safeguards. The accused cannot be contacted by family or friends, who most often do not know the place of detention. The accused has no right to a judicial determination of the basis for pretrial detention, no redress for false arrest, and no say in the selection of a lawyer, who is chosen by the court. All court sessions are closed, and there are no official channels for obtaining information on the trial or sentencing, though relatives with influence in the Government may ultimately succeed in obtaining reliable information and even effecting the release of the accused.

The Government does not disseminate information on the number of persons detained without a fair trial for political or security offenses, and it is impossible to make an accurate estimate. Relatives of persons arrested by security forces have no way to publicize their cases and would be, in any case, too intimidated to do so.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Electronic surveillance is believed to be widespread. Intelligence organizations maintain a network of guards to protect officials and important buildings, as well as to monitor the activity of people living in those neighborhoods.

The presence of police and security officials is pervasive, especially in Damascus. The postal system censors the mail but does not check every letter or package. Although the legal system provides safeguards, including a requirement of arrest and search warrant before police are allowed to enter private homes, regulations under the state of emergency currently in effect suspend these safeguards in security-related cases.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Public criticism of the Government, the Ba'ath Party, or related institutions is not permitted. The broadcast media and publishing houses are wholly owned and operated by the Government or the Ba'ath Party and usually give only the official views on important issues. The very occasional criticism of governmental bodies or operations is sanctioned criticism directed at administrative failings. Officials above the middle ranks are rarely criticized.

Imported foreign printed matter and films generally are not censored, although articles are occasionally deleted from magazines and newspapers before distribution. This news material, along with fictional and nonfictional literature on the Middle East, is banned if considered critical of Syria. Control is much stricter on materials in Arabic. Censorship is exercised through offices in the ministries of Information and of Culture and National Guidance. During the November 1983 assault by Syrian-supported Palestinian organizations against pro-Arafat Palestinian forces in Tripoli, television news from neighboring Jordan was jammed, and Beirut periodicals were often withheld from the market. Even the publications of several Syrian-supported Palestinian organizations were suppressed during the war against the Palestinian camps in Beirut in May and June 1985.

Aside from a few church-run, private primary and secondary schools that are carefully inspected and follow the Education Ministry curriculum, schools at all levels are government-operated. Teachers are not permitted to express ideas contrary to government policy, although there is more openness of expression at the university level.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings, assemblies, or demonstrations can be held only with official acquiescence and usually at the instigation of the Government or the Ba'ath Party. Private societies are allowed to meet if they have received governmental permission to organize. These are limited to nonpolitical activities, including religious groups.

Professional organizations and labor unions function as parts of the government apparatus and are primarily used to transmit instructions and information from the Syrian leadership to their members. Unofficially, the unions also function as a means to keep the leadership informed of grievances and concerns at the grass roots level. Strikes are forbidden by law.

In response to observations by the International Labor Organization (ILO), the Syrian Government is reported to have made efforts to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize. In its 1985 report, however, the ILO's

Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations stated that it hoped the Government would soon be in a position to report real progress in both its legislation and the application of the convention.

Membership in the Ba'ath Party is politically expedient but not forced; indeed, membership is achieved only through recommendation and invitation. There are a significant number of senior government officials who are not members of the party or whose membership is only honorary.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although Syria is predominantly Muslim, the Constitution does not espouse a state religion. As a concession to Islamic fundamentalists, who object to Ba'athi secularism, the present regime wrote into the Constitution the requirement that the president be Muslim, but otherwise there is no official advantage given to one religion over another. Sunni Arabs constitute over two-thirds of the populace. Many key positions in the Government, however, are controlled by members of the minority Alawi sect (10-12 percent of the population), which some Islamic fundamentalists do not accept as Muslim.

Ba'athi ideology and modernizing influences have had some impact in diminishing the primacy of religion and ethnicity, but an individual Syrian continues to be defined by his communal background. In this communally divided society, prejudice is virtually a way of life, though less so now than in the past. Non-Alawi minority groups do enjoy freedom to practice their religions. While members of non-Alawi minorities, as well as the Sunni majority, cannot usually aspire to more than marginal political power, every minority has members who prosper economically, and no minority can be said to be economically oppressed as a class. Proselytizing is discouraged. In an exception to the general official policy of religious tolerance, Seventh Day Adventists are forbidden by law to practice their religion, and all Adventist church property has been confiscated.

The 3,000-4,000 Jews are free to practice their religion. The situation of the Jewish community has improved in recent years, despite continuing uncertainty over the community's future, and today it enjoys a relatively good standard of living, access to higher education, and entrance into the professions. Jews are subject to restrictions on foreign travel, however, and, unlike other Syrian communal groups, the passports and identity cards of Jewish citizens contain a notation that the holder is Jewish. Given the officially proclaimed state of war with Israel, direct contact between Syrian Jews and Jews in Israel is not possible. There are unconfirmed reports that Jews are not permitted to hold government jobs, and, as in the cases of other small minority groups in Syria, no Jews are known to hold senior government or party office. Jews cannot serve in the military and, upon receiving degrees in technical fields, are not required to undertake 5 years of obligatory public service.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal travel is unrestricted except in the security zone of the Golan and close to the borders with Lebanon, Jordan, and Iraq. All citizens wishing to travel abroad must obtain passports and exit visas. In theory, any Syrian can be required to post a bond which would be forfeited in case of nonreturn. Syrian Jews, however, are the only travelers routinely required to post such a bond, which varies from $250 to $10,000 (recently the required bonds have been toward the lower end of the scale), depending on the person's position in the community and economic circumstances. In recent years, Jews have found it somewhat easier to travel overseas, although an official ban on their emigration has continued. The Government continues its policy of not issuing passports to all members of a Jewish family at the same time, although there have been some recent exceptions.

The Government generally forbids foreign travel for certain categories of citizens, e.g., persons liable for military service, and pharmacists, architects, and engineers trained in Syria at public expense who have not yet completed a 5-year government service obligation. Those who attempt to travel illegally are subject to fines and detention. Frequent exceptions are granted for students who receive permission from the Foreign Ministry to continue higher studies abroad. Emigration is not discouraged for groups other than those mentioned above.

There are no formal restrictions on the repatriation of Syrian citizens, although political opponents of the regime are arrested if they return. There have been no reports of revocation of citizenship. The Government does not recognize renunciation of citizenship or the acquisition of another nationality.

There is a Palestinian community of over 240,000, predominantly refugees from the 1948 and 1967 Arab-Israeli wars. Several thousand Lebanese and Palestinians entered Syria in 1982, fleeing Israel's invasion of Lebanon. Many participate fully in the Syrian economy, although Palestinians claim that procedures for the purchase of real property are cumbersome and they are allowed to own only one building or plot of land.

Palestinians are free to choose their place of residence and occupation, and they occupy several senior positions in the Syrian bureaucracy. They are issued special Palestinian travel documents by the Government in lieu of Syrian passports. They may not acquire citizenship or vote in Syrian elections.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Power in Syria resides with a single individual, President Asad. He and other members of the Alawi Muslim sect control many of the key positions in the Government, the Ba'ath Party, and the military and security forces. Popular participation in the political process is severely restricted. The Constitution stipulates that the Ba'ath Party is the leading political organization. Several other parties are permitted by law, but they exercise little power. There is no legal party in active opposition to the Government. All legal parties participate in the Progressive National Front, a mechanism which in theory is the highest political organization. Several political groupings are illegal, including the Syrian Socialist National Party, which was banned in the 1950's after carrying out a series of assassinations against government officials. It is now regaining favor with the regime. Also illegal are the Communist Party Political Bureau and the Party for Communist Action.

SYRIA

President Asad was reelected to a third seven-year term in March 1985. He was unopposed in a referendum in which, according to government claims, over 99 percent of the eligible electorate participated and returned the President to office by a vote of over 99 percent.

Candidates for Parliament--which has no power independent of the will of the President--are selected by the ruling Ba'ath Party and, in theory, by four other parties which comprise the Progressive National Front. Personal loyalty to the regime and the President is a necessary qualification. Opposition lists of independents are offered but rarely prevail, probably because of the Front's far greater resources and organization and because of restrictions on freedom of expression. No independents were elected in the most recent elections in 1981.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government reacts to charges of human rights violations either by claiming that such charges are an intrusion in its internal affairs or by ignoring the charges altogether. The only internal group monitoring human rights ceased to exist in practical terms after some of its officers were arrested in April 1980. The last visit by Amnesty International delegates took place in March 1978; its periodic inquiries since then have received no response. The 1985 Amnesty International Report expressed concern over the imprisonment of over 260 prisoners of conscience, wide powers used by the security forces to arrest and detain thousands of political prisoners, long-term detention without trial, the routine use of torture by security forces, disappearances, extrajudicial executions, and the death penalty. Freedom House calls Syria "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Syria's population is over 10 million and is growing at a rate of 3.7 percent annually. Per capita gross national product was $1,760 in 1983. Syria under Hafiz al-Asad officially has a Socialist economy. Although agricultural production and some small enterprise remain in private hands, an increasing proportion of agricultural processing and distribution and all large-scale industry have been placed in the hands of state enterprises. Petroleum extraction has been a primary source of foreign exchange in recent years, although declining production and greater local consumption have begun to erode the contribution oil exports have made to Syria's balance of trade. Prices, wages, rents, imports, exports, and exchange rates are heavily regulated. Nationalization remains a threat for any private investor who grows too big or successful. Personal and corporate income taxes are very high.

In recent years, most wealth has accrued to a new class of government officials, particularly the military, and those with connections to them. Syria's traditionally very dynamic entrepreneurial class has been deprived of most legitimate investment opportunities. Many individuals continue to maintain a comfortable existence, however, primarily through their contacts in the Government and (illegal) investment abroad.

At the same time that the Syrian Government tolerates widespread inefficiency and corruption, it has implemented extensive economic development programs of benefit to Syria's less-privileged classes. Land redistribution and infrastructure development (roads, electricity, water, telephones, radio and television, health, education, and agricultural extension service) have improved the quality of life for the poor throughout Syria.

The economy is not operating efficiently in the straitjacket of government controls, the balance of payments is in chronic crisis, and Syria has come to rely heavily on foreign aid and remittances to finance essential imports.

Life expectancy at birth is 67.3 years, and the declining infant mortality rate is 52.1 deaths per 1,000 live births. Both figures reflect the priority the Government has placed on improving health care and extending delivery systems in rural areas. According to 1980 statistics, 71 percent of Syria's population had access to safe drinking water, 98 percent in urban areas and 54 percent in rural areas. Caloric supply exceeds requirements. Virtually all urban areas are now electrified, and considerable progress has been made in rural parts of the country. Primary school education is compulsory for both male and female children until the age of 13.

Syrian labor statutes provide for comprehensive working standards. The minimum age in the predominant public sector is 18. In the private sector it is more variable: the absolute minimum age in the private sector is 12, while parental permission is required for children to work below the age of 16. The Labor Ministry has an enforcement mechanism, but the number of labor investigators is small, and violations of minimum-age laws may be extensive. Labor statutes provide for a 48-hour work week (six 8-hour days), though in certain fields in which workers are not continuously busy a 9-hour day is permitted. In actual practice, government employees rarely put in more than a 5-to-6 hour day. The statutes also stipulate a full 24-hour rest day per week and a minimum of 1 hour of rest per day; 14 days per year of annual leave (which rises to 21 days per year after 10 years' service); 70 percent of wages during the first 90 days of illness, then 80 percent for the next 90 days; and overtime pay (25 percent for daytime overtime, 50 percent for night, 100 percent for holiday). Employers are required to provide limited medical care, and if there are more than 100 employees, a nurse must be hired and the service of a physician provided as necessary. Minimum wages are prescribed in all sectors. Typically, a government employee earns no more than $150-200 per month. However, many of them have second jobs. Rent controls and price subsidies allow such employees to enjoy a moderately comfortable existence despite nominally low wages.

The equality of women is guaranteed by the Constitution. Women participate extensively in the work force, particularly in Damascus, and the women's union works to expand the participation of women in all sectors of society, utilizing the media and a network of chapters throughout Syria to convey its message. At the same time, traditional religious law continues to apply in matters of personal status. Particularly among the majority Muslim population, this continues to limit women's rights in matters such as marriage, divorce, and inheritance.

TUNISIA

Tunisia, an Arab state in North Africa, is presided over by Habib Bourguiba, President for Life, who celebrated his 83rd birthday in 1985. A parliamentary republic since 1956, Tunisia has a Constitution which contains guarantees of basic human rights. The political system is dominated by the ruling Destourian (Constitutional) Socialist Party (PSD). Three opposition parties are legally recognized. The religiously oriented Islamic Tendency Movement, although not among these, is tolerated by the Government, as are two or three small opposition organizations.

A visible security apparatus which carries out random identity checks is maintained by the Government, partly as a result of security dictates due to the presence of the Arab League and Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) headquarters in Tunis, but also in response to terrorist acts attributable to the Libyan Government.

Despite a bumper grain harvest and improved tourist and export receipts, soft petroleum and phosphate prices and the Libyan expulsion of some 31,000 Tunisian workers and dependents combined to limit growth in 1985. Per capita gross domestic product for 1985 is estimated at $1,117, among the highest in Africa.

The past year saw a slight improvement in Tunisia's human rights situation over 1984, which had been marred by the Government's reaction to the bread riots in January 1984. The key political events of 1985 which had a bearing on human rights were the municipal elections, boycotted by the opposition, in May; the dramatic deterioration of relations between Tunisia and Libya following Libya's decision to expel the Tunisian workers, leading to the severing of diplomatic ties at the end of September, as well as increased measures by security forces as the Government sought to counter possible Libyan subversion; and pressures on the main trade union movement. The Israeli raid on the headquarters of the PLO on October 1 led to tension throughout the country, especially in the Tunisian Jewish community. Tension between labor and government has posed problems, and continuing poor relations with Libya may bring further security measures. The upcoming legislative elections in November 1986 will also be an important focal point for Tunisian concerns.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1985. There was, however, a letter-bomb campaign in Tunis in September, perpetrated by the Qadhafi regime, which resulted in one person seriously wounded and contributed to a break in diplomatic relations.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1985.

TUNISIA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is reliable evidence that physical and psychological abuse of prisoners occasionally occurs. Isolated cases of police brutality are reported by the Arabic-language press and in communiqués released by the Tunisian League of Human Rights, an independent group with branches throughout the country. There were no confirmed examples of officially ordered or approved torture in 1985. In September the Paris-based Association for the Defense of Human Rights and Democratic Liberties in the Arab World placed Tunisia on a list of countries facing allegations of torture. Conditions in Tunisian detention centers and prisons are poor and in some instances injurious to health. In 1985 there were numerous reports that civil prisons had become overcrowded and seriously undersupervised.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests of individuals opposing the Government do occur, most frequently on charges of illegal political activity. Those expressing extreme Islamic viewpoints are reported to bear the brunt of arbitrary or secret detention, although those with leftist, Pan-Arabist, or pro-Libyan views are also arrested. These persons are often subjected to long periods of preventive detention without ever coming to trial and have been known to be arrested and released several times without being charged.

There is no legal limit on preventive detention but in July a new initiative was announced by the Tunisian League of Human Rights which apparently was being considered by the Government. The plan would limit initial incommunicado holding of a detainee to a period of 4 days with the possibility of a single 4-day extension. After each period the prisoner would have a medical examination. The proposed law would limit preventive detention to 6 months for misdemeanors and 1 year for felonies. No indication has been given as to whether the plan will be signed into law, but on November 1 the Prime Minister announced before Parliament that a law setting limitations to these practices would be introduced.

In 1981 Tunisia was criticized by the International Labor Organization (ILO) for its forced labor policies in prisons. While Tunisia continues to use forced labor as a sentence, it reportedly resolved ILO concerns on this issue in 1983 in a comprehensive report. The ILO has continued to urge Tunisia to bring its legislation on rehabilitation work and civic service into conformity with the Convention on Forced Labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

No secret trials were held in 1985, and there were no cases of trials in special security courts. In all cases, defendants had access to legal counsel. The judiciary is relatively free of government interference, but in the spring the Government suppressed Tunisia's Young Magistrates Association. Although the dispute was primarily over salaries and working conditions, the Association's demands also included greater judicial independence from the Government. The harsh government response demonstrated its unwillingness to tolerate opposition from within the judiciary.

TUNISIA

The Government has claimed that all untried political prisoners have been released, but continued releases and rearrests of Islamic fundamentalists and trade union members make actual numbers difficult to determine.

Certain prominent politicians and others remain abroad to avoid trial or detention.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The privacy of the individual and of the home are generally respected. However, the security police sometimes secure blanket rather than specific judicial authorization for the arrest of individuals suspected of activities posing a security threat. Isolated instances of the monitoring of correspondence and telephones are reported.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Tunisian citizens feel free to criticize the Government in private and, in more restrained terms, in public, but personal criticism of President Bourguiba is not allowed. This is also true for the press, which is diverse and lively in its commentary on Tunisian politics and society. A large segment of the press is privately owned.

Tunisian law requires that the first printed copy of each edition of every national news publication be submitted to a censorship authority. This body has the power to censor (either partially or completely) any publication it receives. In some cases the Government will take the further step of bringing charges against the editor or publisher. During 1985, the Government suspended publication or seized issues of at least eight publications; two independent publications failed due to financial losses during their suspension. The normal period of suspension is 3 to 6 months but depends upon the offending topic and varies with individual publications. One paper was suspended for a year for printing a harshly worded article criticizing Syria's President Assad. The opposition weekly Al Mostaqbal was banned for 6 months in December 1984 for an editorial criticizing the Government's lack of response to the burning of some regional opposition headquarters and accusing some governors of complicity.

The Tunisian General Trade Union Federation's daily newspaper Achaab was banned for 6 months in July for an article which the Government said attacked the dignity of certain governors. In February the Government rescinded its 6-month suspension of the independent weekly Realites for an interview with an exiled Tunisian politician. On at least three occasions the Government seized issues of domestic publications. In addition, one foreign news publication, Jeune Afrique, was banned from October 1984 to January 1985. The Government and the Destourian Socialist Party also pressured would-be advertisers to discourage placement of advertisements in opposition publications. In early November five journalists were arrested in connection with a confrontation between the Government and the Tunisian General Trade Union Federation (UGTT). They were released shortly thereafter and all charges against them were dropped.

TUNISIA

Academic freedom is fully respected, and scholarly research is not subject to interference. However, dissent is muted by the fact that faculty salaries are paid by the Government. Islamic and leftist student groups are tolerated but are not officially recognized.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but government permission must be obtained to hold political meetings. Recognized political parties met throughout the year. In early 1985, before the municipal elections, there were some incidents in which unknown persons broke up opposition rallies, usually outside Tunis, and some regional local opposition political party headquarters were burned. Ruling party activists were suspected of being responsible, although ruling party officials say these actions are not condoned. No charges have been brought, but the Government has expressed concern.

During 1985 members of the opposition Socialist Progressive Movement (MSP), the Islamic Tendency Movement, the Islamic Liberation Party, and the Tunisian Communist Party were detained on charges of illegal political assembly. Fourteen members of the MSP went to court on November 27 only to have their trial immediately postponed to July 1986. Members of the Islamic Tendency Movement were released in early October without standing trial. Islamic Liberation Party members are awaiting appeal.

The right to organize a union and to strike is guaranteed by the Tunisian Constitution. All workers have a right to affiliate with a union. These constitutional guarantees have contributed to the development of a large free trade union movement in Tunisia--one of the most important free trade union movements in the Arab world. The Tunisian General Trade Union Federation (UGTT) is the largest labor body, with about 300-350,000 members. A second federation, the National Federation of Tunisian Workers, was formed in 1984 by dissidents from the UGTT. The Labor Code also protects the right of collective bargaining. Collective conventions are negotiated between the Government, employers, and workers to establish wage rates in all industrial sectors. All major wage contracts are negotiated with the participation of representatives from these three groups.

The Government imposed a public sector wage freeze in 1984 and 1985. The UGTT strongly opposed this policy and salary negotiations remained at an impasse, adding to internal social tensions. To combat these tensions the Government has followed a carrot and stick approach, alternately negotiating and settling with some unions and then, where strikes were still threatened, imposing temporary restrictions on specific union activity. Current restrictions include a ban on workplace meetings and a suspension of dues checkoff privileges for public sector employees. The period of rising tensions over Libya's expulsion of Tunisian workers further exacerbated government-UGTT relations when the labor union refused to halt strikes for 90 days in support of the Government. In reaction, the Government launched a media campaign to discredit the UGTT Secretary General and called on ruling party members within the union to take over the leadership of all UGTT locals.

TUNISIA

Apparently in an effort to forestall strikes at a time of increased tension with Libya, to force the union to yield on its call for wage hikes not tied to increased productivity, and to force the ouster of UGTT Secretary General Habib Achour, Tunisian security forces on October 31 occupied major trade union offices in Tunis and elsewhere throughout the country and arrested trade union members. Subsequent strikes in Gafsa, Gabes, and Sfax led to confrontations with the police. On November 10 Achour was placed under de facto house arrest. No court order accompanied the action. While many of the union officials and members who had been detained were released, police rounded up 30-40 Islamic leaders on the university campus and sent them to perform their required 1 year military service with the Saharan Development Brigade.

In a communique issued on December 5, Labor Minister Noureddine Hached and the UGTT Executive Board agreed that the position of the trade union would be normalized under the supervision of the UGTT Executive Board, that those union members who had continued under detention would be released, that those expelled from work for union activities would be reinstated, and that government-UGTT negotiations would resume. On the same day, the press reported that Achour had been fired as UGTT Secretary General and that Sadok Allouche had been elected to succeed him. After 7 weeks of house arrest Achour was convicted on January 1 of usurping union authority at a cooperative in Sfax and sentenced to 1 year in prison. At year's end, it was estimated that between 20 and 25 trade unionists were still in jail.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although Islam is the state religion, the Constitution guarantees religious freedom. Proselytizing for religions other than Islam is prohibited. There is no religious discrimination in private commerce and employment, although government employment is generally reserved for Muslims. The Jewish community worships freely and maintains indigenous organizations with official protection. Synagogues and Jewish-owned shops have been subject, however, to attack during periods of tension. In one incident two Jews and one Muslim policeman were killed when a second policeman guarding a synagogue on the island of Djerba opened fire on passersby. Throughout the tense aftermath of the Israeli raid October 1 on PLO headquarters outside Tunis, the Government took extraordinary measures to protect the Jewish community. Expatriate Christians freely attend church services. Under an agreement between the Vatican and the Tunisian Government, several Roman Catholic orders remain active. The Bahai's have been given government protection in the past but in November 1984 the Government ordered them to cease all religious gatherings. Since that time the community has not been the object of any further restrictions, although the ban on its religious gatherings is still in effect.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Free movement within Tunisia is allowed although citizens must carry identity cards. Passports for foreign travel are easily available but may be withheld if an individual is suspected of clandestine links to a foreign government. There is no restriction on emigration or repatriation.

TUNISIA

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

High government office is effectively restricted to members of the Destourian Socialist Party (PSD).

The municipal elections of May 1985 were boycotted by the legally recognized opposition parties which claimed that there were no guarantees for proper democratic elections. Although tolerated, Islamic fundamentalist political groups have not been allowed to be active politically, except to some extent on university campuses. Regional actions against opposition groups did occur before the elections although not apparently under direct orders from the PSD in Tunis. In March a gang violently broke up a meeting of the opposition Democratic Socialist Movement in Sbeitla and in April an opposition headquarters was burned in Le Kef.

Voters were presented with a slate consisting solely of PSD candidates but had the possibility of returning blank ballots. The high official figures of voter participation (92.03 percent) do not tally with firsthand accounts of events at the polls.

The Government reportedly issued an order that one-third of the candidates for the municipal elections should be women. This directive was largely met and large numbers of women were elected to municipal councils (although only two women were elected mayor).

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Tunisian League of Human Rights has met repeatedly with the highest government officials to discuss arrest and detention procedures. The League publishes a bulletin which details reported human rights abuses. It holds national meetings without hindrance. Tunisia also has shown a willingness to speak out to criticize human rights abuses in other countries and has forcefully condemned terrorism regardless of motivation or origin. Efforts to get government permission to set up a local chapter of Amnesty International (to report only on human rights violations in other countries) met, however, with silence and were eventually abandoned. In the section of its 1985 report dealing with Tunisia, Amnesty International noted its concern about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience; the torture and ill-treatment of prisoners; and the death penalty. Freedom House calls Tunisia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Tunisia's population of 7,259,000 is growing at an annual rate of 2.3 percent. Per capita gross domestic product is $1,117. There are, however, regional disparities and pockets of severe poverty.

Tunisia's resources continue to be heavily devoted to education and to economic and social development. As a result of the Government's commitment to mass education for both sexes, the population is increasingly well-educated. School enrollment ratios are high: 109.01 per cent of the eligible age groups in 1982 were enrolled in primary school. Women have equal access to education by law and approximately 40 percent of the primary/secondary school enrollment is female. Adult literacy in 1985 was 62 percent.

Life expectancy is about 62 years and according to the World Bank infant mortality is 52.6 per 1,000 live births. The Government has an active program of family planning and birth control. The percentage of population with access to safe water in 1982 was 97 per cent for urban areas and 25 per cent in rural areas. Caloric supply as a percent of basic requirements is 116 percent.

Shortly after independence, Tunisia adopted an enlightened labor code which provided for standards of work, hours of work, and a minimum wage. These conditions apply directly to some 60 percent of the labor force who work in government jobs, parastatal companies, and in professions such as teaching. Another 20 percent of the labor force who work in agriculture and the private sector are indirectly affected by these provisions. About 20 percent of the work force, principally domestics and migrant agricultural labor, are not covered by the labor code.

The base minimum wage in the industrial sector is 96 Tunisian dinars (TD) (approximately $125) for a 40-hour week. In agriculture the base minimum wage is 76 TD (approximately $100) per week, although this only directly applies to some 3 percent of the agricultural work force. Employees who are covered under the minimum wage also by law receive other benefits including social security, disability and health insurance, transportation and family allowances, and paid leave. The normal workweek is either 40 or 48 hours. The labor code also requires employers to pay overtime, a night work differential, and holiday pay. In the major urban areas a minimum wage employee with a family of four will net between 120-150 TD (approximately $160-$200) per month when allowances (nontaxable) are included. Child labor is prohibited prior to 16 years of age. Moreover, these provisions are widely enforced through an oversight program directed by the Labor Ministry.

The Tunisian Ministry of Social Affairs has established a health and safety office to improve health and safety standards in the workplace. In many hazardous jobs--e.g. mining, petroleum engineering, and construction--the Government has established new safety regulations and is enforcing more safety precautions.

Legal equality between men and women is vigorously supported by the Government. Equal rights in the areas of divorce and child custody are, for example, guaranteed by legislation. A small number of women serve in the Government at all levels; for example there are 2 women cabinet ministers out of 26, there are at least 5 women jurists who have direct impact on cases they hear or review, and there are 7 women in the 132-member Chamber of Deputies. Nevertheless, the centralized nature of decisionmaking generally limits the influence of women at the national level. Despite the Government's efforts, traditional practices in many cases keep women, especially in the rural areas, from full attainment of their legal rights.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is a federation, formed in 1971, of seven autonomous emirates. The Provisional Constitution, adopted at independence and renewed in 1976, makes the Supreme Council, composed of the rulers of the seven constituent emirates, the country's highest legislative and executive authority. From its membership, the Supreme Council elects a president and vice president. The president appoints a prime minister and a cabinet. A Federal National Council of 40 members, each appointed by the ruler of the emirate he represents, advises the federal government on legislation and reviews government operations. Its recommendations, although not binding, receive serious government consideration.

By constitutional provision, and by the force of tradition, the individual emirates retain extensive powers over such vital issues as economic policy (including petroleum policy), internal security, and even defense. Their rulers' legitimacy is based on long-standing traditions of tribal leadership. The rulers spend most of their time on emirate matters, and seldom meet as a federal Supreme Council.

The economy is based almost entirely on oil production, which has made the national per capita income one of the world's highest. A small citizen population, estimated at 200,000-300,000, controls the country's economic life but depends heavily on a much larger contingent of foreigners, estimated at approximately 1 million, to provide most of the manual labor and technical skills to sustain the economy. In recent years, economic recession, a consequence of the slack world oil market, has brought cutbacks in the number of foreign workers and greater government vigilance about immigration and labor regulations.

There was no appreciable change in the human rights situation in 1985. Increasing tensions in the Iran-Iraq war raised the UAE's level of security preparedness, but without precipitating terrorist incidents or significant security-related restrictions on personal freedoms. The ruling families and their close allies continued to dominate political life and to play a major role in its economic and commercial life. There was no discernible movement to expand the powers of the Federal National Council or to extend political participation beyond the ruling circles.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No political killings were reported during 1985.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances were reported in 1985.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Provisional Constitution prohibits torture or degrading treatment of any person, and the physical or moral abuse of an accused person. No instances of torture were reported in 1985. Prison conditions, including diet and medical facilities, are adequate. Prisoners are permitted visits from family members, friends, and lawyers. Consular access to imprisoned foreign nationals is permitted, although it is sometimes slow to be approved. There is no evidence that the authorities allow mistreatment of prisoners.

There were no instances in 1985 of the amputation of a hand for theft or a stoning for adultery under the system of Shari'a law which is an integral part of the judicial system. There have been instances of public caning for consumption of alcohol. A sentence of stoning for adultery, imposed on a married Muslim male who confessed his guilt, was overturned when the man denied guilt on a retrial ordered by the ruler of the emirate in which the case was heard.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Provisional Constitution prohibits arrest, search, detention, or imprisonment except in accordance with the law, and the laws of each emirate prohibit arrest or search without probable cause. Prolonged detention without charge is rare, although instances have been reported, especially in national security cases. One known case of arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention, first reported in 1984, was resolved in 1985 with the release, without charge, and deportation of the person detained. By law, the police must report any arrest to a judge within 48 hours for his determination whether to charge, release, or, with sufficient police justification, allow limited further detention of the person as the police continue their investigation. Once charged, suspects come to trial expeditiously. In 1985, there were no reported instances of preventive detention. Forced labor is not practiced. The Provisional Constitution prohibits the exile of citizens.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The UAE has a dual system of Shari'a courts and Western-type courts, both of which deal with both criminal and civil cases from first instance through a multilevel appeal process. The determination of which court system hears a particular case can depend on the choice of the plaintiff or on the nature of the case.

Legal counsel is readily available and permitted to represent a defendant in both court systems. The court may appoint legal counsel if counsel agrees to provide services free; no system of state payment of public defenders exists.

There are no jury trials. All cases, except national security cases and those deemed by the judge likely to upset public morality, are open to the public. Most judges are foreign nationals, primarily from other Arab countries. Interference in the judicial process by rulers is said to occur occasionally. Nonetheless, the court system is generally regarded as fair and its judgments well-considered.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Provisional Constitution prohibits entry of homes without permission, except in accordance with strict legal provisions. Surveillance of private correspondence is not practiced.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Except for rare instances involving national security, no cases of arbitrary interference with privacy have been reported in the past 2 years.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Emirate citizens are constitutionally guaranteed freedom of speech. As a matter of practice, most inhabitants, especially foreign nationals, are circumspect in public discussion of sensitive political topics.

Most of the local English and Arabic language newspapers are privately owned, but all except one receive government subsidies. The press operates under a law which codifies the powers of censorship and media closure and under guidelines for reporting which, with self-censorship by journalists, make the actual imposition of censorship relatively rare. Local newspapers are seldom critical of government policy. They are cautious in reporting on the ruling families, national security, and relations with neighboring states. In general, the Arabic press is more open, particularly on domestic issues, than the English press.

The censorship department of the Ministry of Information and Culture scrutinizes all imported newspapers, periodicals, films, and videos and bans items considered pornographic, violent, derogatory to Islam or Christianity, favorable to Israel, unduly critical of friendly countries, or critical of the ruling families.

The Ministry of Information and Culture and some emirate governments own the radio and television stations and assure programs and news reporting in conformity with standards imposed on the other media.

Visas for foreign journalists are tightly controlled, but, once in the UAE, a journalist is free to travel, interview, and file stories, which are, however, subject to censorship on security grounds.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political parties are not allowed. Organized public gatherings require a government permit. In practice, public gatherings are rare. The citizen population normally confines its political discussion and debate to the numerous "assemblies," held in private homes, which are a local tradition.

There is no legal provision for the right of workers to organize, to engage in collective bargaining, or to strike. Foreign workers attempting to do so would almost certainly be deported. For the resolution of work-related disputes, workers have access to conciliation committees, organized by the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, and to special labor courts. These committees and courts are regarded as effective and fair.

Because foreign workers can stay in the UAE only with the continuing approval of the Government, and because many face unemployment or lower wages in their country of origin, they sometimes fall prey to abuse or exploitation by employers who take advantage of their reluctance to protest. The Government has taken steps to improve the labor law covering conditions of employment, compensation, inspection of the workplace, and enforcement procedures.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official religion of the UAE, but non-Muslims (predominantly foreign Christians) are free to practice their faith in their own places of worship, served by their own clergy, so long as they do not publicly proselytize or distribute religious literature. Although the relocation in 1982 of the Catholic and Anglican churches from prominent seafront locations in Abu Dhabi raised fears of possible restrictions, both these churches, along with other Christian denominations and other non-Christian faiths, have flourished.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement or relocation within the country except for such security areas as defense and oil installations. Unrestricted foreign travel and emigration are permitted to citizens. Exit visas are not required. The right of return is extended to all citizens. There are no known instances of revocation of citizenship for political reasons. Foreign workers who terminate employment are normally required to leave the country for at least 6 months before they may return to take up a new job. However, some categories of skilled personnel have been exempted from this provision.

The UAE and its member-emirates have long accepted groups of displaced persons, such as Palestinians, and those attracted by economic opportunity, such as Iranians. Except for those who were settled in the area long before the UAE's independence, few of these persons have become citizens. Although lacking a formalized procedure for accepting refugees, the UAE occasionally grants Iranians refuge if they can demonstrate that they would face persecution in Iran. However, most Iranians, if intercepted attempting to enter the country illegally, are turned back.

The UAE is host to a U.N. Development Program office which can assist those claiming refugee status to get to a United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) mission abroad. The Government contributes to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency and the UNHCR.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The UAE has no formal democratic institutions. Most of its citizens have little or no say in the process of government or in the choice of leaders. The bulk of executive and legislative power is in the hands of the seven emirate rulers and their families. Intermarriage and alliances between the ruling families and other influential families extend the network of informal participation by which most major decisions are made.

The positions and powers of individual rulers are not defined constitutionally. They are the product of traditional concepts of authority. Although the rulers and ruling families are presumed to have a right to rule, their incumbency ultimately depends on the quality of their leadership and responsiveness to their subjects' needs. Emirate rulers are accessible to any subject who has a problem or a request. The choice of a new ruler falls to the ruling family, which is supposed to choose its most capable and respected eligible member. In practice, to avoid violent succession disputes which were common in the past, primogeniture has become increasingly common.

The political dominance of the ruling families is intertwined with their substantial involvement and influence in economic life. The ruling families and their close allies control and profit from petroleum production, and, with important merchant families, have a major stake in the UAE's commercial life. Women play virtually no public role in the UAE's conservative male-dominated society. However, pressure for change may come from the generally superior educational performance of girls (who are restricted from educational opportunities abroad) and their increasing secondary and university enrollment.

Foreigners, with few exceptions, play almost no direct political role in order to avoid jeopardizing their residence status.

In 1985, there were few indications of movement toward more formal democratic institutions. The country's most representative institution, the Federal National Council, continued to meet and debate government policy, but with no sign of change in its advisory status or in its nonelective method of selection.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The UAE is responsive to foreign criticism of its human rights situation. For example, it has improved its labor laws in response to criticism that low-paid foreign workers were being mistreated. The UAE has no internal groups which monitor human rights. No outside human rights group visited the UAE in 1985. In its 1985 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the use of cruel, inhuman, and degrading punishment. It also noted its concern about the continued imposition of the death penalty, but welcomed the commutation of such sentences. Freedom House rated the UAE "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The total population is estimated at 1,286,000, growing by an estimated 3.1 percent annually. The per capita gross domestic product of $22,870 is exceptionally high. Approximately 20 percent of the population are UAE citizens and 80 percent are foreign nationals. The Government has developed employment guidelines designed to increase the number of citizens in managerial positions. Nevertheless, foreigners still dominate technical, managerial, and professional positions. UAE citizens predominate in high-level government positions.

Local attitudes toward foreigners are ambivalent. Most UAE citizens acknowledge that massive economic development would have been impossible without them. At the same time, many fear that their culture may be inundated by foreign influence. Although many foreigners have lived in the UAE for years and have held highly responsible positions in the public and private sectors, very few, even fellow Arabs, have been granted citizenship.

In 1985, the economy continued its downward trend, affected by a weak world oil market. The downturn has affected the commercial sector and the rental market, on which many citizens depend for their income, and has threatened the banking sector. Nonetheless, most UAE citizens, beneficiaries of laws and regulations which assure their economic participation, still enjoy a high standard of living.

The federal Government and the individual emirate governments have inaugurated an extensive social welfare program. Good quality medical treatment, free only to citizens, is available in all but the most remote areas. Life expectancy at birth is 72 years; infant mortality is 36.3 per 1,000 live births. The Ministry of Labor and Social Welfare administers a social security payment system designed to assure poorer citizens a minimum monthly income. Virtually all citizens, urban and rural, have access to safe water.

Education is compulsory to age 12. There are approximately 250,000 children of all nationalities in approximately 545 elementary and secondary schools. UAE citizens and noncitizen employees of the Government can send their children to school free. Other foreign nationals must pay to send their children to private schools or lower-cost government evening schools. Adult literacy, enhanced by programs enrolling over 25,000 adults in 1985, is estimated at 65 per cent.

Labor regulations prohibit employment of youths below 18 and restrict hours of work to 8 hours per day, 6 days per week. There is no minimum wage. The Government has adopted some occupational safety standards which are generally enforced.

Conservative attitudes about women's roles and the frequency of early marriage still limit their educational opportunities. However, women's education is advancing and opportunities for women are growing in such areas as government service and the news media, besides the more traditional fields of education and health.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

The military has played a preeminent role in the Yemen Arab Republic (North Yemen) since it came into being in 1962. The current leader is Colonel Ali Abdullah Salih, President of the Republic, who assumed office in 1978 following the assassination of his two immediate predecessors, both of whom also came from the senior ranks of the military. No ranking national government official currently serving in office has been elected in a truly competitive process.

Until the revolution of 1962, Yemen was a theocracy isolated from much of the outside world. The bloody civil war that followed the revolution did not end until 1970. Portrayed as the legitimate heir of the 1962 revolution, the present Government has relied heavily on military and security forces to bolster its position, particularly in the unstable Yemeni political environment of its early years. Civilians serving as cabinet ministers or in other capacities play key roles in advising the President. The Government has not been able, however, to extend its authority fully into many regions still isolated from Sanaa by the rugged terrain. Tribal traditions, poorly developed public institutions, and widespread poverty also impede efforts to form a more cohesive society and greatly influence the state of human rights.

The Yemen Arab Republic is a poor country with an extremely limited industrial infrastructure. Petroleum deposits were discovered by an American company in 1984, and President Salih has announced reserves of 300 million barrels in the discovery field. Oil export revenue is not expected before 1988. Yemen has a free-market economy in which freedom to hold private property and pursue private economic interests is virtually unlimited.

Overall there was little change in the state of human rights in 1985. In the early 1980's human rights practices were strongly affected by the activities of the National Democratic Front (NDF), a foreign-supported, Marxist-oriented rural guerrilla movement operating in the central and southern regions of the country. Fighting between government forces and the guerrillas was at times heavy and basic human rights of the population living in the affected areas were often violated in the wake of the Front's terrorism and the frequently repressive antiterrorist campaigns. Although the sharp reduction in the Front's military activity since the summer of 1982 has led the central Government to reduce repressive practices previously adopted to confront the security threat, the gradual extension of the Government's authority since the subduing of the NDF has also increased the impact of arbitrary and sometimes oppressive practices of national security officials, whose effective jurisdiction was previously confined mainly to the major urban centers.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTSSection 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:*a. Political Killing

There are now very few reported terrorist attacks against the civilian population and there were no reports that government forces engaged in political killing in 1985.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

b. Disappearance

There continue to be reports that the National Security Organization occasionally resorts to secret arrest. In rural areas, both government security forces and tribal militias occasionally take hostages.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Yemen Constitution, the "National Charter," and Yemeni legal statutes all proscribe the use of torture. Nevertheless, reports persist that police and security organization personnel continue to use force and intimidation to extract confessions from persons accused of criminal and political offenses. There have been no known prosecutions on this charge, however.

The Yemeni legal code is based on Islamic Shari'a law which calls for such forms of punishment as amputation and stoning. These penalties were rarely applied in 1985, often being waived in favor of monetary payment to the aggrieved party.

Some prisoners receive food, clothing, and medicine from their families to ameliorate the otherwise harsh conditions prevalent in most Yemeni jails. Without this support, prisoners must subsist on the limited diet and health care provided by the State. Those detained outside the major urban centers suffer more than others from substandard care.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Constitutional provisions limit the time police may hold suspects without judicial authorization and there are established procedures through which the detainees may contact their families and lawyers. However, legal safeguards have been ignored when special security forces have detained persons suspected of subversion. The practice of long-term imprisonment of political opponents continues. Estimates are hard to make, although some reports put the number over 100.

There were also instances of incommunicado detention. If the security forces suspect involvement in antigovernment activity, it may be particularly difficult to secure a suspect's timely release. However, family and friends are usually able to learn a detainee's whereabouts in a few days.

Although government officials are not exempt from politically motivated arrest, prominent public figures whose opposition to government policies falls short of subversion are rarely detained by the security police. Instead, they are generally forced to withdraw from public life and their activities are closely monitored by government authorities. Usually, such persons are not subject to formal house arrest, but are simply told not to work for a time.

There is no forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are several types of courts in the Yemen Arab Republic, including traditional Shari'a (Islamic) courts, commercial courts, and special security courts. The Shari'a courts have jurisdiction in all cases that do not fall into the latter two categories, although there is overlapping jurisdiction in some commercial law cases. The Shari'a courts appear to be fair and impartial, within the context of the Islamic tradition. The judge plays an active role in questioning the witnesses, seeking to establish the guilt or innocence of the accused. Attorneys may counsel their clients, but do not address the court or examine witnesses. If the defendant is to be brought to trial, he is informed of the charges against him at the conclusion of the police investigation.

There is a possibility of appeal to political authorities outside the Shari'a system. Persons often seek to bring the influence of prominent people or government officials to bear in a case. The ability to do so varies according to the status of the defendant. In the commercial court, litigants can also expect a fair and open trial with legal counsel. The Shari'a and commercial courts remain largely independent of the executive, though all decisions are subject to review and confirmation by the President.

Those formally charged with espionage or other antigovernment activities are tried in special security courts. These courts are convened at the direction of the President to handle specific cases. Rights normally afforded the accused may be suspended in security cases. All decisions made by the security court are subject to review and confirmation by the President. The number of political prisoners held in Yemeni prisons may, by rough estimate, number 100 or more.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

National Security forces operate under an open mandate to search homes, monitor telephone conversations, read personal correspondence, or otherwise intrude into private lives when they believe the security of the State is jeopardized. However, the substantial amount of weaponry held by private citizens and the isolation of many villages mitigate against wanton invasion of privacy by the police in many areas of rural Yemen.

Section 2. Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

A number of limits on free speech exist, but their effect is limited to the urban population by the Government's incomplete control over the country. The Information Ministry controls the management of radio, television, and all newspapers and periodicals enjoying wide circulation. The limited number of privately-owned publications occasionally criticize malfeasance by public officials or address economic issues, but generally avoid expressing opinions at variance with the Government's. The Government has on several occasions removed articles from these publications before they can be made public. It has also suspended publishing rights for extended periods to punish attempts at printing material the censors find objectionable. Editors of independent newspapers have been tried for libel against public officials; some have been acquitted. Foreign magazines and newspapers are sold in the major cities but are subject to periodic censorship.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political parties are illegal. The People's General Congress, which was established by the Government in August 1982, is the main mechanism for popular political expression. The ostensible purpose of the Government in establishing the Congress was to promote regular discussion and endorsement of the National Charter, which outlines the personal and political rights of the Yemeni people. Standing committees of the Congress continue to meet at both the national and regional levels to give the Charter a wide public audience, and members of the Congress have as their principal task promotion of the Charter.

Political demonstrations, although not illegal, are rare. The major mass meetings were sponsored by the Government in connection with the elections and National Day celebrations.

Unions and professional organizations play a minor role in the country. Legislation prohibits the establishment of unions independent of government controls. Strikes are illegal and there is no right to collective bargaining.

Association of Yemeni citizens with foreigners is closely monitored by National Security officials. The names of those visiting embassies or attending social functions hosted by foreigners are routinely recorded, and access to these functions is sometimes denied. Security officials have on occasion detained Yemeni citizens for investigation of their possible links with foreigners.

Tribal councils provide alternative channels for political expression. Outside North Yemen's few cities, tribal leaders have wide latitude in making decisions affecting local welfare. Gradually, however, the National Security Organization is penetrating previously autonomous local communities.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the state religion and that of the vast majority of Yemenis. Members of the Zaydi (Shi'a) sect have historically enjoyed greater political influence than those of the Shafei (Sunni) sect, although this distinction has often been as much based on geographic and tribal considerations as on sectarian grounds. For the most part, the two major Islamic communities coexist without friction and seek to minimize the significance of doctrinal differences. Muslim associations with ties to Pan-Islamic or foreign organizations enjoy some degree of freedom, including the right to operate schools which are largely independent of the national education system.

Although almost all of the once substantial Yemeni Jewish population has emigrated to Israel, the small number of Jews remaining live in peace with the Muslim majority. These Jews practice their religion freely, and suffer no unusual economic hardships. They maintain only very limited contact with Jews abroad. Communications between Yemeni Jews and their coreligionists and relatives in Israel are strictly proscribed.

There is no indigenous Christian population. Foreign Christians are allowed to conduct private services, although the establishment of churches is not permitted. Foreign clergy are not permitted into the country for missionary purposes; however, there are a few working in social-service fields. Public celebration of non-Islamic religious holidays is discouraged. Proselytizing is forbidden by law. Christian missionaries have operated hospitals for many years, but have experienced some harassment from local authorities and the press for alleged missionary activities.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation.

Many Yemenis historically have sought employment abroad. The Government has not restricted this large-scale emigration in view of the importance to the economy of foreign remittances. Procedures for obtaining passports and compulsory exit permits are sometimes onerous, particularly for Yemeni males who have not fulfilled their military service obligations. Political dissidents have frequently chosen self-imposed foreign exile or have accepted government appointments abroad rather than face possible difficulties at home stemming from their political views. There are no restrictions on travel by Yemenis within the country despite the presence of numerous security checkpoints on all major roads. Foreigners must obtain travel permits from the tourist office, which usually issues them with little difficulty.

Several refugee groups have sought asylum in Yemen. Approximately 2,700 armed members of the Palestinian Liberation Organization sought refuge in North Yemen in the fall of 1982 and December 1983 following their evacuation from Lebanon; many have since departed. Perhaps 250,000 South Yemenis have settled in North Yemen to escape political persecution or economic hardship in the south. Refugee groups from countries in the Horn of Africa have frequently sought residence in Yemen, often for economic rather than political reasons. The authorities have taken measures to restrict the flow of these national groups. For example, many Somalis and Ethiopians, who have no claim to Yemeni citizenship or clear demonstration of being political refugees, find it difficult to obtain work permits and visa extensions.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The President makes the key political decisions in government-controlled areas. There is no mechanism for the people to choose or elect an alternative chief executive through free, competitive elections. There are no legal opposition parties.

The People's Constituent Assembly reviews and ratifies legislation proposed by the President and the cabinet ministers he appoints. The Assembly has never disapproved the President's policies, but on occasion in 1985 called ministers and other ranking government officials to explain proposed legislation. The members of this legislative body were appointed by presidential decree in 1978. Once scheduled for 1983, parliamentary elections have not taken place and their timing remains uncertain.

The People's General Congress is the only national political organization whose members have been selected in competitive elections. Convoled in 1982 to discuss the National Charter, it held its second national convention in August 1984 to endorse government policies. The 1,000 delegates (700 elected) represent most segments of Yemeni society. Women, as a rule absent from public life, hold a few seats in the Congress, and have the right to vote in general elections. Reportedly debate at times has been vigorous within the Congress, but the President and his key advisors control the agenda closely. Elections were held in July 1984 to fill 17,507 positions on newly created "Local Development Councils" which are responsible for local government as well as local development projects. For the first time in North Yemen's history, the balloting was secret, and it included all citizens over 18 years of age except for the mentally handicapped and certain criminals. Well received by the population, the elections were a step toward extending government control in the countryside.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

As far as is known, no major international or nongovernment organization has asked to conduct a survey in the Yemen Arab Republic. The Amnesty International 1985 Report does not contain an entry for the Yemen Arab Republic; Freedom House rates it "partly free." There are no active human rights organizations in Yemen.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

North Yemen's population of 6,159,000, which is growing at a rate of 2.9 percent annually, is spread throughout an estimated 50,000 settlements. More than half the population lives in settlements of under 500. Among the poorest countries in the world, North Yemen's per capita gross national product was estimated at $550 in 1983.

Standards of health and education are particularly low. Life expectancy at birth was estimated at 45 years in 1985. This figure reflects in part the high rate of infant mortality of 137 per 1,000 live births. Estimates of adult illiteracy were 91 percent in 1980. Educational enrollments in the past five years have increased 168, 164, and 272 percent at primary, secondary, and university levels respectively but the latest figures still show only 47 percent of the school age population enrolled in primary school. Boys attend school in greater number than do girls. The 1980 statistics for access to safe drinking water were 18 percent in rural areas and 100 percent in urban areas.

Statistics on national income provide an incomplete description of Yemeni society, however, since several hundred thousand Yemenis work abroad, principally in the wealthier countries on the Arabian Peninsula. The estimated 1 billion dollars or more in hard currency remittances of the Yemenis working outside is a key element sustaining the national economy even though little of this wealth has been mobilized for investment in national development projects. Thus, many families enjoy a relatively more comfortable financial status than the figures would imply, while government efforts to collect taxes continue to be frustrated. The Government has assigned high priority to economic development, especially in agriculture, and efforts to rebuild villages devastated by a major earthquake in 1982 are continuing.

YEMEN ARAB REPUBLIC

Economic wealth is distributed on a relatively egalitarian basis throughout the society and many farmers own their own lands. Most citizens encounter no institutional barriers to pursuing their primary economic interests in the largely free-market economy. Yemenis from non-Arab ethnic groups or children of ethnically mixed marriages frequently encounter discriminatory treatment from public officials and are less successful in finding good jobs than other Yemeni citizens. For example, the "Akhdam" caste of former slaves of African origin are often relegated to menial jobs such as streetsweeping and trash collecting. However, this has not resulted in social unrest, given the many chances for outmigration available to Yemenis seeking more lucrative employment opportunities elsewhere.

Much of local production is agrarian or "cottage type" industry in which children often work. The presence of children in the workplace is more a reflection of family values and expectations than an exploitation of available labor. Children, especially outside urban centers, traditionally learn their trade or occupation from their parents rather than from formal educational experiences.

While working conditions are sometimes harsh, reflecting the subsistence economy which exists for many, the Government has set general safety requirements and occasionally inspects to insure that industrial producers have established safety standards for their employees. The generally accepted pay scale for unskilled workers is 100 Yemeni riyals (approximately $13) per day.

Living in a conservative Islamic society which remained largely isolated from the modern world prior to 1962, few Yemeni women are employed outside the home or play an active role in other aspects of public life. Additionally, education for women in significant numbers began only at the end of the civil war in 1970. The Government does not restrict women's access to employment and is trying to expand their educational opportunities. However, lack of manpower continues to inhibit the opening of new schools and the staffing of existing institutions. Traditional Islamic norms, more stringently followed in rural areas, as well as the considerable time expended by women in water and fuel collection, constrain the number of women attending classes.

Women are now present in the middle levels of several ministries such as the Central Planning Organization, and one woman is in the Constituent Assembly. A few were elected to Local Development Councils. Prevailing social norms frequently dictate, however, that women defer to the guidance of their male colleagues and accept close supervision of their activities by male relatives. Women seeking exit permits for travel outside the country are frequently asked to provide evidence that male relatives have no objection to their travel.

PEOPLE'S DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF YEMEN*

The People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (South Yemen) is a one-party state under the control of the Marxist-Leninist Yemen Socialist Party (YSP). The present leader of the YSP and President of South Yemen, Ali Nasir Mohammed, came to power in 1980 when his predecessor, Abd Al-Fattah Isma'il, was ousted in a bloodless coup and fled to exile in Moscow. Although confronted by an array of more militant Marxist rivals, including Abd Al-Fattah, who returned from the Soviet Union in 1985, Ali Nasir has retained his position because of Soviet support and was reelected to the party chairmanship at the Third YSP General Congress in October 1985. Since 1979, South Yemen has remained firmly within the Soviet sphere of influence.

Because of governmental instability and efforts to restructure the country's traditional society, an estimated 25 percent of the population has fled since independence was achieved in 1967, mostly to the Yemen Arab Republic (North Yemen).

Approximately 40 percent of the population is engaged in agriculture, which produces about 12 percent of the gross national product. The economy continues to stagnate, with production low and employment scarce. Shortages have increased markedly since 1984. More than 150,000 men work outside the country, providing critically needed remittances.

South Yemen is a Communist police state tightly controlled by a ruthless police and security apparatus, and human rights are subordinate to the political and economic interests of the ruling party and the Government.

While South Yemen is a closed society in which it is difficult to gauge the extent of human rights abuses, reports from South Yemen in 1985 confirm that the suppression of human rights continues as a matter of state practice. The State Security Organization (SSO) and other intelligence and law enforcement organizations maintain tight control and surveillance over the inhabitants. Freedom of association is highly circumscribed, and confiscation of property continues as a method of controlling emigration. For the immediate future, there appears to be little to suggest any fundamental change in the human rights situation.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Although there have been many political killings since 1967, there were no known cases in 1985.

*The United States maintains no diplomatic mission in the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, which severed diplomatic relations with the United States in 1969. It is difficult therefore to comment authoritatively on conditions in that country. This report does not take into account the developments ensuing upon the coup attempt in January 1986 which may have left many dead and the country in turmoil.

PEOPLE'S DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF YEMEN

b. Disappearance

Reports continued to be received in 1985 of the disappearance of regime opponents, and the whereabouts of others reported missing under mysterious circumstances remains unknown.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were continuing reports of torture by the SSO and other security organizations in 1985, despite the Constitution's prohibition of such actions. Prison conditions are far below acceptable medical and sanitary standards, and solitary confinement for political dissidents is reportedly commonplace. Treatment of prisoners is reportedly harsh and often degrading.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Unconfirmed reports by refugees indicate that political dissidents continued to be arrested in 1985. Several South Yemeni political figures out of favor with the regime are under house arrest. The Government withholds information concerning the detention of political prisoners, and no recent estimates of numbers are available. State security considerations take precedence over the right to bail and due process. The evidence suggests that incommunicado detention has been practiced in the past. There are no reports of forced labor.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

From the limited information available, the judicial process appears subject to extensive political manipulation. Trials involving security considerations are closed, although a Ba'athist spy trial was televised in 1985.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Provisions of law intended to protect personal privacy and the home are legally subordinate to the interests of national security. The law requires that antiregime and antiparty statements be reported. There is also a complex system of informants, telephones are routinely monitored, mail is examined, and persons are searched arbitrarily.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is sharply limited both by laws aimed at protecting the regime and by the existence of an extensive informant system. Although guaranteed by law, freedom of the press does not exist in fact as the media are state-controlled. Only a few foreign publications are available.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

No public or professional associations except those sponsored by the Government or the party operate openly, and reports indicate that except for traditional religious and tribal functions, nonsanctioned public gatherings and associations are not allowed. The Yemeni Socialist Party does, however, sponsor community meetings, which are generally held for political indoctrination. Association with foreigners is strictly controlled. The Government has made a concerted effort to suppress traditional tribal identification.

There are no independent trade organizations or labor unions, and government-sponsored labor unions are under close party control. Collective bargaining is forbidden. The State represents the rights of its employees. Measures such as the curtailment of overtime have aggravated the relationship between workers and the State. There is no nongovernment mechanism for addressing such grievances.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution declares Islam to be the state religion but guarantees freedom of religious expression. In practice, the Government has attempted to minimize the influence of religious leaders, a large number of whom were arrested during the late 1960's and early 1970's. Sermons for Friday prayer in Aden are reportedly provided by the Ministry of Awqaf (i.e., religious trusts) Affairs.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government controls foreign travel, and citizens are required to pay a deposit to insure their return. Property is confiscated in case of failure to do so. Restrictions on travel to North Yemen, however, seem to have eased during recent years as a result of improved relations between the two countries. Citizens are free to travel within their province of residence without restriction and also need no special documentation for travel to other provinces, except for some restricted security areas.

The Government has tried in the past several years to encourage South Yemeni exiles to return. Many exiles are skeptical of the Government's motives and fear for their safety if they were to return.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political power is concentrated within the highest level of the Yemeni Socialist Party. Personal and factional allegiances play a major role in decisionmaking by the party leadership. The Constitution guarantees the right to vote to males and females over the age of 18, and elections are held regularly. However, only party-approved candidates may contest elections at any level, and no other parties or political action groups are permitted.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In its 1985 Report, Amnesty International noted that it was continuing to seek the release of 20 prisoners of conscience and to investigate the cases of 9 possible prisoners of conscience, all of whom were arrested between 1967 and 1977, and that, as in the past, no response was received from South

PEOPLE'S DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF YEMEN

Yemeni authorities to Amnesty International's inquiries. Freedom House rated South Yemen as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

South Yemen has a population of 2.2 million which is growing at an annual rate of 2.9 percent. Per capita gross national product was estimated at $520 in 1983. One-fourth of the population lives in the vicinity of Aden; about 150,000 are nomadic Bedouin, and the rest are scattered in the rural areas.

Although the number of hospitals has dramatically increased since independence and health care is provided without charge, services are reported to be substandard and declining in quality. Life expectancy in 1985 was 47 years, and the infant mortality rate was 131 per 1,000 live births. As of 1980 only 46 percent of the population had access to safe water (85 percent in urban areas and 25 percent in rural areas). Since the 1982 floods, there has been a housing shortage.

The Government has made a major effort to increase the literacy rate. In 1981, the primary school enrollment ratio was 82 percent of primary school age children. Illiterate adults are required to attend literacy classes.

Child labor is more prevalent in the rural areas than in urban centers, where children must compete with adults for scarce employment. Child labor in rural areas is often the result of traditional parent-child job training and apprenticeship rather than exploitation. Working conditions, once among the best in the area, have deteriorated markedly since the regime came to power, although the closed nature of the state has made it difficult to fully document these conditions.

Equality of the sexes is guaranteed by law, and women frequently hold government and service jobs. Polygamy, child marriages, and arranged marriages are forbidden.

There is little information available on the position of minorities, although some reports suggest that the Somali minority has been severely restricted in its activities, with many of its leading members intimidated.

Notes on Preparation of the Reports

The annual Country Reports on Human Rights Practices are based upon all information available to the United States Government. Sources include American officials, officials of foreign governments, private citizens, victims of human rights abuse, congressional studies, intelligence information, press reports, international organizations, and nongovernmental organizations concerned with human rights. We are particularly appreciative of, and make reference in most reports to, the role of nongovernmental human rights organizations, ranging from groups in a single country to major organizations that concern themselves with human rights matters in larger geographic regions or over the entire world. Much of the information we use is already public. For obvious reasons, much of our information cannot be attributed to specific sources.

The reports must be submitted to Congress by January 31. To comply, United States diplomatic missions are given guidance in September for submission of draft reports during October and November; contributions are received from appropriate offices in the Department of State; and a final draft is prepared under the coordination of the Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs. Because of the preparation time required, it is possible that developments in the latter part of the year under review may not be fully reflected; moreover, reports from some of the nongovernmental organizations are for periods ending well before the end of the year. We make every effort to include reference to major events or significant changes in trends.

We have attempted to make these country reports as comprehensive as space will allow, while taking care to make them objective and as uniform as possible in both scope and quality of coverage. We have given particular attention to attaining a high standard of consistency despite the multiplicity of sources and the obvious problems related to varying degrees of access to information, structural differences in political and social systems, and trends in world opinion regarding human rights practices in specific countries. There is a conceptual difficulty in applying a single standard of evaluation to societies with differing cultural and legal traditions. There is also a problem of perspective in discussing countries that face differing political realities, which must be taken into account in describing the human rights environment. Rather than viewing a country in isolation, these reports take as their point of departure the world as it is and then apply a consistent approach in assessing each country's human rights situation. While we have tried to make each report self-contained by including enough background information to place the human rights situation in context, readers who need to delve more deeply may wish to consult other sources, including previous country reports.

To improve the uniformity of the reports, the introductory section of each report has been reorganized to provide a brief setting, indicating how the country is governed and providing the context for examining the country's human rights performance. A description of the political framework and a discussion of the security and law enforcement situation are followed by an economic background statement. The setting concludes with an overview of human rights developments in 1985.

The format for the reports follows that of last year. "Respect for Human Rights" is covered in sections on respect for integrity of the person, respect for civil rights, and respect for political rights, followed by a section on governmental attitudes toward investigations of alleged human rights violations. The "Economic, Social, and Cultural Situation," although not readily divisible into separate sections, is organized this year to present, in turn, a brief description of the economy, a summary of health care and education, a survey of working conditions, and a discussion of the status of women, followed, where applicable, by comments on the treatment of ethnic or national minorities.

The following notes on specific categories of the report are not meant to be comprehensive descriptions of each category but to provide definitions of key terms as used in the reports and to explain the organization of material within the format:

Political Killing--Includes killings in which there is evidence of government instigation without due process of law, or of political motivation by government or by opposition groups; also covers acts of violence, if pertinent to describe a situation where killing may occur; excludes combat deaths and killings by common criminals, if the likelihood of political motivation can be ruled out.

Disappearance--Covers unresolved cases in which political victims have not been found or perpetrators have not been identified; cases eventually classed as identified political killings are covered in the above category, those eventually identified as arrest or detention are covered under "arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile."

Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment--Includes "any act by which severe pain or suffering, physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted by or at the instigation of a public official on a person to obtain information or a confession, to punish him for actual or suspected commission of an act, or to intimidate him or others" (UNGA Resolution 3452 of 1975); discussion concentrates on actual practices and treatment, not on whether they fit the precise definition of torture.

Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile--Covers cases in which detainees, including political detainees, are held in official custody without charges or, if charged, are denied a public preliminary judicial hearing within a reasonable period (persons charged after a hearing but held without bail would be discussed in the category that follows); covers forced or compulsory labor (see Appendix B) as a means of education, political coercion, or racial or social discrimination. (N.B., if no mention is made of forced or compulsory labor, it may be assumed that the practice does not exist.)

Denial of Fair Public Trial--Discusses not whether a trial has been denied but whether a trial held was both fair and public; failure to hold any trial is noted in the category above; includes discussion of "political prisoners" (political detainees are covered above), defined as those imprisoned for essentially political beliefs or acts, regardless of the actual charge, but not including those who have gone beyond advocacy and dissent to commit acts of violence.

Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence--Discusses "passive" right of the individual to noninterference by the state; includes right to receive foreign publications, for example, while right to publish is discussed under the category that follows; does not include cultural or traditional practices, such as discrimination against women within marriage, which are addressed in the last part of the report.

Freedom of Speech and Press--Includes academic freedom.

Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association--Includes right of labor to organize and bargain collectively (see Appendix B).

Freedom of Religion--Includes freedom to publish religious documents in foreign languages; addresses treatment of foreign clergy; addresses whether religious belief affects membership in a ruling party or a career in government.

Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation--Includes discussion of forced resettlements; generally, "refugees" refers to those with "well-founded fear of persecution" in their country of origin or, if stateless, of habitual residence, on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion.

Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government--Discusses extent to which citizens can freely choose, and change, the laws and officials that govern them; assesses whether elections are meaningful.

Government Attitude Regarding International and Nongovernmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights--Includes discussion of domestic and foreign human rights organizations operating in the country; mention is made of a government's position on international human rights questions only if there is a particular point to be made.

Economic, Social, and Cultural Situation--Selected economic and social indicators are designed to serve as reference points but not absolute standards in discussing the extent to which human needs are met. The quality of data is highly variable; for the sake of uniformity, World Bank figures have been used in most cases. The indicators chosen are those that are both most nearly representative and universal, although their usefulness declines in discussing fully developed countries (N.B., the indicator "Total school enrollment as a percentage of population in age group" frequently exceeds 100 percent because in countries with universal education many children below or above the official primary school age will be enrolled as well as all of the children within the age group). In addition to these indicators, the 1985 reports address conditions related to worker rights, including minimum age for the employment of children and acceptable conditions of work (see Appendix B).

APPENDIX B

Reporting on Worker Rights

The Generalized System of Preferences Renewal Act of 1984 requires reporting on worker rights in GSP beneficiary countries and states that internationally recognized worker rights include "(A) the right of association; (B) the right to organize and bargain collectively; (C) a prohibition on the use of any form of forced or compulsory labor; (D) a minimum age for the employment of children; and (E) acceptable conditions of work with respect to minimum wages, hours of work, and occupational safety and health." Reporting on worker rights for 1985 is included in the human rights reports format described in Appendix A and is covered in separate paragraphs in response to the Act's requirement that worker rights be addressed separately within the report. In previous years, the right of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively were addressed in Section 2b (Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association); this continues to be the practice, as these rights are important indicators of the broader right to associate. Similarly, comments on the use of forced or compulsory labor are included in section 1d (Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile), as in the past. Discussion of the employment of children and of wages, hours, and occupational safety is included in the "Economic, Social, and Cultural Situation" to facilitate the consideration of these topics in context, in keeping with the intent of the Trade Act Conferencees that the definition of worker rights "be interpreted to be commensurate with the development level of the particular country." The treatment of worker rights considers not only laws and regulations but also their practical implementation, taking into account the following additional guidelines:

A. The right of association has been defined by the International Labor Organization (ILO) to include the right of workers and employers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization; to draw up their own constitutions and rules, elect their representatives, and formulate their programs; to join in confederations and affiliate with international organizations; and to be protected against dissolution or suspension by administrative authority.

A collateral issue that is often considered in the context of freedom of association concerns legal provisions for strikes. Freedom of association is not synonymous with the right of workers to strike as strikes may be curtailed in essential services (i.e., those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety, or health of a significant portion of the population) and in the public service. Such restrictions, however, must be offset by adequate guarantees to safeguard the interests of the workers concerned (e.g., machinery for mediation and arbitration; due process; and the right to judicial review of all legal actions). Reporting on restrictions affecting the ability of workers to strike should include information on any procedures that may exist for safeguarding workers' interests.

B. The right to organize and bargain collectively includes the right of workers to be represented in negotiating the prevention and settlement of disputes with employers; the right to protection against interference; and the right to protection against acts of antiunion discrimination. Governments should promote machinery for voluntary negotiations between employers and workers and their organizations.

C. Forced or compulsory labor is defined as work or service exacted from any person under the menace of penalty and for which the person has not volunteered. (It should be noted that the ILO has specifically exempted the following from its definition of forced labor: compulsory military service; certain civic obligations; certain forms of prison labor; work exacted in emergencies; minor communal services.)

D. "Minimum age" concerns the effective abolition of child labor by raising the minimum age for employment to a level consistent with the fullest physical and mental development of young people. In addition, young people should not be employed in hazardous conditions or at night.

E. "Acceptable conditions of work" refers to the establishment and maintenance of machinery, adapted to national conditions, that provides for minimum working standards, i.e., wages that provide a decent living for the workers and their families; working hours that do not exceed 48 hours per week with a full 24-hour rest day; a specified annual paid holiday; and minimum conditions for the protection of the safety and health of workers.

APPENDIX D

Explanation of Statistical Tables

Tables listing the amounts of U.S. bilateral assistance and multilateral development assistance in the fiscal years of 1983, 1984, and 1985 are provided for each country which received such assistance during those fiscal years (tables in which Export-Import Bank loans would have been the only statistics reflected have been omitted). In general, loans are reported as of the fiscal year of authorization, and grants are reported for the fiscal year of obligation. Food for Peace commodities financed by grants under Title II of P.L. 480 are reported by dollar amount shipped during the fiscal year.

Data for AID for 1985 loans and grants are as indicated in the FY 1987 Congressional Presentation. All other data are as presented in "U.S. Overseas Loans and Grants and Assistance from International Organizations" (The Green Book).

U.S. bilateral assistance figures are broken down by two basic categories.

I) Economic Assistance

II) Military Assistance

For each category, the overall amounts are further broken down in two ways: first, to indicate the amount of aid provided in the form of loans and grants; and second, to indicate the amount provided under various programs (e.g., AID, Food for Peace, etc.).

In addition, the tables list the amount of loans (not generally considered "assistance") made by other U.S. government sources and the amounts committed by international agencies, such as multilateral financial institutions and United Nations agencies.
